stitution, which commences, Sedes Apostolica, num. 67, in tomo 13, of the new Bullarium, published at Rome, granted to those inhabitants of Saxony, who possessing the property antiently belonging to the churches, either had abjured or would abjure heresy, that they might retain the property which they possessed, and freely dispose of it as of their own effects; and he made over to them moreover, all the produce before derived from such property?—Since the time of Paul II. as I have already mentioned, all Popes claim the right of being consulted when there is question of alienating church property. I stated, moreover, that the bull of Paul II. was received and published in some states, and in those, at least, the Pope had a legal right to interfere in the alienation of ecclesiastical property; of course, when his right was once established by the law of those countries, the Pope legally possessed this right, and any person who transferred ecclesiastical property without consulting him, violated this right. The holy see, however, is very indulgent in pardoning this contempt of the prerogative she claims, and when the good of religion requires it, never refuses to confirm titles acquired to church property without her approbation. In the sections read, the preceding one, and the following, the Pope shows that such has been the practice of his predecessors at all times. He quotes the sanction given by Cardinal Pole, in the reign of Philip and Mary, to the transfers of church property made during the two preceding reigns in England; he then quotes a case discussed by a German canonist. In the opinion given by this German canonist, he supposes the Pope to possess this right, and infers that the possessors of ecclesiastical property, whose title has not been sanctioned by the Pope, is not a real and a good title; reasoning always upon the supposition, that the Pope possessed a right of interference in the alienation of ecclesiastical property. The case he proposes, is the case of a Protestant prince, who embraces the Catholic religion, having previously acquired possession of ecclesiastical property, and proposes to himself the question, whether this prince can persevere in the possession without consulting the see of Rome; he insists that he cannot, on the principle that the Pope had acquired in that country a right of interference in the alienation of ecclesiastical property, and therefore, any ecclesiastical property alienated without his approbation, was not lawfully transferred, however validly by law; he observes, however, that the Pope is indulgent in dispensing with such possessors of church property, and permitting them to retain it. And he instances his observation by the case of the Duke of Nuremberg, and the Elector Palatine. He indeed states, that the Pope, of course, gives his permission only to persons professing the Roman Catholic religion; it is a general principle with the see of Rome never to dispense her favours to any, but those who belong to her body. I had occasion to allude to that principle, when there was question of a dispensation granted to persons of another religion. Benedict XIV. maintained that it was not the intention of the church, to grant dispensation to any but those who were Roman Catholics. Hence, as long as heretics remain separated from the see of Rome, she will never dispense with them, and confirm their title individually to ecclesiastical property, nor will they of course call for such confirmation, on which they place no weight; though, I have no doubt, but the see of Rome, if our Government should at any time call for it, would make a declaration relating to this country, similar to that which Pius VII. made regarding church property in France; but such a declaration would be altogether superfluous here, after a lapse of so many years, and so permanent a settlement of property. But though the Popes, since the time of Paul II. claim this right of interference, in the transfer of ecclesiastical property, it has not been generally acknowledged in the Catholic states throughout Europe; and canonists in general, even those who are most favourable to the Pope's power, allow that the bull Ambitiosa, of Paul II. which is to be found among the Extravagantes, has never been considered universally binding, and that it is doubtful whether the censures annexed to it have ever been in force, even in those countries where the bull itself was published*.

Is not the amount of the doctrine then which you state this, that the Pope claims a right of interfering in the disposal of ecclesiastical property in all cases, although circumstances do not admit of it being effectual in many instances?—I stated that Paul II. had issued his bull with that view, but that this bull was not received and published in all countries. In the countries where it was published, of course the Pope acquired the right of interfering in such alienation. I have often stated, that the Pope possesses no more power over property than what is conceded to him by the State, and applying this principle to the case before us, I say that he possesses no power in the alienation of ecclesiastical property, but that which the State assigns him. In the countries where the Bull Ambitiosa, was received, he obtained that right; where it was not published or received, he possesses no such such right. The see of Rome, it is true, claims it generally, but the claim is not generally acknowledged*.

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

* The Pope next quotes, as an instance of the indulgence of the holy see in this respect, the condescension of Clement XI. towards the king of Saxony, in 1712; to whose subjects possessing church property, acquired during the religious wars, he confirms their titles, on the condition indeed of embracing the Roman Catholic religion. Those who did not embrace it, and had a legal title, had no scruples on the subject, and would not trouble him for a dispensation. Clement XII. is next quoted by the author of the rescript. This Pope confirmed the dispensation granted by Clement XI. to the possessors of church property in Saxony, being Catholics. From all this it follows, that it is usual for Roman Catholics possessing church property, unjustly seized in a revolution, or otherwise, to call for the dispensation of the Pope, which is never refused them.

The question was not as to the possession of the right, but as to the claim of the right?—Of course I allow that Paul II. and his successors have claimed such a right, and have enjoyed it in many countries. When there is question of important interference of great magnitude with church property, there is great deference shown to the Pope's recommendations in all Catholic countries.

Has not a treatise of canon law by Cabassutius been recently edited, expressly for the use of the College of Maynooth?—An edition of that work has been lately given, of which the College has taken 100 copies. The edition was not given expressly for the use of the College.

By whom?—By Mr. Coyne.

Who was the editor; who corrected the press?—I really do not know; I suppose Mr. Coyne employed some person to correct the press; he was the editor, and the work was published by subscription.

Have you observed the editor's dedication prefixed to that class book of canon law, and addressed to Dr. Curtis?—I have read the dedication.

Do you know who wrote that dedication?—I do not; I never asked who wrote it.

Have you ever made it a subject of observation at Maynooth?—I have not; neither have I observed that it excited the surprize or curiosity of others.

Have you observed how Dr. Curtis is designated in that dedication?—The whole of the address is as follows:

Do you consider that Dr. Curtis is the person to whom the title of Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of all Ireland properly belongs?—I think that title belongs to him in the Roman Catholic church.

But there are no such words as Romano Catholico, or of similar import in the dedication, but the titles of Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of all Ireland are there applied to him without any restriction or qualification?—I suppose those words are implied in the dedication, as he is universally known to be Roman Catholic Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of Ireland.

In what sense do you consider him to be the Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of all Ireland?—I consider him to be Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of all Ireland in the Roman Catholic church, but not of course in the Established church; as the law of the land does not constitute him such. However, I believe he is known and acknowledged by the Government of the country under that title.

In the dedication prefixed to the class book of canon law, edited and used at Maynooth, the title there given to Dr. Curtis is simply Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of all Ireland; the question is, to which of the two individuals, Lord John Beresford or Dr. Curtis, do you conceive that title properly to belong?—I consider that both have a right to claim that

* No Pope has ever claimed this right jure divino; the see of Rome claims it merely as a power, which, considering the nature of church property, and the Pope's high station as head of the church, it was reasonable and expedient should be conceded to him by princes. Some princes acceded to his claim, others did not; but those even who refused, pay great deference and respect to the representations of the see of Rome relative to church property.

that title, but in different respects and on different principles; the one being recognized as such by the Roman Catholic church and instituted by the Pope; and the other being received as such in the Protestant church, and constituted by the Government of the country. With regard to the nature of the powers of both, of course they are very different; the powers of the Roman Catholic Archbishop are purely spiritual, because he receives none from the state, the source of all temporal authority; the powers of the other are of a temporal nature, so far as the law of the lands invests him with them.

Do you consider that there is any thing spiritual, properly speaking, that attaches itself to the character of that Primate of all Ireland who is recognised by the law?—To answer the question in a satisfactory manner, I must distinguish two sorts of spiritual power in bishops; the one is called the power of order, and the other that of jurisdiction. The former is imparted by consecration, and is never lost or delegated; the latter is conferred by the lawful authorities governing the church of Christ, and may be lost and delegated by the possessor. With regard to the power of order, the Protestant Archbishop of Armagh may possess it; this depends entirely upon the validity of his ordination and consecration, a point on which I do not presume to decide. With respect to the power of jurisdiction or mission, he receives none from the Roman Catholic church, and therefore (conceiving as we do, the Roman Catholic church to possess the authority given by Christ to the Apostles and their lawful successors), we must hold that he possesses no other jurisdiction or mission than what he receives from the Government of the country.

Do you consider that he has or has not any valid spiritual authority?—I can only repeat the same answer. If his ordination and consecration be valid, he possesses the spiritual power of order; but spiritual jurisdiction is not a necessary attendant on valid ordination, but must be received from the lawful authority descending from Christ through the Apostles; and I must therefore repeat, that I consider him to possess no other jurisdiction, either spiritual or temporal, but what he derives from the Government of the country*.

According to your ideas either as a Roman Catholic, or as a Professor of canon law at Maynooth, can there be two Archbishops of Armagh at the same time, both possessing spiritual authority?—There cannot be two Archbishops of Armagh, both deriving their jurisdiction from the Roman Catholic church; but there may be two, one of whom derives his jurisdiction from the Roman Catholic church, in spiritual matters, and the other deriving his powers from the Government of the country; those two things are not incompatible.

Do you conceive that the Government of the country is competent to convey spiritual authority?—I do not; if by spiritual authority you mean authority derived from Christ; the Government is not the medium instituted by Christ for conveying spiritual power.

Do you consider that spiritual authority can be conveyed to a Bishop from any other source than from the Roman Catholic church?—I do not, unless by spiritual authority you mean that conferred by the state for the government of the Established church; I admit in that sense the Government is the source of spiritual authority.

Is it not the necessary consequence that that Archbishop of Armagh whom the law recognises, has in your view no spiritual authority whatever?—He possesses of course, according to our principles, no spiritual authority derived from Christ through the Apostles and their lawful successors.

By authority do you mean jurisdiction, or do you take any distinction between jurisdiction and power of order?—By authority, in my last answer, I meant the power of jurisdiction. I have pointed out the two powers which we distinguish in bishops, that of order, and that of jurisdiction. If the ordination and consecration of the Protestant Archbishop of Armagh were valid, of course he possesses the spiritual powers that flow from order; but according to the principles of our church, a mission from the church of Christ is moreover required, and of course we cannot allow that he possesses that mission, being cut off from the source from which alone it flows.

Pray define what you mean by mission in the last answer?—By mission we understand a spiritual power of governing the church, conferred by lawful authority; this power is expressed in the words of Christ; when commissioning the Apostles to preach the Gospel, he said, "Sicut misit me, vivens pater et ego mitto vos."

Has not a parochial priest a mission?—He has, derived from, and dependent on, his bishop.

A curate?—Yes, the curate also, and in the same manner, but more limited and precarious.

In what sense do you mean that a curate governs the church?—We distinguish two sorts of jurisdiction, one is in foro externo, and the other is in foro interno; the jurisdiction in foro externo is confined to those who are constituted governors of the church, Popes, Bishops, and their delegates; the jurisdiction in foro interno extends also to parish priests and curates by delegation, and it is only in this sense they possess a mission or jurisdiction.

Pray describe in what sense you consider the Primate of Ireland to differ from a lay-man?—I consider that the Protestant Primate of Ireland differs from a lay-man, first in the power of order, if his ordination and consecration were valid; and secondly, in the power of jurisdiction granted him by the law of the land to govern the Protestant church, in which he is considered to possess also spiritual jurisdiction.

Pray

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

* I beg to add that this seems also to be conformable to the principles of the Protestant church; the bishops whereof, at least in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, testified at their appointment that they received their jurisdiction from her Majesty alone. This appears from the oath taken by bishops at that period, as given by Dodd in his Ecclesiastical History.

Pray define exactly what you mean by his power of order, as applied to the Primate of Ireland, recognised by law?—By the power of order, I mean that which is conferred by the sacrament of holy orders. All who validly receive the sacrament of holy orders receive thereby a spiritual power, which is inseparable from the character impressed by that sacrament; and as this character is indelible and cannot be lost, neither can the subject lose the essential power connected with it; this power relates merely to spiritual matters, and does not extend to the government of the church. In virtue of the power of order the person ordained confers sacraments, and discharges all other duties of the sacred ministry, that do not require jurisdiction.

Supposing the ordination or consecration of the Archbishop of Armagh to be good, could he, as a Protestant prelate, confer holy orders?—I have already stated, that in virtue of his ordination he can confer all the sacraments that do not require jurisdiction, among which we reckon that of holy orders.

Does your last answer mean to imply, that his ordination was in your opinion valid?—I have mentioned already that I do not presume to pronounce on that point.

Was there ever an instance in which the Roman Catholic church acknowledged orders that were conferred in the Protestant church?—I do not recollect any particular instance, in which the Roman Catholic church ever recognised the validity of the ordination conferred in the Protestant church; but I have already stated the principle that such ordination, if conferred by a bishop validly ordained himself, and employing due matter and form, would most certainly be valid in the Roman Catholic church.

The question was put as a criterion of what the real practical opinion of the Roman Catholic church is, as to the point, whether the Protestant bishops are validly ordained, or not?—There are Protestant bishops in different countries—in one instance the ordination may be valid, and in another not; it might be valid in Germany and not valid in England, according to circumstances. The validity of the Anglican ordination has been always questioned, and is questioned to this day; a great deal has been written on both sides, and the matter still remains doubtful among Catholics.

You mean questioned as a matter of fact?—Merely as a matter of fact, because for the validity of any sacrament we require that the matter and form, instituted by Christ, should be applied by a proper minister; for the validity of baptism, for example, we require that the minister who baptizes should employ the matter and form instituted by Christ. The same principle applies to the sacrament of orders; if the minister, instituted by Christ, ordains, and if such minister employs the proper matter and form, orders are validly conferred; but if even a lawful minister should not employ the proper matter and form, there is no sacrament conferred, and the subject is not ordained. Now applying this principle to the Anglican ordination, the first question that occurs is, whether the minister who ordained the first bishops, was the minister instituted by Christ, that is, whether he himself was a lawfully ordained bishop; the second question is, whether the person ordaining employed the proper matter and form in ordination. Doubts have arisen on these two points, and hence it is still a question with us, whether the Anglican ordination be valid or not.

Is there any doubt as to the fact, in the same manner as to the validity of the ordinations at the time of the Reformation in Germany?—I cannot state positively whether such a doubt arose with regard to Germany, but I am inclined to think it did.

Are priests ordained by Lutherans or others in Germany, admitted as priests in the Roman Catholic church without a fresh ordination, if they conform?—I cannot give a positive answer, but I am inclined to think they are not.

Are you aware of any distinction between the Church of England and any other episcopal church, in that respect?—I know of none. I am inclined to think, that even in Germany the Lutheran priests would not be considered validly ordained; because I know it is a principle of Lutheran doctrine, that ordination is not absolutely necessary to constitute a true minister of Christ; and this I conceive is also the doctrine of the Protestant church; for Burnet, in his work on the Thirty-nine Articles, states as the doctrine of the Protestant church, that ordination is required merely, as we say, necessitate præcepti, which means that ordination was commanded by Christ, and ought to be observed when it can; but, however, that it is not absolutely necessary to constitute a true minister of the gospel, and that in extraordinary cases ministers may be appointed and possess all powers without the form of ordination.

Pray explain what is meant by the matter of the ordination as distinguished from the form?—The form of any sacrament consists in certain words; the matter consists in material elements, or sensible signs instituted by Christ. The matter of the sacrament of orders, according to the doctrine of the Roman Catholic church, consists in the delivery of the instruments employed in the sacrifice of the mass, and in the imposition of hands.

And the form consists altogether in the use of particular words?—Yes, in the form of words expressed by the bishop. We consider the matters and forms of all the sacraments to have been instituted by Christ, and consequently that any substantial alteration in either would render the sacrament void.

There remains one more bull, to the 15th section of which we would beg to draw your attention; it was issued in the year 1741, and is to be found in the Bullarium of Benedict XIV.—it is now cited merely for the sake of the 15th section, which excommunicates among other persons all those who have “procured directly or indirectly, under any pretext, as also such as have passed, enacted and published statutes, ordinances, legal enactments, or any other decrees generally or particularly, from any cause or under any pretext whatsoever; and also of whatsoever custom or privilege, or under any other circumstances whatsoever, or may have adopted them when passed and enacted, whereby ecclesiastical liberty is destroyed, or in any respect injured, infringed, or in any other way restricted; or whereby our rights and those of the aforementioned See, and of any churches whatsoever are prejudiced in any way directly or indirectly, tacitly or expressly";—is not this an exercise of spiritual power for temporal purposes?—This is the celebrated bull called Cæna Domini, it was for many centuries published in Rome each year, on Holy Thursday; the publication of it has been suspended since the time of Clement XIV. it was last published in the year 1773.

Was not a similar bull issued by the late Pope?—No; I understand it has not been published since the time of Clement XIV.

Do you think it will never again be published?—I think not, as the publication has been interrupted during the reign of the last two Popes, and has not been renewed by the present.

What should prevent the present Pope or his successor publishing it next year?—It depends entirely on his option, but I think it likely he may be influenced by the same motives as his predecessors, and not renew the publication of it. The See of Rome knows well that it has always been odious to the greater part of the Catholic countries of Europe, and the publication of it has been therein constantly resisted; in its origin the publication of it would appear to have been confined to the Pope's States alone, or perhaps to the States of Italy. Pius V. towards the close of the sixteenth century, endeavoured to make it general, and ordered the publication of it in all Catholic countries; but he was not obeyed; on the contrary he was resisted in the greater part of those countries, and chiefly in France, the Republic of Venice, Spain and Germany, in all which countries that bull never has been published, nor considered obligatory; it has never been received in Ireland, and consequently has no authority in this country.

Does it not distinctly avow the principle on the part of every Pope who has issued it annually, as you stated it, for some centuries, that any person exercising the power of legislation in any manner that may be detrimental to the Roman Catholic church, thereby is a proper object of spiritual censure, and incurs excommunication?—I have repeatedly alluded to the co-operation that existed in Catholic countries between the civil and ecclesiastical authorities; the civil law supported the canon, and the ecclesiastical authority enforced the observance of the civil law by censures; the censures pronounced by the Pope in that bull, or in any bull whatsoever enforcing the observance of a civil obligation, can only affect those countries where the civil laws impose such obligation, on the principle that the Pope has no authority to interfere in civil matters; the Pope pronounces censures against those who should in any way injure the rights or immunities of the church; but these rights and immunities were established by the civil law in Catholic countries, and the censure of the Pope merely corroborated that law, and enforced the observance of it; it added a spiritual obligation to the civil that already existed, and in any country where the civil law did not impose that obligation, the Pope's censure could not affect the subjects.

You observe, it is particularly directed against those who co-operate in enacting laws or statutes that may prejudice the authority of the See of Rome; now, admitting fully that the expression of such a sentiment can have no civil power in those countries to which you have referred, do you conceive it impossible that it might operate in the shape of a principle in the mind of any Roman Catholic legislator, seeing that such a sentiment has been annually, for centuries, as you have stated, promulgated by the successive Pontiffs who have filled the chair of the Roman See?—I have often had occasion to state, that in the middle ages Popes did claim a right of interfering in temporal matters from a confusion of ideas that arose from the mixture of temporal and spiritual powers; but that for a length of time the boundaries of those two powers have been ascertained and clearly distinguished; so that no Catholic, at present, acknowledges that the Pope has any right to control the civil legislature in issuing laws; with regard to the bull before us, I do not consider myself at all bound to vindicate the principles it may set forth, for the reasons already assigned, that this bull was originally intended for the Popes temporal dominions, and has never been received in many Catholic countries. It may be well to observe, however, that in all Catholic countries the immunities of the Catholic church were established by civil and municipal laws, and therefore the legislature, without just cause, could not repeal those laws. I conceive that the Popes, who sanctioned this bull, meant merely to prevent the arbitrary interference of the civil legislature with the immunities of the church.

Does not the History of England before the Reformation, particularly with regard to the statutes of Provisor and Premunire; does not the history of France, does not the history of Spain, does not the history of Portugal, does not the history of Germany, and the history of the practice of the different Catholic states in Europe, distinctly prove that the Catholic legislatures have not only not recognised the principle laid down in that bull, but firmly and steadily resisted it, and that the repetition of it by the Pope, so far from inducing them to obey it, has induced them the more firmly to resist it?—Such is the case; and I conceive it is on those grounds, that the late Popes have desisted altogether from the publication of it.

Supposing that bull to be received in this country, would you, as the director of the conscience of an individual, think it reconcileable with your duty, to advise a Catholic to co-operate with the legislature in promoting the interests of the English church?—I would consider, though it were received in the Irish Catholic church, that a Roman Catholic could co-operate with the legislature in promoting the temporal interests of the Protestant church, as established by law; because the bull could bind him only with regard to spiritual matters, and and could impose no obligation on him of a temporal nature. The Protestant Church is a corporation established by law, and therefore, any Roman Catholic might co-operate with the legislature in promoting the interests of the Protestant Church, in this respect.

In the preceding question the word interests, did not mean the temporal interests, but the influence and prevalence of the English Church?—When there is a question of the interests of the Protestant Church, I must always beg leave to distinguish between its civil and its spiritual interests; I conceive that no Roman Catholic can conscientiously and consistently with the principles of his religion, co-operate in promoting the spiritual interests of the Protestant Church, which are in opposition to his own; but the spiritual interests of the Protestant Church, are totally distinct from its interests as by law established; in which point of view alone I conceive, a civil legislature can contemplate it. For the power of a civil legislature can never extend to spiritual matters, which belong solely to the church.

Are we to understand from your answer, that although persons of one religion cannot conscientiously aid in extending a religion which they conscientiously believe to be erroneous, yet if there be a church which professes a religion by law established, clothed with civil rights, they may and it would be their duty to support those civil rights so given by law?—Most certainly; a Roman Catholic is bound in conscience to respect all the civil rights of the Protestant Church, as established by law; and in this it is evident there can be nothing inconsistent with his principles, as we see the Catholic government of France, not only protecting, but even conferring temporal benefits on the Protestant Church in that country; the same may be said of Austria, and of other Catholic countries where the Protestant religion is not merely tolerated but protected and endowed.

In a preceding part of the evidence reference has been had to a letter, which was written from the Cardinal Prefect of the Propaganda, to the late Dr. Troy, in 1791, in which it is stated, that the see of Rome never taught that faith is not to be kept with the Heterodox, that no oath to kings separated from the Catholic communion can be valid, that it is lawful for the bishop of Rome to authorize the invasion of their rights; we wish you to explain one of the decretals in reference to those opinions; assuring you that the question does not seek to impute those opinions to any individuals who disclaim them; the canon to which reference is now made, is in the decretals of Gregory IX. 5th book, 8th title, and the 16th chapter, page 363; the rubric prefixed to the canon is in these words, “Liberantur ab omni obligatione qui hereticis tenebantur adstricti,” “Capitulum XVI.” which we would translate thus, “Those who were held bound to heretics, are freed from every obligation.” The canon itself is a very short one, “Absolutos se noverint a debito fidelitatis domini et totius obsequii, quicunque lapsis manifeste in heresim aliquo pacto quacunque firmitate vallato tenebantur adstricti,” which we would thus translate, “Let all those who were held bound by any agreement, by whatsoever conditions it was secured to those who have manifestly lapsed into heresy, know that they are absolved from the debt of fealty to their Lord, and of all sorts of obedience?”—This decretal seems to have been taken from the fourth Council of Lateran, and is to be explained on the same principles, which I have already applied to another decree of the same Council regarding heretics; at that period heretics were condemned by the civil law; all Europe was Catholic, and heretics no where formed a society, were no where tolerated. It is well known that the Justinian code discovered at Amalfi, towards the commencement of the twelfth century, was universally adopted at that period, as the basis of the municipal laws in the different countries of Europe; it is also well known that those laws condemned heretics, and even in some cases punished them capitally; they also declared that inferior lords, who abetted and supported heretics or embraced heresy themselves, should forfeit their states to the emperor. Now, the Pope merely enforces by his censures, the observance of the civil laws regarding heretics then binding throughout the empire; the Pope does not make the law, the law was already made and adopted by all the states of Europe; he merely enforces the observance of those laws by his censures; on that principle of co-operation, so often mentioned, of the ecclesiastical and civil power, particularly at this period*.

Pray state what leads you to the conclusion, that the decretal in question is taken from the Council of Lateran, seeing there is nothing that we perceive in the book which would suggest such a supposition?—If the Commissioners will please to refer to the 9th chapter of the same title, they will find that it is attributed to Innocent III.; and the following chapters, that conclude with the word “Idem” are thereby referred to the same source; now, it is well known that Innocent III. issued 73 decrees in the Council of Lateran, and that in the canon law, they are sometimes attributed to Innocent, and sometimes to the Council of Lateran.

We now beg to refer you to one of the decretals, from the Decretum Gratiani, second part, 7th question, and the 15th cause, where the same principle seems to be asserted by the Pope, expressly negating that he is adopting the civil law, and asserting that he is exercising it by his own apostolical authority; the words are “Nos sanctorum predecessorum nostrorum statuta tenentes eos qui excommunicatis fidelitate aut sacramento constricti sunt, Apostolica auctoritate a juramento absolvimus, et ne sibi fidelitatem observent omnibus modis prohibemus quousque ipsi ad satisfactionem veniant,” which we should thus thus translate; "We, observing the statutes of our sacred predecessors, absolve by our Apostolic authority from their oath all those who are bound to excommunicated persons by fealty or oath, and prohibit in every sort of way that they should observe fidelity or fealty ("fidelitatem") to them, until they make such satisfaction"—The present decretal relates to the effects of excommunication. Urban II. was consulted, whether subjects could continue their services to lords who had incurred the censure of excommunication; he answers in the negative. It is well known, that the censure of excommunication was attended and is still attended with civil effects, sanctioned by the state; the censure as emanating from the spiritual authority can merely have spiritual effects; but the civil law imparts civil effects to it. The civil effects of excommunication have been different at different periods, and it is well known that in the middle ages, any prince who fell under excommunication, was considered to have forfeited the right of allegiance from his subjects; so dismal were these effects, that Gregory VII. himself, modified them, and pointed out different cases in which it was lawful for subjects to communicate with their princes, or servants with their masters: so that the principle, I have so often recurred to, is also applicable in this case, that the civil and ecclesiastical authorities went hand in hand, and that the Pope enjoined nothing that was not already enjoined by the civil law, as it existed at that period. However, I must repeat, that I do not at all consider myself called upon to vindicate all the decrees that have been issued at different periods, any more than a British subject finds himself called upon to vindicate all the laws that may be found on the statute book of England. I have already repeatedly stated, that in the middle ages, such a confusion of temporal and ecclesiastical power prevailed, that they both often mutually infringed upon each other. But no inference can reasonably be drawn from instances of such infringement, that would apply to the present political state of the world, so different in every respect from that which it bore in the middle ages.

* Moreover, in the 13th century, all Europe was Catholic, and therefore this law could not be directed against heretical princes, as none such existed, but was intended to prevent heresy.

But do you not think, upon a reference to those canons, that the time has been when the see of Rome has taught those doctrines denied in the letter last alluded to, namely, that no faith is to be kept with heretics, and that no oath taken to kings separated from the Catholic communion can be valid?—No such inference can be drawn from any of the decretals adduced, or from any that can be adduced; the church of Rome never taught such doctrine, nor did any Pope ever inculcate such horrid principles; on the contrary, the church of Rome has condemned that doctrine in the Council of Constance; one of the principles of John Huss, was, that authority and grace were essentially connected, and that when persons in authority fell into sin, they forfeited all right to obedience from their subjects. The council condemned the doctrine generally; he also taught that it was lawful to violate oaths in order to promote the welfare of religion; this doctrine was condemned in the council of Constance, and the condemnation surely implies, that an oath is not to be violated to serve religion, and therefore, when taken even to heretics, in lawful things, that it is to be observed.

Do not the two canons which have been cited to you, such as they are, still constitute a portion of the Corpus Juris Canonici?—They are placed in the collection which is known under the name of the Corpus Juris Canonici, as the statute "de Heretico comburendo" though repealed, may be found in a collection of English statutes, but I have already explained how far the different decretals may be obligatory; and applying the principle to the decretals now before us, it appears evident that they cannot be considered obligatory in any country where heretics are not condemned by the civil law.

Did not all the parts of that book to which your attention has been hitherto called, exist before the Reformation?—Most certainly, before the 12th century in which Gratian made this collection.

Are you aware that bishop Gibson in his codex, gives the whole of that part of the canon law which existed in England before the Reformation, whatever it was, as well that part which is applicable only to the Roman Catholic church as it then existed, as that which applies to the present Established church; and in that code of canon law so given by him, none of these passages are set forth as having ever been received in England?—I understand that bishop Gibson gives this statement with regard to England; and the principle, which I have so often applied to decretals is, that they are only binding in those countries where they have been received or promulgated; and with regard to decretals that relate to civil matters in any way, that they are only obligatory when supported by the municipal law.

Could you distinguish in any manner between such decretals as you suppose to have been received in Ireland, and such as you suppose not to have been received?—I have already stated the general principle on which we can solve this question, and all other questions that may be proposed, with regard to the obligation or reception of decretals, which I must beg leave to repeat. The decretals which relate in any way to civil matters are obligatory only in those countries where they are supported by the civil law. Decretals which relate purely to spiritual matters are obligatory only in those countries in which they have been promulgated, and are received in practice. Now as the civil law of this country does not sanction any of the decretals that relate to civil matters, the consequence is that none of those decretals are obligatory in this country. With regard to the decretals which relate purely to spiritual matters, I consider that any of them that are not inconsistent with the laws and usages of the Roman Catholic church in Ireland, are there obligatory among Catholics.

In a work intitled "De Catholicis Institutionibus" written by Simanca, a Roman Catholic bishop, the following passages occur, "Ad pœnam quoque pertinet, et hereticorum odium, quod fides illis data servanda non est. Nam si tyrannis, piratis, et ceteris publicis prædonibus," nibus, quia corpus occidunt, fides servanda non est, longè minus hereticis pertinacibus, quia occidunt animas;" and a little further on it is added "Jure igitur heretici quidam gravissimi Concilii Constantiensis judicio legitima flamma concremati sunt, quamvis promissa illis securitas fuisset. Beatus quoque Thomas censet hereticum indocilem prodendum esse judicibus, non obstante fide, et juramento quibus Catholicum astrinxerit." Concil. Constant. Canone 6 &c.; which passages we should thus translate "It pertains also to the punishment and odium of heretics, that faith given to them is not to be kept; for if faith is not to be kept with tyrants, pirates and other public robbers, who slay the body, much less is it to be kept with obstinate heretics who slay the soul." "Rightly therefore were certain heretics consigned to lawful flames by the judgment of the grave Council of Constance, although their safety had been promised to them; and blessed Thomas likewise holds that an intractable heretic is to be delivered up to the judges, notwithstanding the faith and oath by which he may have bound a Catholic,"—and reference is made by the author to the Council of Constance, 6th canon, among other authorities. Does it not appear from these passages, that the author lays it down distinctly as a doctrine, which he understood to be that of the Roman Catholic church, that faith is not to be kept with heretics generally, and that he considered and understood that this doctrine was expressly to be inferred from the canons of one of the general councils?—I do not consider myself called upon to reconcile and vindicate the doctrine advanced by particular authors at different periods and in different countries; we know that there is no doctrine so absurd that has not found abettors, perhaps of every religion. With regard to the author quoted, there is very little known about his character. Doctor Hays in his defence of the Council of Constance, refutes the assertions of Mr. Drummond, who in support of them adduced the authority of this same Simanca. The Doctor states, that it was with very great difficulty he could find in biographical dictionaries any account whatsoever of this author; that however he at length found some account of him, stating merely that such a man had lived, I think in the 14th or 15th century, and had been a professor of canon law in some university in Spain. I consider it unreasonable to be called on to vindicate the assertions of an obscure author who lived at so remote a period*.

Collier in his Historical Dictionary speaks of the author as follows: "Jas. Simanca, Bishop of Bajados, was a Spaniard, and professed the civil and canon laws in the University of Salamanca. He was one of the King's council at Valladolid, and afterwards for his merit, preferred to the Bishoprick of Bajados. He was a very good divine and lawyer, and wrote a great deal in both faculties; the most considerable of his works are "De dignitate Episcopis," and "De Catholicis Institutionibus;" this last being the work from which the passage was read. Does it not appear from that statement, that the writer was a man of some eminence in the Spanish church?—If Collier's account be correct, and if the author quoted be the same alluded to in the Historical Dictionary, from which the quotation is taken, he was a man of eminence. I feel certain, however, that no author possessing such character and such qualifications, belonging to the Roman Catholic church, ever advanced such a principle.

You will observe, that the question originally put, was not as to the justness of the sentiment, but whether it had not been expressly and avowedly laid down in the passage quoted; be so good as to consult the work from which the quotation has been read, and to make such further answer as you may think proper?—I will.

Have you ever seen the work of Simanca?—I have never seen the work, and I have never seen it quoted by any of our divines or canonists; and from what I have already quoted from Doctor Hays's defence of the Council of Constance, it appears that the author is scarcely known among our divines.

Supposing the work authentic, do you conceive that the passage in question could be looked upon, by any Roman Catholic, as of any more force, than any wicked principle to be found in any Protestant work, which the Protestants were charged with holding?—I would consider that the Protestant and Catholic are just on the same footing in this respect, and that neither is obliged to account for principles that may have been advanced by private members of their respective churches.

You observe that the questions do not impute those opinions to any one; the question is, whether those doctrines were ever taught in the Roman Catholic church?—By doctrines taught in the Roman Catholic church, we understand doctrines sanctioned by the Roman Catholic church, or held by the majority of her divines, and approved generally by the members of the Roman Catholic church; now the author in question is not known at the present age among Roman Catholics, nor can we well trace the period of his existence. I think I may confidently assert, that not a single Catholic divine, who quotes his authority, can be produced, and consequently he cannot be brought forward as delivering the sentiments of the Roman Catholic church; nor can any inference prejudicial to her doctrines be deduced from his writings. However, on seeing the author, if any such exist, I have not

* Were I to impute to Protestants the tenet, that "faith is not to be kept with Catholics," because Dr. Dopping, bishop of Meath, preached that doctrine in Christ church, Dublin, before the justices, the Sunday after they had signed the articles of Limerick, I should be reproached with unfairness, in making a body accountable for the sentiments of an individual, who had been contradicted by many learned members belonging to that body; is it not equally, or more unfair, to continue to reproach Catholics with a doctrine which they daily abjure in the oath of allegiance, because some obscure writer may have advanced it in an age of darkness and bigotry.

not the smallest doubt of being able to shew, that he never advanced the principles attributed to him*.

Pray

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

* I have consulted the work from which the quotation was taken, and find the author's character corresponds to the account given of him by Collier. He was a learned juristconsult of the 16th century; and for his learning and merits was successively promoted to two bishopricks in Spain, under Philip the Second; but I well predicted, that a writer of such eminence could never have advanced the false and unsocial principle, that "faith is never to be kept with heretics." That work was written for the instruction and government of the officers of the inquisition, as appears from the dedication to Philip the Second, which is inserted at the beginning, and in which the author thus expresses himself: "Haud ingratum tibi fore putavi, si qualiscumque has institutiones tuo nomini dicarem, nuper a me in eorum potissimum usum elucubratas, qui erant patris tui Caroli maximi, tuaque voluntate, sacro S. Inquisitionis Officio proficiendi . . . de impiis omnibus religionis hostibus conscripsi, et inquirendi, judicandi, et puniendi, rationem explicavi." Which may be thus translated—"I conceived it would not be unacceptable, that I should dedicate to your Majesty these Institutions, which I lately wrote, principally for the use of those officers who were appointed by your father Charles the Great, and by yourself, to preside over the holy office of the inquisition . . . I have written of all the wicked enemies of religion, and pointed out the mode of inquiring, judging and punishing." This circumstance accounts for the work being so little known, having been confined solely to the officers of the inquisition. In the chapter from which this celebrated quotation is taken, the author treats of the different punishments inflicted on heretics by the divine, ecclesiastical, and civil laws of all countries and ages. After examining the divine, he proceeds to the human laws, and endeavours to show, N° 36, that heretics may be punished; N° 42, that heretics may be capitally punished by human laws; N° 50, that the laws may condemn them to be burnt; N° 52, the one in question, that the laws may also punish them, by decreeing that faith plighted to them, or in other words, engagements entered into with them, be not binding. That this is the meaning of the author, appears from the words, "It also pertains to the punishment of heretics, that faith, &c." The reason, then, why faith is not to be kept with them is, because the law has sentenced them to this punishment, and not because the law of nature or of religion require it. Neither does the author mean, that the positive laws had decreed, even in countries where the inquisition was established, that faith should not be kept, in any case, with heretics, but only that the compacts with them, of aiding or abetting their designs of subverting religion, should not be considered binding. This appears from a sentence, omitted in the quotation, which immediately precedes the words "jure igitur," and is as follows:—"At grave est fidem fallere, verumtamen (ut Marius Salomonius ait) promissa contra Christum, fides si præstetur, utique perfidia est." In English—"But (as Marius Salomonius says) it is a heinous crime to break faith; notwithstanding, faith pledged against Christ, if fulfilled, becomes perfidy." The author, therefore, supposes the promise made, or compact entered into with the heretics, to have been injurious to Christ. This also appears evidently from the following Number 53, where I find these words "quamobrem fides illis data, etiam juramento firmata, contra publicum bonum, contra salutem animarum, contra jura divina et humana, nullo modo servanda. In malis promissis (inquit Isidorus) rescinde fidem: et juramentum non debet esse vinculum iniquitatis." "Wherefore the faith pledged to them (heretics) even confirmed by an oath, contrary to the public good, contrary to the salvation of souls, contrary to all laws, divine and human, is not to be observed. In wicked promises (says Isidorus) rescind your plighted faith, and an oath can never be a bond of iniquity." Here it clearly appears, the principle on which the author supports that faith, in certain circumstances, is not to be kept with heretics, is, that an unlawful promise is not to be fulfilled, and that an oath cannot bind to do what is iniquitous. The principle, I conceive, cannot be denied, however he may have erred in the application. But what places the author's meaning beyond all doubt, and shows to an evidence, that when he asserts that faith is not to be kept with heretics, he speaks of the compacts entered into with them contrary to the laws of the land, and the laws of God, and not of all engagements whatever made with them, in any circumstances, which is what he says in N° 54 of the same chapter. "Si tamen fides data esset a principe, vel publica potestate, exacte servanda esset; si modo quod addixisset non sit de illo genere rerum quas lex, aut inspirata, aut naturalis, vetat præstare. Non enim videtur esse vetitum eorum quæ ad naturæ aut gentium jus attinent habere cum heretico commercium, præsertim quod incolumi religione haberi possit . . . Quod tamen privatus, invito superiore, servare non teneretur; publica namque auctoritas, nullius partis suæ, sive magnæ sive parvæ, sed a Dei voluntate imperioque pendet; contra ab istius imperio pendet omnium et singulorum, qui sub eo comprehenduntur, voluntates." Which may be translated as follows:—"If, however, faith should be pledged to them, by a prince, or by any public authority, it ought to be punctually observed, provided the engagement be not repugnant to the divine or natural law, for commerce with heretics does not appear to be one of the things forbidden by the law of nature, or by the law of nations, especially when it may be held with safety to religion . . . This, however, a private individual, contrary to the command of his superior, would not be bound to do, for the public authority, in the exercise of its functions, great or small, is subject to no controul but that of God alone; whereas, on its command depends the will of all and every individual who are subject to it." These words require no comment, and demonstrate how unjustly this author and his religion have been so often calumniated, and even very lately in the British Critic, by garbled extracts from his works, and foul misrepresentations of his principles.

Note by the Commissioners.—The whole passage from Simancha, above referred to, is as follows:—

Extractum a libro de Catholicis Institutionibus Jacobi, 1569.

52. Ad pœnam quoque pertinet et hereticorum odium, quod fides illis data servanda non est—nam si tyrannis, piratis, et ceteris publicis prædonibus, quia corpus occidunt, fides servanda non est, longè minus hereticis pertinacibus, quia occidunt animas. Porro, fieri non potest incolumibus viris hujus modi, quin simplices fidelium animæ capiantur. At grave est fidem fallere: verumtamen (ut Marius Salomonius ait) promissa contra Christum, fides si præstetur, utique perfidia est. Jure igitur heretici quidam gravissimi concilii Constantiensis judicio legitima flamma concremati sunt, quamvis promissa illis securitas fuisset. Beatus quoque Thomas censet hæreticum indocilem prodendum esse judicibus, non obstante fide, et juramento quibus Catholicum astrinxerit. Concilium Constantiense, Canone 6. Salomonius in c. 2. s. Exactis de Orig. Jur. Tho. 2 2. questio 70, art. 1, et questio 40, articul 3. Cicero, lib. 3. Offici. cap.

Pray, however, now see, whether a writer of the highest authority has not asserted the same principle—we refer to the Commentary printed in the margin of the decretals of Gregory the Ninth, in which we find this observation upon the words, “absolutos aliquo pacto,” in the canon lately cited to you. The commentary or gloss which is there set forth is as follows: “Ergo si sub pœna aliquis tenetur eis aliquid solvere certâ die, licet non solvat, non incidit in pœnam, et eodem modo, si per juramentum: quod est verum; quia in illa obligatione et juramento tacitè sub-intelligitur, si talis permanserit cui communicare liceat,” which we should translate thus:—“Therefore if any one is bound under a penalty to them (meaning heretics) to pay something by a certain day, although he should fail in payment, he does not incur the penalty; and in the same manner if he have sworn to do it, because in that obligation, and that oath, there is tacitly understood this; namely, provided the person remains in such a state that it is lawful to communicate with him?”—In answer to the question I say, this is a glossary on one of the decretals regarding the effects of excommunication. I have already stated, that the effects of excommunication depended on the civil as well as the ecclesiastical law, and this is confirmed by the glossary before us, which refers expressly to the civil law for the confirmation of the doctrine it delivers; it asserts that a debtor is not bound to pay his creditor under sentence of excommunication, on the principle that he is prohibited to communicate with him, and this, though he should have been bound under oath; it is very clear that the civil law can, in punishment of a crime, deprive the creditor of the right of exacting his debts; on the same principle that by confiscation it often deprives him of the property he has in hand; and if the civil law, at the period in question, should have declared that excommunicated persons forfeited such right, and could not claim their debts, the debtors were, of course, freed from their obligation; this is the only inference that can be drawn from the glossary before us, which merely points out this effect of excommunication, but does not by any means advance the general proposition that faith is not to be kept with heretics*.

Will you state who “Bernard” is, who is signed at the end of it?—Bernardus is the author of the Glossary on the decretals of Gregory IX.; he was a Juris-consult of Parma.

* I have already had occasion to allude to excommunication, as it now stands in the Protestant church in this country. I will now beg leave to further specify the effects of that censure, as given by Blackstone, as they will show that excommunication is at this day in the Protestant church what it was in ours, in the twelfth century. “He (an excommunicated person) cannot serve upon juries, cannot be a witness in any court, and, which is the worst of all, he cannot bring an action, either real or personal, to recover land, or money due to him. Nor is this the whole, for if within forty days after the sentence has been published in the church, the offender does not submit and abide by the sentence of the spiritual court, the bishop may certify such contempt to the King in Chancery. . . . and the sheriff thereupon shall take the offender, and imprison him in the county gaol till he is reconciled to the church.”

Appendix, N^o 34.Examination of
Rev.

N. Slevin, D. D.

14 December 1826.

The Glossaries annexed in the Corpus Juris stand on private authority, and are not generally to be much relied on.

On a former day you said with respect to the canons which regard heretics, that those which were productive of temporal effects were not enforced in Ireland, you added, "with regard to doctrinal matters I have said, that all definitions of the church, condemning the errors of the said sects, constitute a matter of faith, and therefore are received in Ireland;" what do you conceive, in fine, to be the result of the whole canon law on the subject of heretics, with reference to Ireland?—The canons of the church, regarding faith and morals, abstract altogether from the state or place in which the heretics may be, and merely consider their doctrine; they condemn the erroneous doctrine, without considering the persons, or the condition of the persons that may have advanced it. The doctrine of our church, therefore, regarding faith and morals, cannot affect persons residing in Ireland in any particular way—it extends in the same manner and in the same degree to all Catholics. The canon law, which, properly speaking, is a positive law, merely relating to church government, can affect Protestants only in a spiritual way, which to them will appear ideal and imaginary; and can consequently cause them no uneasiness*.

Amongst the decretals, we find one of which we should wish to know from you, whether it is now a part of the canon law of Ireland; it appears to have no reference to temporal matters, but exclusively to matters of faith; it is this, "Firmissime tene, et nullatenus dubites omnem hereticum vel schismaticum cum diabolo et angelis ejus ignis eterni incendio participandum, nisi ante finem vitæ Catholicæ fuerit incorporatus et redintegratus ecclesiæ—et post pauca—omni homini qui ecclesiæ Catholicæ non tenet unitatem, neque baptismus neque eleemosyna quantumlibet copiosa, neque mors pro nomine Christi suscepta proficere poterit ad salutem;" which we thus translate, "Believe most firmly, and entertain not the smallest doubt, that every heretic or schismatic is to participate in the burning of eternal fire with the devil and his angels, unless before the end of his life, he shall have been incorporated and made whole again in the Catholic church; and a little while afterwards, neither baptisms nor alms-giving, however copious, nor death, suffered for the name of Christ, will be able to profit for the salvation of any man, who does not hold the unity of the Catholic church?"—From the Glossary it appears, the words quoted are of St. Augustine—as a decretal, unsupported by any other authority, it would not constitute an article of faith; however, decretals sometimes incidentally involve a matter of faith, and so it happens with the present one; it involves the general tenet, that out of the true church salvation is not attainable. This doctrine of course is held by the Roman Catholics of Ireland, as well as by all others throughout the world; and must be held by every one, who professes himself a Christian, being clearly laid down in the Gospel, and the formularies of faith common to all Christians.

Is the principle of that doctrine the same as set forth in the Athanasian creed, which declares that all those who do not hold the Catholic faith as there expressed, shall perish everlastingly, applying only to the principle?—It is exactly the same.

Is there not, however, this great practical difference between the anathema supposed to be pronounced in the conclusion of the Athanasian creed, and the one now read to you, that a Protestant, holding the Athanasian creed, does not necessarily exclude any Roman Catholic from salvation, because Protestants presume that the doctrines of the Athanasian creed are received as much by Roman Catholics as by Protestants, but the converse is not true, for Roman Catholics, according to the canon which has just been stated, do exclude all Protestants from salvation?—I consider, that the general principle is exactly the same in both churches, and as we exclude all heretics from our church, so the Protestants in like manner exclude all those whom they consider heretics from their church; the principle, however, is an abstract one, and we do not mean to apply it to individuals; the principle asserts merely that all those who are really heretics, are excluded from the church and so from salvation; but we do not pretend to determine, who exactly are heretics, and who are not; as this entirely depends upon their internal faith, which is impenetrable to the eyes of man and known only to God. The Protestant principle, I conceive, to be exactly the same.

But

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

* I mentioned more than once, that the decretals relating to heretics were generally enacted at a time when the world was Catholic, and with a view rather of preventing heresy than punishing heretics, who had previously existed. The civil laws against heretics were issued in similar circumstances, and to prevent the evils attendant on the introduction of heresy. These laws have been long since repealed in all countries where religious sects are tolerated or established; and nothing now remains of all the laws issued against them but a mere shadow, a censure declaring them to be (what they have already declared themselves), separated from the body of the Catholic church. This censure, of course, can have no civil effects in this country, nor in any country where Protestants are tolerated. The spiritual effect which the censures pronounced in the canon law can have, with regard to Protestants in this country, I have already described as confined to conscience alone, and productive of no external effect whatever, even of a spiritual nature. Hence we see Catholics live in perfect good neighbourhood with Protestants, even in those very states where the legislative power is wholly Catholic. In Rome itself, Protestants, who either sojourn or reside, far from being treated as excommunicated persons, experience every mark of the most cordial charity and benevolence. Protestants, who reside among Catholics in the commercial way, find as much fidelity, and as strict justice observed towards them, as they could expect in a Protestant country. Hence the whole result of the canon law, on the subject of heretics, with reference to Ireland, is reduced to a censure, which has no external effect whatsoever, even of a spiritual nature, and being disregarded by Protestants, can cause them no uneasiness.

But does not that canon extend to schismatics as much as to heretics; so that any Protestant whom your preceding answer might suppose to be not internally a heretic, is yet necessarily excluded from salvation in his character of a schismatic?—We also exclude schismatics from the church and from salvation; and I consider that the Protestant doctrine contains the very same principle*.

Can any person who holds that a Roman Catholic worships idols, hold, also, that he worships one God in trinity and unity?—I conceive, that he cannot consistently.

It seems admitted, that a Protestant of the Established Church, joining in the Athanasian creed, does not thereby require any person to be a Protestant of the Established Church, in order to be saved, but on the contrary, for aught that appears in that creed, admits the salvation of every Roman Catholic, as well as every other denomination of Christian. Can you point out in any other creed or article, or ascertained doctrine of the Established Church, that which would warrant you in supposing that the members of it hold, that communion with it is necessary to salvation?—I consider that Protestants require for salvation, the profession of the Catholic faith, as expressed in the creed of St. Athanasius. I also consider that they hold the doctrine of their own church to be that Catholic faith, and therefore, that none who do not make profession of the doctrine of their church can obtain salvation. I also consider, that Protestants hold that it is necessary for salvation to be a member of the true church of Christ, and as they hold their own church alone to be the true church of Christ, they consider that none can obtain salvation but those who hold communion with the Protestant Church; it appears clearly from the Protestant formulary of faith that this is their doctrine, for in the Thirty-nine Articles they exclude from salvation, all those who do not make profession of the true faith of Christ, and who are not members of the true church of Christ. They also exclude from salvation all those who are excluded from their body by excommunication, which clearly shews that they hold the same principle with Catholics on exclusive salvation.

Pray state which of the articles of religion you suppose to have any of the effects mentioned in the preceding answer?—The 19th article is as follows: "The visible church of Christ is a congregation of faithful men, in the which the pure word of God is preached, and the sacraments be duly ministered according to Christ's ordinance in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same. As the church of Jerusalem, Alexandria and Antioch have erred, so also the church of Rome hath erred, not only in their living and manner of ceremonies, but also in matters of faith;" from this article it appears, that Roman Catholics are considered to have erred in matters of faith, and as the true faith is necessary for salvation, they must of course be thereby excluded from salvation.

Is there a word in the article restricting the Catholic church to the church of England?—The article does not express those words, but it necessarily implies that principle; because it asserts that the Roman Catholic church has erred in faith, and as the true faith, according to the principle of every Christian sect, is the basis of salvation, of course they are excluded from salvation.

So far from asserting that principle, on the contrary, does not the article expressly give the title of the Catholic church to all societies of Christians in which the pure word of the Gospel is preached?—Yes; and the same is precisely the principle of Roman Catholics, that all those who hold the true faith may obtain salvation, and the question is, among the different sects professing Christianity, which holds that true faith, which all acknowledge to be essential.

Does that article which you have now read, exclude in your opinion, all members of the Roman Catholic church from the benefit of salvation?—It clearly excludes all those who make profession of being members of the church of Rome, and hold her doctrine; the article is general, therefore, does not speak of individuals; such exactly is our doctrine†.

Not even by the description of churches?—It considers the church of Rome to be in error, therefore all the members of the church of Rome, who make profession of the same faith, must be in error. What in reality is the faith of each individual, the article cannot determine, it does not therefore pronounce on the individual, but leaves that to God, as I said of our doctrine. Permit me to add the 33d Article, which relates to excommunicated persons: "That person, which by open denunciation of the church is rightly cut off from the unity of the church, and excommunicated, ought to be taken of the whole multitude of the faithful, as an heathen and publican, until he be openly reconciled by penance, and received into the church by a judge that hath authority thereunto."

Is not this case restricted to temporal consequences—what do you see in it that devotes such a person to eternal punishment?—On the contrary, I consider it to be purely spiritual, because

* But as schism consists, in like manner, in an act of the will, contemning and rejecting the authority instituted by Christ, it would be rashness to pronounce that any individual is a schismatic. We can indeed decide on a church or sect in general, and declare it to be schismatical, from the formulary of faith it holds forth; but the heart of the individual is known to God alone, and none but God can pronounce whether he be worthy of hatred or love.

† We hold, that out of the Roman Catholic church there is no salvation, but leave to God to pronounce who is or who is not a member of it. Two bonds unite a member with that body—faith and charity. They are both acts of the soul, visible only to God; it would be rashness, therefore, in man to refuse them to any fellow creature.

because it declares, that the excommunicated person is to be considered by the faithful as a heathen and publican; now every Christian must hold that the heathen and publican are out of the way of salvation.

In reference to the subject of the canon law, we should wish you to explain a passage in one of the Class Books of Maynooth, under the head of Tractatus de Legibus, on the subject of dispensation from human laws. The question treated is, who has the power of dispensing, and it is stated that this power is possessed,—1st by the Legislator, 2d by the superior of the Legislator, and 3d by the successor of the Legislator; and from these premises, it is inferred, that the supreme Pontiff has the power of dispensing with any of the canon laws, and also, according to the usage and consent of the church, that he has the same power of dispensing with the decrees even of general Councils; is that conformable to the doctrine which you also teach?—It is our doctrine with regard to purely canon or positive law, and also, the doctrine of all Roman Catholics; it is allowed by all Catholics that the Pope possesses the executive power in the church; general Councils cannot always be assembled, and therefore it is necessary that there should be an executive; this executive power we consider to reside in the Pope; we also consider for the same reason, that a dispensing power must exist somewhere, and hold this power also to reside in the Pope as head of the church; we consider, therefore, that when there is a just cause, the Pope can dispense even in the decrees of general Councils. I mean the positive decrees that relate purely to the discipline or government of the church; whether he possesses this power, as head of the church, and jure divino, or because he receives it from the universal church, is a question disputed among canonists. But all Roman Catholics confess the Pope is invested with the dispensing power, which, however, he is to use for edification, and not for destruction.

If the Pope is the judge of the lawfulness of the decrees of councils, does not the doctrine here laid down, ascribe to him in effect a supremacy over general Councils?—This doctrine does not go directly to establish his supremacy over general Councils, for the reason mentioned; because he may have received this power from general Councils, and act only in virtue of authority derived from them, and not in virtue of an authority which he possesses jure divino; and this, as I have already stated, is a question disputed among the canonists. The Pope, when he dispenses, does not pronounce the law to be bad, but for just reasons, relaxes its obligation in a particular case.

In the same treatise under the question, whether dispensation can be given without a cause, it is answered, that it may at least be granted without the cause being expressed; and at the same time it is laid down, that while in this manner a dispensation would exempt the person in whose favour it is granted, from all obligations and penalties of human law; yet he may be bound in foro conscientiae not to make use of the dispensation. With whom does it rest to determine this right and its limitation.—Is the individual to exercise his private judgment in the case, or by whom is he to be directed?—The person in whose favour the dispensation is granted must have alleged a cause to the superior; the doctrine delivered by the author supposes a case in which a dispensation has been granted without a just cause, and consequently is void in itself, though externally, and in the eyes of the law, valid; if the person who applied for such dispensation is conscious to himself, that the cause he assigned was not a just one, he cannot make use of the dispensation in foro conscientiae, because he is aware that it is invalid, and therefore, although in foro externo, and in the face of the world, he may use it, because apparently valid, yet he would sin by doing so; these principles of laws are generally and equally applicable to municipal or ecclesiastical; and being founded on the principles of natural equity must be admitted by all.

Among the lawful causes for dispensation, as here laid down, one is, that it shall result in the common good; does the same rule of interpretation, according to the private judgment of the person who obtains it, apply in this case also; that is to say, is he to consider, whether the dispensation will result in the general good, in which case it ought to bind him, or that it will not result in the general good, in which latter case he ought not to use it?—In general the authority granting the dispensation is to judge of the justice of the cause; but the author contemplates a case, in which the person applying for the dispensation, would be conscious to himself that no just cause existed; and in this case, he considers, that the person applying could not make use of the dispensation without sinning. The subject in general ought to presume, that the legal authority acts conformably to the rules of equity, unless he has an evidence of the contrary.

In order to relieve his conscience, is he not under the necessity of considering, whether or not it will have the effect of conducing to the general good?—He ought certainly to consider whether the dispensation be valid or not; however, in general he is not to judge of this, but to suppose it, as the general presumption is, that the superior does not abuse his power; but a case may occur, in which the person who applies, is convinced that the dispensation is invalid and opposed to the public good; in such case he cannot avail himself of it without acting contrary to his conscience. However, the author does not by any means intend to establish the general principle, that the person who applies for a dispensation is the judge in every case of the validity of it; his principle, and the principle of all our moralists, is, that the presumption is always in favour of legal authority, and that the subject can never constitute himself judge of the exercise of it, unless where he has evidence and conviction that it has been abused.

It does not appear from the passage or the context, that any rule is laid down by which a distinction is made for him?—The author supposes he is conscious of the injustice of the dispensation; this of course must be left to his judgment, as all similar cases must, according to to every law. For though subjects, according to every law, are in general bound to obey, still if the prince would command them to do any thing evidently at variance with the natural or divine law, they ought not to obey him; and in this case the subject himself should be the judge; in a case of doubt, he ought to take advice. But it does not from thence follow, that he should be judge in every case, whether the command of the superior be lawful or not; he is allowed to follow his own judgment only in a case, in which the command of the superior is evidently opposed to the divine or natural law. The same occurs with respect to the dispensing power that belongs to the superior, when a case occurs in which the subject is evidently convinced of the invalidity of the dispensation. He is bound in that case to act according to conscience, and reject the dispensation. But if there be no evidence on the subject, and a doubt merely arises regarding the validity of the dispensation, he ought to take advice.

Have you seen Bishop Sanderson's work, intituled "De Juramenti obligatione?"—I have read a part of it.

Do or not the principles laid down there, as to the cases in which a party is or is not bound to perform oaths or commands, agree with those laid down in the books of authority in the Roman Catholic church; with this distinction, that Bishop Sanderson, in a case of difficulty, sends the party to some prudent clergyman, and in the other, the Catholic is sent to some fixed spiritual director?—So I understand his doctrine; in every other respect, his principles regarding the relaxation of oaths and promises, perfectly coincide with those laid down by Roman Catholic writers on ethics and moral theology.

Appendix, N° 35.

Examination of the Reverend William Higgins, D. D.,
Monday, 30th October 1826.

WILL you have the goodness to state what length of time you have held the chair of dogmatic theology at Maynooth?—I was appointed to that chair about the middle of last month.

Previously to that, had you any situation connected with the College of Maynooth?—Not immediately before coming to the college.

What is the amount of your salary?—I have been told that my predecessor received 120*l.* Irish, yearly, and I presume that I shall be allowed an equal sum; I am not certain however, whether my salary will be increased or diminished.

In other circumstances are you in the same situation as the rest of the professors as to living and lodging?—I am.

Where were you educated?—I was educated partly in France and partly in Italy.

In what college in France were you educated?—I spent part of my time in a French seminary, and the remainder in the Irish college at Paris.

In what part of Italy was a portion of your education received?—In Rome.

Is there any institution in Rome for the purpose of educating Irish students?—There was none in my time, except some convents where friars were educated.

Where were you yourself?—I lived in an Italian college during my time in Rome.

Were there many students at it?—Not very many, I should think there were not more than twenty-five.

Were the twenty-five persons who were in it, all educated for the priesthood?—Not all; some of them received merely a secular education, and afterwards embraced whatever state they thought proper; indeed, properly speaking, I was not educated in that college. I was only a lodger, and went to the Roman university for my lectures.

How many years were you abroad?—I cannot exactly say; I think I was nearly eight years in France, and nearly five in Italy.

What portion of your education did you receive before you left Ireland?—I studied Latin and Greek and the ordinary things that are studied before entering college.

In what school?—I was at different schools; I was at one conducted by a Protestant clergyman, and I was in other schools afterwards.

Where was the school under the direction of the Protestant clergyman?—At a place called Drumsna in the county of Leitrim.

Were you recommended by any bishop in the Roman Catholic church in Ireland to receive an education for the priesthood, or was it voluntary on your part?—It was perfectly voluntary on my part.

Were you under any assurance that you should obtain ordination?—There was no such promise held out to me; I depended on my good conduct for promotion.

Did you always intend to return to Ireland during the time you were in France and in Italy?—At all times I had that intention.

Will you describe, as nearly as you can, the expense of your foreign education, and state also what portion of it was defrayed by any burses, or any exhibitions in colleges at which you were?—I cannot exactly say how much I spent, but I am able to state that I never studied on a bursary, nor received from others any pecuniary assistance whatever for my education; it was all at my own expense, and I should think, abstracting my travelling expenses, my yearly expenditure never exceeded 40*l.*; but besides that, I spent considerable sums in travelling through France, Italy, Germany and other places.

Appendix, N° 35.

Examination of
Rev.W. Higgins, D. D.
30 October 1826.

We conclude from that answer that a person could be educated at Maynooth for much less than such an education as yours would cost?—I do not give that answer as a means of comparing the expenses of Maynooth with those of France or Italy.

Pray state, whether the doctrines taught in the colleges in which you were, with regard to the Roman Catholic religion, differed at all from each other, and whether they differed materially from the doctrine taught at Maynooth?—I never found them to differ in any thing essential from each other, nor to differ in any thing essential from the doctrine taught in Maynooth.

In what college in France were you?—I lived in a French college for some time, and afterwards in the Irish college.

Were the doctrines which were taught and maintained in the colleges of France at which you were, with respect to the question whether the Pope has any right to interfere directly or indirectly in matters of a civil or temporal nature, precisely the same as those taught at Maynooth?—I have never had an opportunity of strictly ascertaining what they teach at Maynooth, unless by conversing with the professors, but if I am to judge by that conversation, they were precisely the same.

You have not been many weeks at Maynooth?—Not many.

You are aware of the distinction between the cis-alpine and the trans-alpine doctrine?—Yes.

Is the cis-alpine doctrine maintained at Maynooth in like manner as it is in France?—As far as I can ascertain from the conversations just mentioned, it is.

Could that have been the case at the college in which you were at Rome?—I studied in the university at Rome; all I can say with respect to those doctrines is, that I was as much at liberty to discuss them freely at Rome as I could be at Maynooth, or in France; because as they do not form any part of our faith, we treat them as mere opinions, and as opinions they were perfectly open to discussion; I do not mean to say however, that any professor taught the Gallican doctrine in Rome, but those of the university gave an exposition of the arguments pro and contra, leaving the students to determine for themselves.

Are you speaking now of the doctrine as to the Pope's infallibility, speaking separately from the council?—I allude to the four articles decreed by the French clergy in 1682.

Is it maintained at Rome that the Pope has civil or temporal power out of his own states?—I never heard it maintained.

Did you ever hear it put as a matter of argument?—I did hear it put as arguable, and I argued on the question myself, for the purpose of proving that his Holiness possesses no such power, nor have I heard such authority ascribed to him by any professor of theology. It might have been quoted as the doctrine of some few divines of former ages, but I do not recollect to have heard it maintained by any of the present professors of the Roman university.

Was the contrary doctrine taught?—I did not hear the contrary doctrine taught; I heard the arguments exposed.

You heard the arguments in favour of the civil and temporal power of the Pope exposed?—Yes.

As erroneous?—I cannot precisely recollect what the decision of the professor was, but I can state, that he did not require any student to believe either the one side or the other.

Will you state what was your own opinion?—As to the doctrine of the temporal power of the Pope, my own opinion was, that it was perfectly erroneous and almost absurd; and I can add also, that such was the opinion, as far as I could ascertain, of all the students in the university without any exception.

Were there any other Irish students in the college in which you were?—When I went there, there was none but myself, afterwards one or two more were admitted.

How long had you been returned to Ireland, before you were elected to the chair you now fill?—I was in Ireland about two months before I was appointed.

Were you five years in the university of Rome?—I was nearly five years in the city, but I did not study five years in the university, I studied only three. I had already finished my studies on going there, and I went chiefly for the purpose of taking the degree of doctor of divinity, which I obtained after three years attendance.

Were there any other candidates for the professorship of dogmatic theology when you obtained it?—There was only another candidate who came forward, but I was appointed by concursus, which lasted four or five days, for the purpose of ascertaining our relative fitness for the situation.

Your appointment you consider as in the nature of an election, and not in consequence of any particular recommendation given?—I dare say I was recommended by my own bishop, and I presume there was nothing objectionable against me.

Will you state the way in which your election took place by a concursus?—When the chair I now fill became vacant, there was public notice given that any person who wished to concur for that situation might come forward and stand a concursus; that is, a competition with any other candidates who might offer themselves; no person came forward but one other, and the Trustees who were constantly present during our different examinations, were pleased to decide in my favour.

Had you made any previous applications to the Trustees individually for their favour; did any thing in the nature of a canvass take place?—I was advised by some friends to come forward for this place, and having consented, it became necessary to give official notice to the President, which I did; but I never solicited the support of any individual to ensure my success.

Was there, on your part, any previous examination as to the subjects on which you were to lecture; did you understand yourself bound to lecture according to the book that is established at Maynooth, and the particular doctrines in that?—I had examined closely one or two of the treatises, and looked in a cursory way over the others, and I willingly adopt the principles of those books.

When did you begin to lecture to your class?—About a month ago.

Of what number does your class consist?—In my class there are nearly 200.

Your lectures are on dogmatic theology?—Yes.

You have studied moral theology of course, extensively, during your residence in Paris and in Rome?—I cannot speak as to the extent of my knowledge in that science, but I have studied it for a considerable time.

Will you state at what point you began in lecturing to your class; did you commence as the book begins, or did you take up any particular subject?—I began with the treatise on religion, and I followed the order of the book in that treatise.

Were you examined upon dogmatic theology during the concursus?—I was.

In the course of your examination, did you maintain those principles with respect to the civil or temporal power of the Pope that are maintained in Dr. Delahogue's Treatise?—During the examination those questions were not treated: the subjects discussed were taken by chance from the whole body of theology, and those questions did not happen to come out.

Were you aware that you were obliged to assert those principles upon oath, by taking the oath of allegiance consequent upon your appointment?—I was perfectly aware that I was to assert on oath, that the Pope had no temporal power, either direct or indirect, within this realm.

Have you read Doctor Delahogue's Treatise de Ecclesiâ?—I have read his Treatise de Ecclesiâ, and on Religion.

The Commissioners do not mean to ask you whether you approve of every word of argument that may be found in it; but do you subscribe to the principles laid down in that book with respect to the civil and temporal power of the Pope?—I do most willingly subscribe to those principles.

Do you also subscribe to the principle, that it is no article of the Catholic faith that the Pope is infallible?—I do; because it is the truth, that it is no article of the Catholic faith.

The question, whether the Pope has or not the gift of infallibility, is a mooted question in the Roman Catholic church?—Yes, it is a question left perfectly free for professors and students to discuss as they may think proper.

A man may either adopt the opinion, that the Pope is infallible, or may reject the opinion that the Pope is infallible, still continuing in the communion of the Catholic church?—Perfectly so.

Do you understand, that those who adopt the opinion that the Pope is infallible, mean that he is infallible in propounding articles of faith to be believed and held by the Catholic church?—With respect to that question there is a discrepancy of opinion—some maintain that he is infallible only when he propounds a doctrine to be believed by the general church; others think, that even in bulls for regulating the discipline of particular countries he is infallible; but I believe the number of those who hold that opinion is much fewer than those on the other side.

Do any such persons deem that he must be considered infallible in issuing bulls for the regulation of churches which might interfere with the civil rights of sovereigns?—If there be question of mere discipline, and that the bull issued happen to come in collision with the temporal rights of a sovereign, I have no doubt that the Pope would revoke it of his own accord; and I am convinced that his Holiness would never issue such a document unless through ignorance of the fact.

Supposing that the Pope were not to revoke it, would the bull be considered as binding in that particular country to which it was issued?—If the bull clash with the temporal interests or rights of a sovereign I must deny the hypothesis that the Pope would insist on it. I cannot admit the supposition.

Supposing that the Pope was neither to insist upon it, nor to revoke it, but simply to leave it, having issued it, would it be considered as binding?—That hypothesis can hardly be admitted, because if it infringed on the rights of a sovereign, he would naturally apply to the Pope to have it revoked.

Put the case of such a bull having issued as a matter of fact, and that the sovereign does not reclaim against it, nor the Pope revoke it, would it, in that case, have a binding obligation or not?—If the Pope issued a bull which infringed upon the rights of the sovereign, and that he thought proper to yield to the Pope, no injury would be done, and in that case it would be binding, because, when accepted by the sovereign, it forms part of the law of his dominion.

The question supposes the sovereign to do nothing, perhaps owing to never having heard of the bull; in that case, would the bull be binding in that particular country or not?—I must repeat, that I cannot conceive any bull to be issued which would not come to the knowledge of the sovereign; because most certainly, if a bull be issued by the Pope, which would clash with the rights of a sovereign, it cannot be supposed that he would not be made acquainted with its contents, either by his magistrates or ministers.

Have not the sovereigns of most of the Catholic states of Europe deemed it necessary to guard against the possibility of such bulls being issued, by requiring that all bulls from the Pope, except those that merely regard the conscience of individuals, should be submitted to the public authorities of the country?—I believe it is the case; I know it is so in France and Austria. When I was in Vienna I made it my business to inquire of some of the professors of the university, and I found their principles, with respect to the four articles of France, to be in accordance with those of French divines; that is, that they most ardently supported the doctrine of those articles.

Supposing the Pope were to issue a bull to this country which should undertake to depose His Majesty, and to absolve his subjects from their allegiance, and should command them to join with any foreign power in attacking the Government of this country, or should enjoin them to resist the temporal authority of His Majesty, would you consider it the duty of Roman Catholics to resist such a bull?—We implicitly swear by our oath of allegiance to resist such bulls; that is, we swear the Pope has no such right, and of course if he were to act upon a right which we swear he has not, it would be our duty to oppose it; but I must add, that I cannot admit the hypothesis in the present state of things, for the Pope will certainly never issue such a bull.

Supposing a bull of the Pope should declare that it was for the good of the church, or of the faith, that the Roman Catholic subjects of His Majesty should rebel against him, would you think that the Roman Catholics ought to do so?—It would be no matter what was the motive urged by a bull, importing that we were to rebel against His Majesty, we never should feel ourselves authorized to obey it, because we should then conclude that the Pope was wrong, and that we were right.

Have you ever heard it taught or insinuated by any class of Roman Catholics in this country, that the Pope might absolve them from their oath of allegiance to the King?—I never heard that matter discussed, that I did not hear it concluded by all parties that the Pope had no such power.

Are you acquainted with many of the Roman Catholic clergy in Ireland?—I am with some, particularly those in my own diocese, and with some of the bishops.

Which was your diocese?—Ardagh.

Who is the bishop of that diocese?—Doctor Magauran.

Have you ever heard it maintained or insinuated amongst any of the Roman Catholic clergy in this country, that the Pope had any right to interfere in civil or temporal matters?—I never heard that the Pope had any right as head of the church to interfere in civil or temporal matters, but I do not recollect to have heard that as monarch he might not offer mediation in those countries where his interference in that respect might be acceptable.

So far as your information goes, do you believe that to be the principle inculcated in the course of education at Maynooth?—I firmly believe it to be such, and I even think that they are more anxious to inculcate that principle than any college perhaps that I have ever seen.

Will you have the goodness to read and translate a part of Doctor Delahogue's tract, de Ecclesia, in page 209, which is headed thus: "Circa decreta Conciliorum generalium de fide?"—The passage referred to is as follows: "Argumentum istud exordiemur his Bossuetii verbis. Non docent Catholici, quæcumque gesta sunt in Conciliis, ea ad ecclesiæ fidem pertinere; sed eo loco habenda sunt tantum illa quæ decreto edito, fidelibus omnibus credenda ac tenenda proponuntur. Quod et Melchior Canus passim docet, et Catholici omnes uno ore fatentur. Cujus rei ratio est, quod id sufficiat ut verba Christi firma sint de æterna ecclesiasticorum dogmatum firmitate. Nec proinde labat fides, si quæ extra fidem haud pari auctoritate consistunt. Atque certum omnino est, multa in Conciliis, sine expressa deliberatione ac determinatione, esse dicta gesta, quibus adstringi se Catholici omnes uno ore negant. Multa etiam sunt decreta, quæ non pertinent ad invariabilem fidei regulam, sed sunt accommodata temporibus atque negotiis."

TRANSLATION.

"We shall commence this argument with the following words from Bossuet. Catholics do not hold that all things transacted in councils appertain to faith; but that those things are to be held as such, which are proposed by a formal decree to be observed and believed by all the faithful. Which doctrine, Melchior Canus teaches throughout his works, and all Catholics unanimously agree upon. The reason of which is, that this doctrine is sufficient to preserve unchanged the words of Christ, regarding the firmness of ecclesiastical dogmas, nor does faith suffer on that account. And it is most certain that many things have been said and done in councils without express deliberation or determination, by which Catholics unanimously agree, that they are not bound. Many things also have been decreed which do not belong to the invariable rule of faith, but are only accommodated to times and circumstances."

Do you consider the principle there stated, that that only is to be held as matter of faith, which is propounded to all the faithful as matter which is to be believed and held as Catholic faith?—I conceive that nothing can form an article of our faith which is not revealed by God, and afterwards proposed to our belief by the church; because we consider divine revelation the foundation of our faith, and the church the only sufficient expounder of the different articles contained in the revealed word of God.

Which revelation, according to the Catholic doctrine, may be known either by the written word or by the Apostolic tradition?—Either by the written word or by tradition.

Suppose a council were to make a law ordaining that the Pope should depose the King, or should depose any heretical Prince, as one of the Councils of Lateran ordained that the Pope should depose the Princes who favoured the Albigenian heresy, would you consider such a decree, or decision, or law, as propounding an article of faith, or only as coming within within the principle laid down by Bossuet, in the words, "Multa etiam sunt decreta quæ non pertinent ad invariabilem fidei regulam, sed sunt accommodata temporibus atque negotiis?"—As God has given to his church no power whatever of interfering in the temporal concerns of princes, and as Catholics hold that a general council which represents that church is infallible, I cannot admit that any such assembly would decree that princes should be deposed.

Do you understand that those councils which decreed that heretical princes should be deposed, were speaking by virtue of authority enjoyed by them as representing the civil and ecclesiastical States of Europe, and ordaining matters of prudence merely, or as councils representing the whole church, and propounding articles of faith?—I consider, if ever the fact of any such decree took place, it emanated not from an assembly representing the universal church congregated to decide on matters of faith, but that it must have proceeded from a mixed authority, that is, from persons in that council holding as well temporal as ecclesiastical power.

Has it not been made matter of question by writers of considerable eminence, whether the decree of the fourth Council of Lateran, which is considered as directing depositions in certain cases, be or not spurious?—Some historians consider, that the canon in which that authority seems to be inserted and assumed, is spurious, because I believe they consider that for some hundred years after the council, no such canon was found*.

In the third Council of Lateran, is it not understood, that amongst the punishments decreed against the Albigenses, this was determined, "Illorum subditi et Vassalli relaxatos se noverrint à debito fidelitatis, domini et totius obsequii donec in tanta iniquitate permanserint?"—In the council just mentioned it would seem to have been decreed, that if the Albigenses persevered in their iniquitous practices, their vassals were to be absolved from their allegiance; but as that assembly was as much a congress of princes and lords as an ecclesiastical council, it is but fair to admit, that its decrees were known to its lay members as well as to the bishops, and as the former have never reclaimed against their publication, we must conclude that they themselves concurred in framing them. This being once admitted, it will naturally follow, that the canons alluded to ought to be considered as the civil laws of the state, rather than those of the church. But if it be supposed that a council or pope, or any authority whatever, assumed the right of absolving subjects from their allegiance to their sovereign, I would disregard their decision, and consider the subjects by no means freed from their obligations of fidelity. Not only would I depise and disregard such a decree; but if a subject of the sovereign in question, I would consider it my religious duty to openly resist it, and advise such of the people as might be committed to my care, to remain unshaken in their allegiance. I cannot however admit the necessity of ever reducing this doctrine to practice, being fully convinced that the church will never assume such a right.

Will you not consider it your duty, as Professor of Dogmatic Theology in Maynooth, sincerely and ex animo to impress that principle?—When I shall have occasion to treat that subject, I am resolved to inculcate the substance of the answer I have just given, because I consider it to be founded on truth; and I shall endeavour, when I have an opportunity of doing so, to impress those sentiments on the minds of my pupils.

Do you therefore hold, that those canons, in no degree, bind Roman Catholics at the present day?—I hold that those canons do not bind the Catholics of the present day, either directly or indirectly.

You consider that they were statutes deriving force from the authority of the civil and ecclesiastical powers of Europe, applied to the then existing state of things?—Yes.

And not applicable to the present state of Europe or the world?—By no means.

You are aware, perhaps, that Boniface pronounced a sentence of deposition against Philip the Fair; do you understand that Pope Boniface, in so doing, acted by virtue of the authority which he derived from temporal power, or by virtue of any authority which he possessed de jure divino, as the head of the church, and vicar of Christ upon earth, which Roman Catholics hold him to be?—I conceive first, that if he assumed any such authority jure divino, he assumed it wrongly; and secondly, I think it probable, that whatever authority he exercised, he did not exercise it jure divino, but by virtue of a kind of accessorial power given to him perhaps by the sovereigns of Europe. Besides, Pope Boniface, after using many arguments to show that he possessed the power of disposing of kingdoms, and of deposing princes, when he comes to a decision, does not decree that he is vested with this authority jure divino; he only says, "Porro subesse Romano Pontifici omnem humanam creaturam, declaramus, dicimus et pronunciamus esse omnino de necessitate salutis." Now, if these words be understood in a spiritual sense, they must be admitted as orthodox by every Catholic, as we hold that

* Many eminent writers doubt of the authenticity of this canon, as the writers of that age assert that nothing was seriously discussed in the council except the means of recovering the holy lands. We find this account of the transactions of that assembly in the writings of Matthew Paris, Nauceries, Platina, and other authors of much eminence; but granting that the canon referred to is really authentic, it cannot be inferred that the church assumed the right of absolving subjects from their allegiance, or of disposing of property, as the words of the canon might give reason to suppose; because that council was composed of princes and temporal lords, as well as bishops, and consequently they might enact penalties against the Albigenses, who, according to all historians, committed most enormous excesses, and disturbed the peace of the state, as well as that of the church.

that the Pope is the visible head of the church, and as such, superior in spiritual concerns to any of its members.

Does not Bossuet state, in defending the Gallican declaration, and denying the civil and temporal power of the Pope, something to this effect: that although some Popes have undertaken to pronounce a sentence of deposition, and though into bulls of deposition they have contrived to introduce general passages partly referring to their spiritual power, to the power of the keys; yet that no Pope distinctly and expressly ever referred this power of deposition to the power which he derived from Christ as head of the church?—The Popes, who seem according to the words of the bulls issued by them, to have assumed in a certain degree the power of deposing kings, though they make use of strong language, I believe they never, in express words, say that they act jure divino, in so much as they are Popes; and that answer may be confirmed by this observation, that though many of the Popes might have appeared anxious that the world should believe that they enjoyed their authority, yet in support of that pretension they never decreed any thing as obliging people to believe it; they merely assumed it, and a matter of fact informs us, that that assumption was afterwards contradicted, because reclamations were made from all parts of the world to which those bulls were issued—and it ought to be observed, that persons so reclaiming never were deemed heretical; that, on the contrary, they enjoyed communion with the Pope, equally with others, which convinces us that even the Pope never assumed this authority as forming any thing like a divine right, or as taxing those persons with a deficiency of faith who embraced the contrary opinion. I beg leave however to add, that I do not mean to excuse the ambition of some Popes; I leave that to themselves, but I say it will never be proved, that even those ambitious Popes decreed this as a matter to be held by us as an article of faith.

You mean to say that they contrived to mix up allusions to their spiritual power with the exercise of a temporal power, so that ignorant persons might perhaps refer the exercise of that temporal power to spiritual authority, although they took care not to propound the matter as a matter to be believed and held by Christians as an article of faith?—I do not mean to say that the Popes made use of cautious expressions in order to meet the objections of the ignorant alone. Their bulls were open to the examination of all. But I conceive that their having studiously avoided to decree or oblige the faithful to believe that they possessed jure divino the right of deposing princes, proves they never dared to propose their opinions as the doctrine of the Catholic church; and for what they, as individuals, may have done, they alone are accountable.

In the bull "Unam Sanctam" issued by Boniface against Philip the Fair, there is this passage: "Porro subesse Romano pontifici omnem humanam creaturam, declaramus, definimus, et pronunciamus omnino esse de necessitate salutis;" Is it not observed, upon that passage in the bull, by Dr. Delahogue, in the Tractatus de Ecclesiâ, page 264, that the Pope there takes care to say generally, that every human creature is subject to him, without specifying in what manner, so that he might defend himself, if he were charged with saying that every creature was subject to him in temporals, by asserting that he meant in spirituals?—As to that passage I think it bears with it an answer in favour of the doctrine already stated by me, because I assert that no Pope ever positively decreed that he had de jure divino the right of deposing kings; now if the Pope were weak enough to have recourse to a dubious phrase, at least that proves that he was afraid to assert that right openly, and it proves consequently that it was not his avowed doctrine, or the doctrine of the day; but the passage referred to can be explained in a favourable sense to the Pope; he might have said that every human being is subject to him, with which Catholics hold, if he talks of spiritual things; because, as we hold that the Pope is the centre of catholicity, and with whom all Christians ought to hold communion, it is no wonder that he should say in that sense, that every human being must be subject to him*.

Is not the principle of the Roman Catholic church, that the power which was communicated by God to his Son, our Lord, as man, and which power, as he himself told us, had not relation to the kingdoms of this world, the power, and the only power, which the Pope, as vicar of Christ holds upon earth?—The Catholic doctrine with respect to the power which the Pope enjoys upon earth, we hold to be this; that Christ in giving their respective missions to the Apostles, instituted Saint Peter as their chief, and that to him he gave the power of governing his church; Catholics hold that the Pope is the legitimate successor of Saint Peter in this same power, and that consequently as Saint Peter enjoyed the prerogative of governing the whole church in spiritualities, so does the present Pope enjoy the same prerogative; but by no means do we hold, that any power which was conferred upon the Pope, through the channel of Saint Peter, who was the first Pope, gives him a direct or indirect right to interfere in temporal concerns.

They hold that the Pope enjoys that species of prerogative or jurisdiction in the church, which

* In the passage just quoted, the Pope does undoubtedly make use of an ambiguous expression, but whether for the purpose of excusing himself, by referring one time to spiritualities and another time to temporalities, is both useless and impossible to determine. Bossuet says, that in using this general language, he providentially abstained from decreeing a falsehood, which he would have done, had he decreed that he enjoyed, jure divino, any right whatever of deposing princes. I here beg leave to observe, that Catholics of the present day are by no means accountable for what may have happened several centuries ago; and if popes have acted wrongly, their misconduct is and always has been disapproved of by the church.

which Saint Peter possessed?—Yes; with the exception of infallibility, which Saint Peter received as one of Christ's Apostles, and which it is not certain that the Pope enjoys.

Christ himself assumed no power in matters of a civil or temporal nature, and you therefore hold, that he did not delegate any such power to Saint Peter or to the Pope?—As our Divine Saviour came upon earth to offer himself a sacrifice to his eternal Father for the redemption of mankind, and not to confer upon the church which he was about to establish any temporal power, and having instituted Saint Peter, and his lawful successors, the governors of this church, which is exclusively of a spiritual nature; we maintain that he never vested Saint Peter or his successors the Popes, with any other than a spiritual authority, which alone is sufficient to govern the faithful committed to their guidance.

You are of course aware of the proceedings of the Council of Constance, with respect to John Huss?—Yes.

And that the conclusion has been drawn from them, or the imputation attempted through them to be fixed upon Roman Catholics, that that council held, that it was lawful to break faith with heretics?—I have heard those conclusions drawn sometimes.

Will you state whether you understand that that council maintains any such proposition?—What I know from history concerning that council is, that John Huss renewed in Germany the errors of Wickliffe, which errors were, that persons who lost grace, that is, persons who were not in a state of grace, no longer belonged to the church, and that whatever they did was in itself bad; that consequently when kings or sovereigns of any kind were no longer in a state of grace, as being wicked, vicious and bad men, according to his doctrine, subjects were no longer bound to obey them. This doctrine naturally gave alarm to the Emperor Sigismund, who in unison with the then existing Pope, had the Council of Constance convened, and when the Council was convened, that John Huss, who was already excommunicated, and already denounced as an heretic, appealed to that council. In appealing to the council, he was afraid of some parties in Germany, which had been raised against him by his doctrine, and in order to avoid any violence that might be offered to him, he applied for a safeguard to come to the council; this safeguard was given to him for the express purpose of arriving safe at the council; he did so; and in appealing to the council, as I apprehend, he openly said, that if convinced of heresy in the council, he would abide by the punishments that were to be inflicted on heretics; it was decreed in the council that he was a heretic, and I am sure that was plain enough; and after having thus decreed, they left the rest to the secular power, saying, we have found this man guilty of heresy contrary to our faith; we have nothing more to do with him. Then as the doctrine which he taught, and which that council qualified with the act of heresy, and was not simply so, but also clashed with the temporal rights of the Emperor, it appears that he was consigned to the magistrates of Constance, who thought proper to burn him; that these magistrates burnt him for differing with us in doctrine, is by no means certain; it is generally thought that they burnt him as a rebel, and not as an heretic; because as he taught that kings who got out of a state of grace, had no longer a claim upon the allegiance of their subjects, that alarmed the kings of the different states; and in order to put a stop to the propagation of any such rebellious doctrine, they punished him with death. I cannot allow that the council had any thing to do with the burning of John Huss. As it has been said also, that that council would seem to authorize the doctrine, that Catholics were not obliged to keep faith with heretics, I must deny the fact with respect to the council, and I must assert, that it never taught such a doctrine, and even though any council, (I do not speak of canonical councils,) but if any assembly of bishops, were to teach such a doctrine, we would not be obliged to abide by it.

Would you not consider such conduct an horrible offence against the law of God?—I cannot find language sufficiently strong to express my horror for such conduct. I have already stated that all Catholics believe, and at all times believed and taught, that it is contrary to both the natural and divine law to break faith with any man.

There is a passage in one of the decrees of the council, which some people understand as favouring the notion that it is lawful to break faith with heretics; the passage is, "nec aliqua sibi fides de jure naturali, divino, aut humano, fuerit in præjudicium Catholicæ fidei observanda;" are the Commissioners to understand that that passage means only an engagement entered into to the prejudice of the faith, as if a Christian Protestant in this country had entered into an engagement with any of the French atheists, thirty years ago, to join with them in endeavouring to subvert Christianity; that such an engagement being to the prejudice of the faith, would have been an unlawful engagement, not because it was entered into by a person not of the faith, but because it was in itself a sin?—From the passage referred to, it can be only deduced that the council was of opinion that no temporal power which the emperor or any other person might possess, could lawfully deprive the bishops there assembled, of the right of pronouncing in matters of faith. And they assert, that no contract entered into in prejudice of Catholic faith is binding on the contracting parties; not because they or any of them might happen to be heretics, but because such a contract having an illicit object, would be null and void in its inception, and from its own nature, as no promise or contract can, or ought to be, a bond of iniquity.

Supposing a Roman Catholic were to enter into an engagement with an infidel to overturn Christianity, as far as he could, you would of course hold, that such an engagement was void in its inception, not because a contract entered into with an infidel was void, but because any contract to do an act in itself immoral and unjust, is void in its inception?—I consider that any such contract would be null and void, for the reasons already adduced, that is, not because it would be entered into with an infidel, but as being sinful in its very essence; it would be more conformable to reason and religion to rescind than observe it.

Supposing, therefore, that the Emperor really meant to enter into a contract with John Huss, that the church should not be allowed to pronounce upon the question of heresy, inasmuch as the church considered that she had a right so to do from God, the church would consider that such a contract was in its nature void?—Most undoubtedly; the church would not exceed the limits of her rights, by pronouncing that such a contract was by no means binding, but on the contrary, to be considered as an abomination in the sight of God.

Supposing the Emperor had entered into a contract with John Huss, that the church should not declare that heresy, which really was heresy, would you not consider that that contract was a void contract?—If the Emperor had entered into any such contract, he would have encroached upon the exclusive rights of the church, and in that case, the church would have the power to pronounce that the contract was illicit and void.

Do you understand that the passage of the council which has been referred to, means what you have stated last?—I do.

Will you have the goodness to read from the Tract de Ecclesia, page 320, the passage beginning with “Sacrosancta”?—“Sacrosancta Synodus, &c. Quia nonnulli nimis intelligentes, aut sinistrae intentionis, vel forsitan volentes sapere plus quam oportet, nedum regiae majestati, sed etiam sacro, ut fertur, Concilio linguis maledictis detrahunt, publice et occulte dicentes vel innuentes quod salvus conductus per invictissimum Principem D. Sigismundum quondam I. Hus, hæresiarchæ damnatæ memoriæ, datus, fuit contra justitiam et honestatem indebitè violatus, cum tamen I. Hus fidem orthodoxam pertinaciter oppugnans, se ab omni salvo conductu et privilegio reddiderit alienum, nec aliqua sibi fides de jure naturali, divino, aut humano fuerit in præjudicium Catholicæ fidei observanda; Idcirco S. Synodus præsentium tenore declarat, invictissimum principem, circa prædictum quondam I. Hus, non obstante memorato salvo conductu, ex juris debito fecisse quod licuit, et quod decuit regiam majestatem.”

Will you have the goodness to state in what sense you understand that passage?—After reading that passage I have nothing to change in the substance of my former answers, because, as I have already stated, the church claims the exclusive right of judging in spiritual matters, and in exercising that right, she by no means interferes with the right she allows in secular princes to judge in secular matters; and therefore in the same manner as the council would not pretend to interfere with the rights of the Emperor in any temporal concerns; in like manner does it insinuate in the words just quoted, that the safe conduct granted to John Huss by the Emperor, could not licitly interfere with the rights of the bishops, or prevent them from judging and condemning the abominable doctrine of that heresiarch. I must add, that many critics doubt the authenticity of this canon. It was not published for many years after the council had been held, nor is it found in any of the first editions of the acts of that assembly.

You are aware that it is necessary to put the questions by which you have been interrogated, for the purpose of giving to you, who hold so important an office in the college of Maynooth, an opportunity of distinctly stating the Roman Catholic faith upon the matters to which the question referred; and not at all with the view of imputing to you the holding of any of those doctrines which you disclaim upon oath, and from holding which Roman Catholics have been publicly acquitted even by persons whose political opinions may be considered as opposed to them?—I feel pleasure in answering any question that may tend to make known the honest but sometimes misrepresented principles of Catholics.

You have spoken of the bull “Unam Sanctam,” do you not consider that that bull asserts the right of the Pope to interfere in temporal as well as in spiritual matters?—I repeat what I have before mentioned, in answering another question regarding that bull, that though the Pope might seem to assert that he enjoyed jure divino, the right in question, still he never defined or solemnly decreed any thing to that effect.

We are now going to suggest a passage to you from that bull, for the purpose of your considering it at your leisure, and after such consideration, giving an answer to the preceding question; the passage as they conceive it to stand, is this. “Certainly he who denies that the temporal sword is in the power of Peter, but ill attends to the word of our Lord, when he said, “put up thy sword into the sheath;” therefore both (to wit the spiritual and the material sword) are in the power of the church, but the latter is to be used for the church, the former by the church; the former by the instrumentality of the priest, the latter by that of kings and soldiers; but according to the order and sufferance of the priest. But one sword should be subjected to another, and the temporal authority to the spiritual power?”—The words referred to, if understood in a spiritual sense, will by no means prove that the Pope assumed the right jure divino of interfering with temporalities; for it is perfectly true, that in spiritual matters, the material sword ought to be subject to the spiritual sword; that is, it never should defend any cause opposed to the law of God; of which law, the church, and the Pope, as head of that church, has the right of judging. But if Pope Boniface in the bull Unam Sanctam did really assume jure divino the right of interfering in the temporalities of princes, we hold that he erred, and for that error, he alone is answerable.

Could you put the Commissioners in the way of procuring a view of the bull “Unam Sanctam”?—It is found in a work called the Bullarium Romanum, but probably that work does not exist in this country.

Have

Have you ever seen that work?—I have seen it, but have not read it all, as it consists of nearly 100 volumes in folio.

The bulls which it contains must be extremely numerous?—It contains all the authentic bulls of the several Popes.

Published by the authority of the Holy See?—I cannot say by what authority it is published, but I know it exists in the public libraries at Rome.

The Commissioners then understand, that the question about the bull Unam Sanctam stands over for an answer until a reference shall be had to the text of the bull itself?—Independently of a reference to the bull, and without meaning what I now offer as my ultimate answer and explanation, I think that when he says that both the temporal and spiritual swords are in the power of Peter, that he means certainly, first, that the spiritual sword is so in a direct sense, as the Pope has the power of expounding the word of God, and determining matters of faith and governing the church; and that in an indirect manner also the temporal sword ought to be in the power of Saint Peter; for example, if a sovereign were about to make war, and he had any qualms of conscience about that war, whether it was just or not; and if he had thought proper to apply to the Pope, and put him in full possession of the circumstances that led him to make that war, if then the Pope considered that he had not sufficient grounds for making war, and that he would commit an act of injustice in making that war, the Pope would be authorized to give him an advice not to do it; but that would not be by the Pope interfering directly in temporal concerns, it would be merely acceding to any application that might be made to the Pope. Though I do not give that as my answer upon the subject, even that would be enough to explain the difficulty, because in such case the temporal sword would in some degree be subject to the spiritual one, inasmuch as the advice of the church might sway the intentions of any temporal prince.

Was not the bull Unam Sanctam issued, not in answer to any advice sought for by the French king, but in collision with his interest and against his will?—I did not mean the answer I have just given as my ultimate answer, but I said, that even that answer might suffice.

Were we to understand you as meaning by a former answer, that you conceive that it is now morally impossible for the Pope to issue bulls conflicting in any manner with the temporal rights of princes?—I consider that in the present state of things, the Popes will not knowingly issue any bulls to infringe on the temporal rights of princes.

Since what period do you consider that that change, if it be a change, in the practice of the Popes has arisen; the question assumes that a time has existed in which Popes did feel at liberty knowingly to issue bulls that did conflict with the temporal rights of princes?—I consider that for a long time, no Pope has assumed any authority that would infringe upon the temporal rights of sovereigns.

The question is, what is your conception as to the length of that time of which you speak in your last answer; is it half a century, or one century, or two centuries, or what other length of time?—Granting that at any period Popes assumed that power, at least for several years they have put forth no such pretensions.

We wish to know only what is your general impression upon the subject; we do not seek to fix you to any limited time; do you conceive that within the last century that right has been assumed?—Being on oath, I feel unwilling to mention any precise number of years.

You have spoken of the Lateran councils, to which it has been imputed that they assumed the right of deposing monarchs under certain circumstances; do you not conceive that those decrees, whatever they may have been, expressed the principle of the Roman Catholic church at the time the decrees were made, that is, the principle that in a possible case, a council, however constituted, might depose a king?—I consider that the councils referred to, by no means expressed the principle that any council had the power from God of deposing a king.

Are we misinformed, or in error, in supposing that in the 27th chapter of the 3d council of Lateran, there is the following passage: "that all those who are any way bound to heretics, should consider themselves absolved from all allegiance or obedience due to them, so long as they persist in their iniquity?"—I have observed in a former answer, that the enactments of that council, inasmuch as they regard heretics, are to be considered as parliamentary decrees, emanating from princes or temporal lords, who in unison with the bishops, decreed temporal punishments against the Albigenses, the Valdenses, and other heretics, who not only erred in matters of religion, but also committed excessive cruelties on those who rejected their principles. As the accuracy of this statement can be ascertained by consulting authentic history, I see no reason for concluding that the council, inasmuch as it represented the church, assumed any right of interfering in temporalities.

Will you point out what you consider to be an authentic text of the canon of the third Lateran Council, also the fourth Lateran Council, and also the Council of Constance, to which you have referred respecting John Huss. The Commissioners have received from the library of Maynooth, a book intitled, "Binnii Concilia," in four very large volumes, and they presume that the canons of those councils will be found in those volumes?—I understand that some of the canons referred to are not found in the volumes just mentioned.

Cannot you state the name of any author, who is considered by Roman Catholic authorities, to have stated the text of the canons of the councils correctly?—Bini or Binius, has given an edition of the councils in 4 vols. in folio. Richard has given an analysis of them in 5 vols. quarto. Hardouin has also given a collection consisting of 12 vols. in folio; but I believe that the most esteemed collection of the Councils is that published by Labbe in 17 vols. folio.

Rev.W. Higgins, D. D.
30 October 1826.

Were we to collect from a former answer which you gave, that it is your opinion that the things handed down by tradition in the Roman Catholic church, were originally revealed by God?—Undoubtedly.

All matters comprized in the traditions of the church?—I mean to say, that any tradition, on which we found an article of faith, must have had its origin in divine revelation; for example, that children recently born may be baptized, we hold by tradition, not by scripture; and we hold, that that truth has been handed down to us, because it was revealed to the primitive Christians.

Could you furnish the Commissioners with any definition as to the distinction between the power of the Pope in spiritual and in temporal concerns, such as they could apply to any case that might arise of doubt as to which class any particular subject matter might belong?—I think that it is a fair statement to say, that the Pope has received from God, as head of the church, the power of governing that church in spiritualities, and I am sure that this notion well established would direct any Catholic, or any other person, as to the application of the Pope's particular decrees; for if we find that a Pope issue a decree, which would seem to go beyond that general right which he received of governing the church, we should conclude that he exceeded the bounds of the authority given him by God.

Do not you conceive that an occasion may arise in which it might become matter of grave and serious doubt, whether the case referred to spiritualities or temporalities?—Will the Commissioners have the goodness to put such a case.

Particular cases may be put hereafter; at present the question is, whether you can suggest any general rule?—If it is meant to ask, whether it is possible in the nature of things, that the Pope in his particular mandates would clash with the temporal rights of a sovereign, I think the answer has been sufficiently given on a former occasion; but if it is meant otherwise, I do not understand what is meant.

The question is, whether any general rule can be laid down, any principle suggested, any test, any criterion, by which it might be decided, whether the subject matter of a bull related to things spiritual or to things temporal?—I can conceive no difficulty in ascertaining whether any particular bull relate to things temporal or spiritual. The only necessary qualification for this purpose is to understand the Latin language in which those documents are generally written; and by giving the words their natural meaning, it is not very difficult to understand whether they treat of temporal or spiritual concerns. But if the meaning of any phrases should seem ambiguous, we should take them rather in a spiritual than in a temporal sense; as we hold that the Pope, out of his own dominions, has no right to temporal interference.

You have spoken of a work called the Bullarium Romanum, have you seen another work, being a collection of the bulls of Pope Benedict XIV. issued in the middle of the last century, in four folios, edited by himself, and to which he has written a preface, and which was printed by the types of the college of the Propaganda, as is stated in the preface by the orders of the Pope?—I know there is a work of that nature called the Bullarium of Benedict XIV.

Did not the pontificate of Benedict XIV. occupy the middle of the 18th century?—It did.

What do you understand by the term the “royalties of Saint Peter,” as expressed in the oath taken by a Roman Catholic bishop?—The terms Regalia Sancti Petri as expressed in the oath taken by Roman Catholic bishops, mean the temporal honors, possessions, and prerogatives of the Pope in his own dominions. They are taken in the same sense as the Patrimonium Sancti Petri. This is the meaning attached to those words by Van Espen, Zalingher, and all other canonists.

Did you ever hear the words employed at Rome, “Regalia Sancti Petri”?—I may have heard them there, but I cannot say at present whether I heard them more frequently used in that city than elsewhere.

In the Tractatus de Ecclesia, at the 149th page, and the pages following, we find these words; it is laid down as a general proposition, “Ecclesia dispersa est infallibilis. Probatur, 1° ex Scripturis, Probatur 2° ex Traditione, Probatur 3° ex praxi Ecclesiæ;” will you be so good as to explain your view of the meaning and extent of that proposition?—Catholics maintain that the church enjoys the precious gift of infallibility, whether dispersed all over the christian world, or represented in a general council. Christ was pleased to confer this privilege on his church, which he acquired by his own blood, in order that she might be able to preserve pure to the end of time that faith which he established; and to guide men in matters of eternal moment, that they might not be carried away by every wind of doctrine, as too many are at the present day, who prefer their own judgments to the decisions of the church; and consequently run into those absurdities that disgrace christianity and common sense. By virtue of this infallibility of the dispersed church, she cannot allow any error in faith to taint the majority of her children; and in consequence of this same infallibility, some bulls of the Popes may become articles of Catholic faith by receiving the tacit consent and approbation of the church.

In what manner has the church in its dispersed state, the opportunity of confirming tacitly or by assent?—The Pope, for example, may issue a bull concerning some new doctrine, and declare to the universal church that this doctrine is heretical; and after his decision is made known to all the bishops, or a majority of the bishops of the world, if they receive his decree without reclaiming within a reasonable time, they are supposed to have consented, and it becomes of faith that the condemned doctrine is heretical; the same principle is applicable to the decrees of council of whose oecumenicity there might be any well-founded doubts. In a word, any doctrine, either of a particular council, or Pope, may become of faith in the manner just explained.

That is, unless there was a positive reclamation against it on the part of the bishops?—Yes, but it must be recollected that it requires a considerable time, a time morally sufficient for the bishop to reclaim, if they thought proper.

Are we right in supposing that if the Pope pronounces his judgment upon a matter of faith, and that is made known to the Roman Catholic world, and the bishops, or a majority of the bishops, within a reasonable time, do not reclaim against it, the judgment of the Pope in that respect is infallible?—In that case the decision given is infallibly true, not as coming from the Pope, but as having received the approbation of the church.

Are we to collect that it is your view, that it is not an article of faith with Roman Catholics, that the judgment of the Pope pronouncing upon a matter of faith is infallible, unless it becomes confirmed, as you have described, by the tacit assent of the dispersed church?—No matter in what manner or under what circumstances the Pope may pronounce on matters of faith, though we treat his decisions with much respect, still, without the approbation of the church, either represented in a general council, or in its dispersed state, it is no article of Catholic faith to believe that his judgment is infallible.

The oath of allegiance states very properly, that it is not an article of the Catholic faith that the Pope is infallible, but you see that there is a clear distinction between its being a necessary article of faith, that he is infallible, and the matter of fact that Roman Catholics do very many of them believe him to be infallible. We wish to ask you, whether you have any doubt that a great proportion of Roman Catholics do believe him to be infallible when speaking ex cathedra, in matters of faith, before any positive or tacit consent of the church has been given?—I have no doubt that there are many Roman Catholics who hold that the Pope, when he solemnly pronounces on matters of faith, ex cathedra, is infallible.

You have stated that in those instances in which Popes have assumed, or endeavoured to exercise a right of deposing kings, or otherwise interfering with temporal rights, they have not stated their jus divinum as the ground of such assumption or exercise; have they in those instances to which you refer, or in any instances you can mention, stated, or does it appear clearly from the bull or decree, what the ground was upon which they claimed the exercise of such a right?—In my answers, I granted that some Popes may seem to have claimed a right jure divino of interfering with temporal concerns; but I must now repeat what I then stated, that in no instance did they solemnly decree, or require the faithful to believe, that the jus divinum was the ground of the right which they may have assumed.

Is it not an undisputed doctrine of the Roman Catholic church, that the Pope's power in what is purely spiritual is co-extensive with that which was committed to St. Peter by our Saviour?—As Catholics believe the Pope to be the legitimate successor of St. Peter, who was chief of the Apostles, they also maintain, that in matters of a spiritual nature, his power is commensurate to that of St. Peter; and that he enjoys, as the prince of the apostles did, the power of governing the universal church. Catholics, however, do not attribute to the Pope that infallibility which St. Peter enjoyed as an inspired writer, and immediate apostle of Christ.

Is it a point of doubt to that extent, and in that particular case, whether the Pope's power is commensurate to that which was entrusted to St. Peter?—In spiritual matters, with the exception just mentioned, I have no reason to doubt that the Pope has equal power in governing the church.

In what doctrine or decree of the church is the exception made, with respect to the infallibility of the Pope not being conferred along with all other spiritual jurisdiction?—I am not aware that it is made in any decree of the church.

Are we to infer therefore that the jurisdiction vested in and continued with the successors of St. Peter, was not in all points the same as that which he received?—I mean to say, that with the exception I have already stated, that is the point of doubt respecting the infallibility of the Pope; he enjoys the same jurisdiction in spiritual things as God was pleased to confer on St. Peter, because he has in fact the same necessity for it, as he, like St. Peter, governs the church.

But at the same time, that he is liable to err in the exercise of that jurisdiction?—Some divines hold, that he is liable to err in every shape; other divines hold, that when he speaks ex cathedra, that is, as the universal pastor of the church, and defining matters of faith, in such cases, he is infallible.

Those who hold that he is liable to err, may therefore conceive that a particular Pope may, in particular instances, have assumed a power as belonging to him in spirituals, which in fact is not a power in spirituals but in something else?—Those who hold that the Pope is fallible, must hold as the natural consequence of their opinion, that by possibility he may assume, even in spirituals, a right which would not belong to him, and on such occasions would be liable to the correction of the universal church.

In case a Pope should therefore declare a particular article of doctrine, as being an article of faith, to be received by all Catholics, is it still competent for the individual members of the church, without heresy, to consider whether that is a doctrine of faith, or not a doctrine of faith?—When the Pope proposes any doctrine to be believed, every individual may, without incurring heresy, examine the truth or falsehood of such doctrine, until it receives the approbation of the church; but this once obtained, we are no longer allowed to hesitate in believing it.

30 October 1826.

You have said that the power committed to St. Peter and to his successors, was of the same nature, and over the same subjects as that which was exercised by our Saviour himself when upon earth; and that this is to be discovered from the revealed word of God; is it competent, therefore, for a member of the Roman Catholic church to consider, whether the power or superintendence or jurisdiction exercised by a particular Pope, is conformable to scripture or not?—When a Pope issues a bull, no matter what that bull may regard, a Catholic, without incurring the note of heresy, may examine whether the Pope in such bull acts conformably with the scripture or not; but if it be confirmed by the tacit consent of the church, a Catholic would be no longer at liberty to doubt of its truth, if it regarded faith.

Would it be competent for him to examine whether it regarded faith or not?—Before the consent of the church determined it to be of faith, he might freely discuss its merits, but afterwards he might merely examine it, however not with an intention of dissenting.

When you stated that our Lord left to St. Peter, and through him to the Pope, only such power as our Lord himself exercised, your answer had reference to a question, whether he gave him power over the temporal concerns of men, but you did not thereby mean to say, that our Lord gave to St. Peter and to every successive Pope the divine principle which animated himself?—No, I could not be presumed to give such an answer.

You hold, as all Christians do, that our Lord himself could not err or sin in any respect?—No doubt; as I believe that our Saviour is God as well as man; I must have very wrong notions of the divinity, if I admitted that he could either err or sin.

You do not mean to say, that he meant to give any such power to St. Peter, or to his successors, but only to say, that he did not extend any power to them, beyond the power he exercised himself?—Certainly.

Roman Catholics and members of the Established church, and all who hold the divine inspiration of the sacred Scriptures, understand that the Apostles, each and every of them, in propounding the faith, was infallible?—Undoubtedly.

But it has never entered into any persons mind therefore to consider, that every bishop who is held in every church which has bishops, to be a successor of the Apostles, was infallible?—I stated at an early stage of the examination, that each of the Apostles immediately received the gift of infallibility from God, and I also stated, that it was a matter of great doubt, whether that infallibility, even when in pronouncing on matters of faith, devolved upon the Pope. I never asserted, that the same infallibility devolved upon other bishops.

The Roman Catholic doctrine with respect to the perpetual infallibility, is rested upon the passage of Scripture, where our Lord promises to be with the church to the end of the world?—That is one of the passages brought forward to prove it.

That is understood to be a promise given to the whole church?—Our Lord's promise of being in a special manner with his church. The text is, "Go, teach all nations; and behold I shall be with you to the end of time." This promise was made to the Apostles, inasmuch as they were teachers or doctors; and as they were not to continue in that capacity to the end of time, the divine promise must have included their successors. Therefore, Christ promised to be in a particular manner with the Apostles and their lawful successors for ever; but it cannot be supposed, that he would thus be present with any body of men who could teach errors in matters of eternal importance.

Roman Catholics, in holding that the Pope is infallible, attribute infallibility to him, not upon the principle, that infallibility was given to each of the Apostles, and that he is the successor of one of them, but upon the principle that infallibility was given to the church, and that he represents the church?—The Catholics who hold that the Pope is infallible, by no means maintain that he enjoys that gift, as the mere successor to an Apostle, but because he succeeds to St. Peter, who was the Prince of the Apostles, and that he, like St. Peter, was promised it, and needs it in the government of the universal church.

Considering that St. Peter was the supreme head of the church, and that he was to have a successor, who was also to be the supreme head of the church, they hold, that that attribute of infallibility was to be transferred to his successors, though not to the successor of any other of the Apostles?—Those who do hold the infallibility of the Pope, maintain it on that ground.

Will you state the nature and extent of the University of Rome, which you mentioned in the early part of your examination?—The University of Rome is a large building for the purpose of admitting a great number of students to lecture; but, as far as I am aware, no professor or student, lives in it. The different sciences are taught by a great number of very learned professors, and I should think the students amount to nearly 2,000. I cannot, however, state with accuracy what the precise number may be.

Do the students reside in colleges in Rome?—The ecclesiastical students chiefly reside in colleges; the others may reside where they think proper.

There are several colleges in Rome that receive students, are there not?—There are several colleges that receive students.

Are the students in those colleges, all, more or less, in the habit of attending the lectures given in the University?—Not all.

Was the college, at which you were in Rome, an Irish college?—No; it was an Italian college.

Is there an Irish college in Rome?—There was no Irish college in Rome in my time; there were some Irish convents.

Were all the inmates of the college, of which you were a member, intended for the ecclesiastical siastical profession?—Some of them entered merely to receive a secular education ; but it sometimes occurred, that those persons embraced the ecclesiastical state afterwards.

Were you in priest's orders when you were in Rome?—I was ; I had received priest's orders in Paris, where I had also compleated my studies, before going to Rome.

Is there an Irish college now in Paris?—There is.

Have you any means of knowing the number of students that may be in it at present?—I can, by approximation, tell the number ; probably there are now sixty or upwards.

Are the greater part of those intended for the Roman Catholic ministry in this country?—They are all intended for it, as far as I am aware.

Are you aware of the particular reason that has induced those individuals to prefer resorting, at what may be supposed to be an increased expense, to Paris, for education, rather than going to Maynooth?—I cannot answer for the individual motives of those persons ; but I think it may be presumed that some go to acquire a knowledge of the French language, which they could not so perfectly acquire in Ireland ; others may be desirous of seeing strange countries, and they may have other motives of which I am not aware.

Are the majority of the inmates of the Irish college at Paris, in priest's orders?—When a student becomes a priest, he is obliged after a very short time, to leave the college ; because the nature of the establishment excludes priests ; but there may be many in deacon's orders.

Is the rule of discipline in general, as strict in the Irish college in Paris, as it is at Maynooth?—I am not perfectly acquainted with the system of discipline at Maynooth ; but as far as I have been able to observe, I think they are pretty much the same.

Is the difficulty of going forth from the college as great in Paris as it is at Maynooth?—The way of going out into the city from the college, is to apply to some competent superior ; he examines the motives that the student sets forth, if he considers them reasonable, he allows him to go out ; if not, he obliges him to stop at home.

Do they, in fact, go into the city without that permission?—I am not aware of what abuses may occur ; but if a student went to the city without permission, he would be considered as transgressing the rule.

What is your own experience, as to the matter of fact, upon that subject?—I cannot state that I have ever known any student to go to Paris without asking permission.

Are the professors in the college generally French or Irish?—The professors are sometimes Irish and sometimes French.

Are there both in the college?—It sometimes happens that they are exclusively Irish ; and at other times they may be both French and Irish.

By whom are they appointed?—By the President of the college.

Who appoints the President of the college?—The President receives his ultimate appointment from the King of France.

Who recommends him in the first instance?—I am not aware what recommendation any president has received, to be appointed.

Is there no rule that his appointment is to commence with any person, other than the King of France?—If the King of France wished to act absolutely, he might appoint to the Presidency of the college, any Irish ecclesiastic that he may judge fit for the situation ; but it is my belief, that he does not appoint any one, who is not recommended by some clerical authority in Ireland.

Are we to understand, that it is an Irish ecclesiastic, as distinguished from a French ecclesiastic, that must be appointed?—No doubt.

Does the course of education in the University of Paris differ materially from that at Maynooth?—It is natural to suppose, that in Maynooth, where the different Professors, according to the present system, are all paid by the college, they cannot be in so great a number as in the university of Paris, where they are most liberally paid by government ; and in this respect the course of education is much more extensive in the university. But if I am asked as to the relative merits of the professors of both establishments, I can only say, that I am not sufficiently acquainted with the gentlemen of Maynooth to institute a comparison. I must observe, however, that the encouragement given by the government to the professors of Paris, is a powerful motive, why they should retain their professorships for a long time, and consequently become clever in their respective departments.

What number of years do they remain in the university of Paris?—The ecclesiastical part of the university of Paris has not been in its splendour for some time. I understand they are now re-establishing it, and what number of years they may require students to remain I am not aware of ; but as to the secular portion of the university, a student stops there as long as he thinks proper.

Do you think it possible that the faculties of the young men would enable them to comprehend a wider range of study in five years than that which is laid down at Maynooth, according to the present system?—I think that if the question is put with reference to clerical education exclusively, Maynooth affords sufficient opportunities to a young man ; that better opportunities are afforded in foreign universities I believe is generally allowed.

Do you think it would be possible to comprehend more than is comprehended at Maynooth in the time?—I think that the system of studies in Maynooth is such as to require very close application from the students to comprehend the matter that is to be studied within the prescribed time.

Are the regulations, with respect to silence, the same in the university of Paris as in Maynooth?—The university of Paris is a very extensive establishment—it is not confined to any particular house or building, it comprises all the royal institutions for education in

Appendix, N° 35.

France; hence I would require to know the particular discipline of all these institutions before I could answer the question.

Are the young men, educated for the clerical profession in France, subject to the same discipline with regard to the observance of silence as they are at Maynooth?—The clerical students who attend lectures at the university of Paris, generally reside in colleges, and in those establishments they are obliged to be equally observant of silence, during study hours, as the students of Maynooth.

Do the students in the Irish college at Paris attend the lectures in the university?—The clerical university, properly speaking, is not yet organized, and hence they have not yet an opportunity of attending; but still there are lectures delivered by way of continuation of the ancient Sorbonne, and I believe they sometimes attend those lectures.

When you were in the Irish college, did you attend any lectures given, not in the college but in the university?—Whilst I was in the college I never attended any lectures given in the university on clerical subjects, but I had attended them before going there.

Speaking of the times before the Revolution, was it the habit of the students at the Irish college to attend the lectures given in the university?—It was usual with some of them to attend.

Are the two buildings near to each other?—They are convenient to each other.

Had the students in the Irish college any lectures of their own, distinct from those delivered in the university?—After attending the lectures in the university, when they came home, there was another professor, whose business it was to see that they had well attended to the lecture at the university, and to make them account to him for the duty of the day.

Was their attendance upon the lectures in the university confined to the lectures in theology, or did it extend to the lectures in mathematics and natural philosophy, and other matters?—I should think it extended to all.

When you were in Paris were there lectures delivered in the university upon natural philosophy?—There were.

Was it the habit of the students in the Irish college to attend upon those lectures?—It was not habitual with the students of the college to go; but I went sometimes myself.

Can you form any general opinion as to the probable number of students in the university of Paris itself?—As the university of Paris comprehends the schools of law, medicine, theology, and many other departments, probably there may be five or six thousand; I should think there is at least that number.

Are there any students or professors living in the building which is denominated the University?—There is no one building denominated the University of Paris; but that portion of the university which was called Sorbonne, and which is a very extensive building, formerly lodged the professors; whether they live there now or not, I cannot say.

Do the majority of the students who attend the lectures of the university, live in colleges?—Those who attend the clerical lectures in the university, with very few exceptions, always live in colleges.

May any stranger, casually resident in Paris, attend the lectures of the university?—In Paris, as well as every other part of the Continent, where I have been, strangers are admitted to attend lectures with as much facility as natives are.

Are they not required to pay in such cases?—They are required to pay nothing, unless they wish to graduate, and at the time of receiving decrees, there is a trifling expense to be incurred to pay the clerks who write the diploma, &c.

Who is the lecturer in natural philosophy in the university of Paris?—In my time it was M. Thenard, and there was another, M. Biot, who is now dead.

Have they very fine collections of specimens and apparatus and machinery for the purposes of the lectures?—The machinery is not very extensive, if compared with the numbers that attend, but they have got machinery.

Is there any recourse had to the Museum of the Jardin des Plantes by the lecturer?—There are public lectures given in the Jardin des Plantes by M. Cuvier.

Is that by him as a professor of the university?—I am not aware that it is, I should rather think it is not; for I recollect that Abbe Haué also gave lectures on mineralogy, and I know that he did not belong to the number of professors of the university.

Were there any printed class books of theology employed in the Irish college in Paris?—The class book of theology employed in my time was Bailly.

Is it the same Bailly's "Theologia Moralis" that is employed at Maynooth?—The very same.

Does Bailly's printed treatise include dogmatic theology?—It includes both dogmatic and moral theology.

At what time did Bailly live?—He has been dead now about seventeen or eighteen years.

Do you know from what books principally Bailly extracted his course?—He extracted from the holy fathers, from the existing theologians, from councils and from other sources.

Did he form his work chiefly out of the works of particular theologians, in preference to others?—I am not aware that he followed one author more closely than another.

Do you know to what part of France he belonged?—I believe he belonged to Dijon.

Was it not the habit of the French university for the professors to deliver their lectures from written memoranda, and not from printed books?—All the clerical lectures that I attended in the French university were not delivered from such documents; they were delivered by the professors, probably after having consulted different authors upon the subject.

Were they delivered extempore?—They were delivered without the assistance of any written memorandum.

Were

Were the students expected to prepare themselves through the medium of any particular printed books for the subject matter of those lectures?—As the students who came there were from different colleges, each student prepared himself, probably by the Class Book used in his house; however, he was at liberty to consult other authorized authors.

Was the mode of delivering public lectures the same in the university of Rome as you have just described to be adopted in Paris?—In my time at the university of Rome, our clerical professor dictated from a written document; but I understand the present Pope has abolished that mode, and requires the professor to confine himself to an exposition of some authorized Class Book; the professor studies his matter, and whatever point he considers difficult, he verbally explains to the students.

Will you describe the nature of any lectures that may have related more particularly to the scriptures in the Irish college in Paris. Was there a professor of sacred scripture?—There was one of the gentlemen of the house, the Vice-president, who explained the scriptures; I did not attend his class, and I cannot say what his mode of explanation was, but I presume that he consulted the authorized commentators, and gave out the substance of what he read.

Was there a professor of sacred scripture at the university of Rome?—Yes.

Can you describe the general nature of the course of his lectures?—He explains and marks out for the students a certain portion of scripture, and in a succeeding class, he both interrogates the students, and explains the difficult passages.

What part of the scripture does he principally select for the subject of the exposition?—He explains the whole Bible, perhaps not beginning with Genesis, but I believe he omits no part.

Are all the divinity students in the university of Rome required to attend his class?—I do not know if there is any particular obligation, but I know that most of them do attend.

Appendix, N° 36.

The Right Reverend Dr. Mac Hale, Bishop of Maronia, and Coadjutor Bishop of Killala, sworn, and Examined.—Friday, 3d November 1826.

PRAY state what is the origin of the title of Bishop of Maronia?—It was a see which was possessed formerly by Catholic bishops, until it came into the possession of the Turks; now of course there is none; and when there is a coadjutor bishop appointed to any bishop, in consequence of infirmity or age, he gets the title of bishop in partibus infidelium.

The Commissioners understand that you at one time filled one of the professors chairs at Maynooth?—I did.

You did so till a very late period?—Until June or July 1825.

You held it about five years?—I held the situation of professor for five years. I was first lecturer or assistant to Dr. Delahogue for six years, and then I became professor on his resignation; altogether I delivered lectures for eleven years. Dr. Delahogue was feeble. I used to give lectures at a certain time of the day, and Dr. Delahogue used to give others; and when he was ill I filled his place.

Were you at all connected with the college previously to that?—I had been student there seven years before.

From what diocese were you recommended?—From the diocese of Killala.

At what place of education had you been previously to being admitted into Maynooth?—At Castlebar.

How long were you there?—I should think nearly two years.

Into what class did you enter at Maynooth?—Into the second class of humanity.

Had you, in the short space of two years, been able to acquire so much acquaintance with the Greek and Latin languages as to enable you to be placed in the second class of humanity?—Yes; I do not think the time was much longer than two years; I was reading classics in a country school for six months before I went to Castlebar.

Has any part of your study been in foreign countries?—No, I have never been on the Continent.

At the time you were a student at Maynooth, did the Dunboyne class exist?—It was established, but it had not acquired that regular settled form which it has at present.

Were you elected to it?—Never; there were but few students on the Dunboyne establishment at the time that I finished my studies. I was elected lecturer immediately after finishing my studies, without passing through the Dunboyne establishment.

You did not go out of the college?—No, I filled no situation on the mission.

During the time you were a student in the college, were you acquainted with another student whose name was Dixon?—Yes.

Who afterwards conformed to the established church?—Yes. I recollect him well.

Was he nearly of the same standing as yourself?—No, he was not in the same class with me in the commencement; but afterwards, when I was near the end of my studies, he came for about two months into the class of theology. I think that was about the period that he and I were in the same class, and read under the same professor.

We have been informed that the students do not in general associate promiscuously with the other students, but are divided in some degree into small sets in fellowship with each other, and that their companions are selected for them; was that so at the time you were there?—I cannot say with regard to the present habits of association; but I know when I was a student in the college I did associate indiscriminately with the students from all parts of the country; I had as attached friends from the most distant parts of the country as from my own; I had only a slight acquaintance with Mr. Dixon.

Were you in the habit of mixing with the same class of students that Mr. Dixon happened to associate with?—I do not know that I happened to mix so much with them, because identity of pursuits and similarity of studies is perhaps a stronger link of connection than any other circumstance.

Had you so little in common with Mr. Dixon, that you did not associate much with him?—I might have walked with him occasionally at the time of recreation, but not so often as with others.

We believe that he was connected with the same part of the country from which you came?—Yes, we were from the same diocese.

Do you know any thing of the parish to which he was appointed after he left the college?—I think he was never appointed to a parish; he was never a parish priest.

What means have you of knowing that?—I know it from the bishop, Dr. Waldron; I have been told by Dr. Waldron, as well as I recollect, that he had never been collated to a parish; he might have been, but as far as I know, he was not.

Could not that matter be easily ascertained?—It could be easily ascertained from Dr. Waldron.

Do you happen to know the particular parish with which, in some way, he appears to have been connected as a priest?—Yes, I do; I have been there about two months ago. My duty as assistant bishop to promulgate the jubilee in that quarter brought me there.

What is the name of the parish?—The name of it is Kilmore Erris.

Who is the parish priest of it at present?—The Rev. Mr. Lyons; he is parish priest of both the parish that Mr. Dixon was in and a neighbouring parish. Mr. Dixon had not that entire; he had only a part of that parish.

Do you know what the situation held by Mr. Dixon in that parish might have been worth annually?—I can furnish the Commissioners with the means of ascertaining that: I believe the whole district which was possessed, both by Mr. Dixon (for he was not parish priest there) and the gentleman to whom he was assistant, might be worth 100*l.* a year between the two.

Do you feel confident, from the local knowledge you have of the parish, that that was the case?—As far as I know it was the case; there was a young man there lately on much more independent terms than Mr. Dixon; he had the entire district to himself of which Mr. Dixon was appointed assistant; and he preferred leaving that district and coming out to the interior of the country, to the parish of Ballina, where he was my curate for the last year, and I gave him only 30*l.* a year: he preferred that to the whole emolument that was divided between Mr. Dixon and the other before; and I heard his fellow curate at Ballina say, that the situation of the Rev. Mr. Conway, who was there, was worth about 100*l.* a year.

You know that Mr. Dixon afterwards conformed to the established church?—Yes.

Were there any particular circumstances connected with that conversion?—There were a great many complaints preferred against Mr. Dixon, which reached the bishop's ears. He behaved cautiously, and at the same time with lenity towards Mr. Dixon. Having found those complaints were more frequently repeated, then he thought it his duty to send for Mr. Dixon to have the matter investigated canonically. Mr. Dixon did pretend to be on his way to Ballina, where the bishop resides, and after having come within six or seven miles of Ballina, to the small town of Crossmolina, he went to Killala, and there I understand conformed to the established religion; but he was, or pretended to be, at that time on his way to Ballina, where a process of inquiry was to be instituted against him for those charges. There were different charges against him; there were charges of eating meat on Fridays and Saturdays while he was a clergyman of the Catholic church; there were also charges of a levity of manner, and also of dress quite unbecoming the clerical character; there were some others; I know not whether they could have been substantiated; that he was in the habit of eating his breakfast before mass; there were also charges that he defrauded the parish priest to whom he was assistant of his dues; it was said he was performing marriages, which he was not authorized to perform but with the express consent of the parish priest; and I believe that charge has been well sustained. He has not paid the bishop nor the parish priest the marriage fees he received; the amount, I heard, was about forty guineas.

Is Dr. Waldron at present in a state of health to perform the duties of the see?—He is not.

Do you think that his health is such that he would be able to attend before the Commissioners?—I think not; but he would furnish them with any information very willingly.

Is not the parish of Kilmore Erris the largest in the diocese of Killala?—I dare say it may be at present, but Mr. Dixon was neither parish priest of the entire, nor assistant in the entire; it was at that time divided into two parishes.

What were their names?—Kilmore Erris; I dare say North and South.

Was he assistant in Kilmore North or Kilmore South?—Kilmore North.

Was not Kilmore North in itself considerably larger than almost any other parish in the diocese of Killala?—No; in speaking of the size of a parish I always refer to population more than to territory.

How long ago is it since Mr. Dixon conformed to the established church?—I could not say precisely.

Is it not at least eight years ago?—I should think it is.

In what manner did you become informed of the particulars you have stated to us, especially as to the nature of the charges that were preferred against Mr. Dixon?—From frequent conversations with Dr. Waldron, the bishop.

Had you any recent conversation with him upon that subject?—I had a very recent conversation.

Was Dr. Waldron the bishop at the time that Mr. Dixon conformed?—Yes.

If you suppose Mr. Dixon to have come to a conclusion that the Roman Catholic religion was erroneous for some short time previous to his conformity to the established church, do not you think it very natural that he should allow himself to eat meat on Fridays, and to have breakfasted in the morning before the performance of mass?—It might be very natural for a hypocrite to do so, but I do not think it would be natural for a man of principle to profess one religion and to practise another.

But may he not have been at that time in a state of transition from one to the other?—I do not know what the state of his mind was, but I should think that any person who professes a religion is bound to practise that religion.

Did you ever hear from Dr. Waldron whether at the time that those charges were preferred against Mr. Dixon, it was not a matter of notoriety that his views were no longer compatible with his continuing in the Roman Catholic church?—If it had been a matter of notoriety, I dare say Dr. Waldron would have suspended him earlier; there were reports, and those reports Dr. Waldron took as early notice of as he thought compatible with the double duty he owed to Mr. Dixon as a father, and to the church as a bishop.

Can you say whether it was not a matter known to Dr. Waldron and the persons that preferred those charges, that Mr. Dixon was about to conform to the established church at the time when the charges were preferred?—I do not know whether they thought that he was going to conform.

Can you state how long before Mr. Dixon's conformity it was that they first thought of preferring those charges against him?—I can state that for a considerable time before, there were charges preferred against Mr. Dixon, which show that he was not a very proper clergyman, but which at the same time might not have been so enormous or so well established as to warrant the bishop to proceed to harsh steps against him.

You have stated the nature of those charges already?—Some of them.

Will you state any others which you have not stated already?—The others I know only by hearsay; they were charges of coquetry.

With the female sex?—Yes.

Did we understand you rightly that another clergyman has since given up, not merely the preferment that Mr. Dixon held, but also another preferment in addition, in order to acquire 30*l.* a year in lieu of it?—He gave up the entire of what Mr. Dixon and the parish priest to whom Mr. Dixon was assistant had, for a curacy, where he got but a salary of 30*l.* a year, but I cannot insinuate that 30*l.* was more than they had, after stating that he, Mr. Conway, thought himself worth 100*l.* a year.

Are we to infer that it is your opinion that Mr. Dixon had even less than 30*l.* a year out of his preferment?—This is what I state as certain, that I believe the emolument of the entire parish to which he was assistant, was about 100*l.* a year; the regular emolument of the curate or the assistant in that case would be about 30*l.* a year; but I dare say Mr. Dixon made it worth more to himself, because he defrauded the parish priest of his dues: I had it from Dr. Waldron: I am authorized to state it.

But in no possible event could Mr. Dixon have had so much as 100*l.* a year, according to your statement?—No, unless he defrauded the parish priest of the entire of his revenues.

Who was the priest at the time?—He is not living now; he was a Mr. Everard. I state these things as far as I know. I dare say I shall be able to obtain information upon the subject.

Are the funds from which you say that 100*l.* a year might be derived out of the parish of a fixed nature?—They are like all the funds of the Catholic priests.

Do they fluctuate in amount at different periods?—They fluctuate in amount according to the circumstances of the people, as they are prosperous or in poverty.

May there be occasionally funds or profits received which would not be comprehended under the usual dues?—The only ones that I know, not to be numbered among stated dues, are the retributions for masses, which clergymen receive, and which depend on the piety of the people; they are mere voluntary offerings, but the amount of the others too will depend upon the poverty, or wealth, or generosity of the people.

Were the charges you have mentioned as having been preferred against Mr. Dixon investigated and substantiated against him?—No, because he conformed, and thus anticipated the investigation. He was sent for by the bishop. Investigation was quite unnecessary after he had conformed; but the charges were to be investigated.

About how many families do you conceive to have inhabited that district of the parish of Kilmore Erris in which Mr. Dixon officiated?—I should think about seven hundred families.

Pray take a pencil and trace upon the map of Ireland the boundaries of the parish of Kilmore Erris, as nearly as you can—[a map of Ireland being handed to the witness]?—It is easy to trace it, because it is all the peninsula of the Mullet, and to the west of Belmullet.

Then we are to understand that Mr. Dixon did not officiate in any part of the country to the east of the isthmus of Belmullet?—As far as I apprehend he did not. There is a circumstance regarding which I will not be positive.—There was a clergyman who was parish priest of South Kilmore Erris until last year, when Mr. Lyons was appointed to the entire Union. I do not know whether this person was not incapacitated in the time of Mr. Dixon, and whether, in consequence, he, Mr. Dixon, might have been casually or pro tempore curate or assistant in the entire parish.

Appendix, N^o 36.
 Examination of
 Rev. Dr. MacHale.

You have said that the parish of Kilmore Erris was divided into North Kilmore Erris and South Kilmore Erris?—Yes, a Mr. Jordan was parish priest of South Kilmore Erris.

Who was parish priest of North Kilmore Erris?—Mr. Everard.

Are we to understand that in point of fact there was another person who was parish priest of the parish in which Mr. Dixon officiated as coadjutor?—Yes.

And that he was only assistant?—Yes.

By assistant, do you mean coadjutor?—The reason I do not say curate is, because if a person becomes superannuated or unfit for his duty, we call the person who attends his parish an administrator rather than a curate. I know not, whether he was administrator or curate, I know he was not parish priest.

We are informed that during a part of the day the students at Maynooth walk in the grounds which are within the walls of the college, for the purpose of refreshment and recreation?—Yes.

During those times we have been told that they converse freely with each other?—Very freely indeed.

Did you mix sufficiently with the students during the latter part of the time you were there to become acquainted with the subjects conversed on by them during the time of such recreation?—When I was a student I naturally became acquainted with the ordinary topics that were discussed by those persons with whom I associated.

A witness who has been examined before the Commissioners, and who had been educated at Maynooth, has described opinions as very general at Maynooth which he expressed as follows: "That any means whereby I could weaken those heretics, who had so unjustly possessed themselves of the church establishment of the country, and reduced to a degraded state that church which I firmly believed to be the mother and mistress of all churches, and out of whose pale there was no salvation, were legitimate. I considered if there were any possible means whereby I could effect this, it would be meritorious in the eyes of God; and with regard to the obligations of the oath of allegiance, I considered that the Pope's authority was sufficient, or that the authority of a general council, if conveyed to me, could set aside the obligation of an oath, and I considered that if the Pope conveyed to me, through any authority, an intimation that I might violate that oath, I could do it with impunity, and I do believe that the ignorant Roman Catholics of Ireland go further than that, and believe that without any delegation, the priest has the power of absolving them from any oath;" were these opinions ordinarily and generally held by the students, and commonly expressed in their hours of recreation, during the time you were a student there?—No, not only not ordinarily, but it is my firm belief they were not even extraordinarily expressed, at least I never knew of any expression of them; I merely answer, no, because if I were to give utterance to what I feel regarding an individual who would express such wilful calumny, it would be very hard to suppress my just indignation against a person who could wilfully asperse any portion of his fellow-subjects in such a manner.

We understand you confidently to assert that such opinions were not held, and further, that they were not expressed as matter of discussion in conversation?—They neither were held nor expressed. The contrary opinions have been inculcated by the professors of the college, and the contrary opinions were imbibed by the students. We never hold that bad means can be justified by the end; the means must be good, and the object must be good.

In the course of instruction delivered by you in your class, did you follow the same system as that which had been pursued by Dr. Delahogue?—Yes, his book was my class-book.

Were the treatises on which you lectured the same that are now in use?—The very same.

And the doctrines in all respects the same?—The doctrine was the same.

What work was lectured from when you were yourself a student?—The very same works that I taught.

Who was the lecturer when you were a student in the college?—Dr. Delahogue, in dogmatic theology; Dr. Anglade, in moral theology.

Was the work that is known by the name of Antoine used in the college as a class-book before those treatises were prepared?—It was, before Bailly was used.

Was it used during a part of the time when you were a student?—It was; I read a part of my course out of it.

Was the doctrine taught in Maynooth then the same in all respects as it has been since the treatises now in use were prepared?—The doctrine was always the same.

Do you know out of what authorities principally Bailly's class-book was compiled?—I cannot say; I have never paid much critical attention to that work; I dare say it was compiled partly out of Colet, another Catholic theologian; I think he used that work.

Have you any reason to believe that he took it principally out of Antoine?—I think there is a greater analogy between Bailly and Colet than between Bailly and Antoine, in style and manner, and arrangement.

Was Colet a French theologian?—Yes, a French theologian of great eminence.

Of what part of France?—I think he was a doctor of the Sorbonne.

The Commissioners find the following proposition laid down in a part of Bailly's class-book, now used in Maynooth, in the second volume of Moral Theology, page 140,— “Propositio.

Appendix, N° 36.

“Existit in Ecclesia potestas dispensandi in Votis et Juramentis.

Examination of
Rev. Dr. Mac Hale.
3 November 1826.

You observe, that it is there laid down in the broadest and most unqualified manner, that there is in the church a power of loosing, not merely from the bonds of sins, but also from the bonds of oaths, and it is there asserted that that can be proved from the 18th chapter of St. Matthew, in which it is stated “Whatsoever things ye shall loose upon earth shall be loosed also in heaven;” do you attach that meaning to the word “solveritis” that is attributed to it in this passage?—Yes, I think that it may be susceptible of the meaning of dispensing from oaths.

Is that the meaning that you attribute to the word “solveritis”?—There may be a primary and a secondary meaning: the primary meaning of it is to release from sins; and by way of inference or deduction, the other construction is put upon it.

The question is, whether you draw that inference or deduction from it?—I think it may be susceptible of it: I do not know whether I would say that I do draw that inference, but I think the text is not forced beyond its natural meaning by drawing such an inference from it.

The question is, whether you have come to the conclusion that that inference is fairly deducible from the text?—I have come to no conclusion myself upon the passage: I believe the conclusion in the text-book. The Commissioners will be pleased to remark, that if I believe a doctrine, and I find that even a General Council which defines it brings a text to prove that doctrine, though I may be bound to acquiesce in the conclusion, I am not at all bound to believe that it is inferable from that text, so that I am not bound to infer with any author that such an inference is deducible from a text. If the doctrine is defined, I believe it, though I may think some of the proofs that are brought forward in support of it not to be very conclusive; for example, the Fathers of the Council of Trent have defined matrimony to be a sacrament, and have referred to the passage of the Apostle (Ephesians) who calls it a great sacrament. No Catholic theologian can controvert the definition, yet they freely canvass whether it can be proved from St. Paul.

Without further investigating whether the doctrine is to be deduced from that particular text, we beg to know whether you believe the doctrine, that is, whether you believe, as is there laid down, that there is in the church a power of dispensing from oaths?—Surely, in the sense the proposition is laid down and explained by the author.

We find that there is no qualification or exception stated in that passage; do you not hold that there are certain limits that are imposed upon that general authority of the church?—There are.

Will you state them?—When I say that the church has the power of dispensing from oaths, I understand that the church is then the interpreter in some measure of the Divine will. If there was an oath or a vow which was impossible in its performance, or which would clash with other duties of a more imperative nature, as there may be sometimes conflicting duties, then the church is only expressing the will of the Almighty himself in releasing a person from the inconvenient obligation of an oath or vow which would trench upon a superior obligation. In laying down then the general proposition, we do not mean of course to say that the church has an arbitrary power, because every power on earth has its limits. Wherever there are superior obligations by which you are bound, either to God or to man, you cannot be dispensed from an oath or vow ratifying those obligations: but there may be conflicting duties. In casuistry the shades between right and wrong may be sometimes so indistinct as not to be seen by an ordinary eye: then the church, being the interpreter of the Divine law, only decides what seems best in the particular case. It is possible even that a dispensation might be inconvenient. We do not consider the church as infallible in granting every dispensation. Those are cases which, as a celebrated theologian (Melchior Cano) remarked, belong to prudence or expediency, and regarding which infallibility is not required.

Is not the church to be the judge of what is expedient or not in a doubtful case?—Yes; and like every other tribunal may be deceived in any particular case. For example, suppose a person has contracted a certain vow, then it is stated to the ecclesiastical superior that there are certain strong reasons why the person should be dispensed from it; there is perhaps a superior obligation, or an impossibility of fulfilling that vow; then, as I already stated, in receiving this testimony, the superiors are liable to error; and if a dispensation were granted on an erroneous supposition it would be invalid, and sinful in him who imposed on the superior to use it. Besides, the inconvenience of pressing the fulfilment of that vow, or of releasing from it, may be so nearly balanced, that it would be hard to decide which would be most expedient. The Pope then, like any other judge, may be sometimes perplexed with contending testimonies and reasons, as the judge upon the bench may find it difficult to know whether he should absolve a criminal or condemn him. If, after every effort to do justice, a guilty person should be absolved, or an innocent person condemned, will any person say that the judge violated his duty, or exceeded the limits of his authority.

Appendix, N° 36.

Examination of
Rev. Dr. Mac Hale.
3 November 1826.

Do we rightly understand you to say, that expediency alone is sufficient to induce a person to dissolve an oath?—No.

Are you not bound and regulated by certain and known rules in deciding as to the possibility of any individual being absolved from the obligation of an oath?—Surely: if I have given to the questions proposed a general answer, it is because it is in conformity with the usual mode of writers; 1st, to announce the general proposition, and then subjoin the qualifications. Bailly, the author in question, illustrates the same practice: for though he states the general proposition that there is in the church a power to dispense from oaths and vows, he subjoins the qualifications, among which I beg leave to cite the following:

Are not those rules stated in the class-book from which you lectured at Maynooth?—I did not lecture upon this subject: they are stated in those books.

Will you be so good as to extract at your leisure those certain and known rules?—The rules regarding the possibility or impossibility of an individual being absolved from his oath might be reduced to those already stated; namely, when a dispensation on oath would interfere with other duties, and principally the rights of others, then a dispensation cannot be obtained. This principle, which is found in every theologian, is thus expressed by St. Thomas: “It is the right of every person to release his own subjects from an oath made to him in matters subject to his own jurisdiction.” On this principle the state can release its subjects from oaths regarding duties over which it has control. The extension of the same principle to the church may solve the difficulties so often proposed about dispensations, since like the state it exercises its authority only in those things that are subject to its control.

We find it laid down in page 145 of that class-book that the following are just causes of dispensation in those cases, videlicet, first, the honour of God; secondly, the utility of the church; thirdly, the common good of the republic; and fourthly, the common good of society. Who is to be the judge of what the utility of the church may require?—The superiors of the church.

Does it not appear there to be laid down as a universal proposition, and without any qualification, that the utility of the church is a just cause for dispensing from oaths?—It is laid down as a proposition, that the utility of the church is a just cause.

In a doubtful case who is to determine whether the utility of the church is such as to require or justify that dispensation or not?—If it is a very doubtful case I am always to presume in favour of the superiors of the church, just as I am always to presume in favour of the judges on the bench.

If any pope should at any time consider that the utility of the church required the dispensing with a certain oath, who is to control him in that act?—If it be one of those particular doubtful cases, such as may often occur in the practical application of the principles of moral science, and I may particularly refer for illustration to the embarrassing cases of marriage, we are then to presume in favour of the superior. But if there are paramount obligations, founded on natural law, or on the Divine law, and which are clearly impressed upon every mind, then we never entertain the question of dispensation, because we know that neither bishop nor pope, nor any power on earth, whatever utility could be derived to the church, can attempt to release a person from an oath confirming those obligations.

The question is, if the Pope should, as it is a matter of fact that he has done in times past, take up an opinion that the utility of the church justified him in dispensing from certain oaths, even of the character you have last described, who is to be the judge whether he rightly interprets the utility of the church in that case or not?—Not only the church, but each one's own reason may judge whether the dispensation would infringe on higher obligations. In order to explain more fully our doctrine of dispensation of oaths, I wish to observe, that there is nothing in our principles at variance with those of sound jurists and civilians of every creed. If any person should take an oath which may clash with the duty which he owed to another, he is absolved from that oath; he is told, you are not bound to fulfil it. Is any power assumed that is contrary to the Divine authority? The church in granting the dispensation only declares to the individual that he has contracted or attempted to contract by that oath an obligation which is contrary to another duty. Every duty springs from God; and as God cannot contradict himself by requiring incompatible duties, the church only interprets the Divine will, while she releases him from the obligation of his oath.

In cases where dispensations from oaths have actually issued, but in which it is doubtful whether they issued properly or not, who is to decide upon the propriety of them, the person to whom the dispensation is granted, or the authority that grants it?—In extraordinary cases, in which ordinary persons are not able to decide, I am always to be directed by the superior. I mean those intricate cases where persons may reason each way, and in which the arguments are so well balanced that it is difficult to decide.

You say that in extraordinary cases the superior is to determine?—In difficult cases. For example, one makes a vow that he shall not eat meat on such days. He considers that by making that vow he is endeavouring to fulfil one of the counsels of the gospel, that of mortification. Sickness is the consequence. The physician declares that if he should comply with that vow it will be pernicious to his health. He consults the superior upon the subject, and he is told that as a member of society, he owes certain duties to society; he may be a magistrate, or a member of Parliament, or some public functionary, who has certain paramount duties to discharge—duties which are derived from the laws of nature, and from the Divine law. The vow is an obligation superinduced by himself, and which was even then conditional; in this sense, that he would not have taken it upon himself, had he known it would trench upon those other duties. Then, in dispensing him from that vow, the superior declares that the Almighty would not bind him to fulfil an inconvenient obligation, which would be destructive of what he owes to the King, or to society, or to his own family.

In these cases then it is the part of a superior to determine whether it is right to dispense or not?—Yes. The reason is, that if every person were to be judge for himself, it might lead to pernicious consequences.

You will observe that all the examples you have put appear to relate to the fourth class of just causes for dispensing with oaths stated here, namely, the good of society; but the Commissioners wish to direct your attention particularly to the second of the four causes, namely, the utility of the church; and the question is, who is to determine whether the absolution from any particular oath would or would not conduce to the utility of the church?—If it is a case in which it is very hard to determine whether the* convenience of observing or of not observing the oath or the vow is greater, then it is the business of the superior to decide, that is, if it does not appear that the dispensation of that oath or vow trenches upon any ascertained duty. But if it appears that it does transgress any such duty, then every person may decide upon it. Hence the conscience of each individual is to be so far the judge, that no one can seek or obtain a dispensation of any oath or vow which would be contrary to the conviction of his conscience.

Can you conceive any case referable to the class of the utility of the church which might be decided upon by the person to whom the dispensation was granted, as contradistinguished from the person who grants the dispensation?—If the Pope from a mistaken zeal for the church (as there have been such instances) should attempt to release subjects from their oath of allegiance, that is one of the cases in which every person may judge for himself that such dispensation is invalid.

Do you hold that the church can err in granting a dispensation?—With regard to granting a dispensation, it may do sometimes what might be better not to have been done, so that it may err in its view of the necessity or expediency of such dispensation. Supposing a person in a Catholic country, who was a younger branch of a royal family, had determined himself to receive holy orders, and had contracted a vow for that purpose; it afterwards happens that the elder branches of that family become extinct; it is foreseen that the country will be shaken by intestine dissensions, and that a revolution will probably be the consequence, if the vow be fulfilled; this appears to be a case in which both the good of the church, and the good of the state, might require that that person should be released from that inconvenient obligation. In doing so the church would only say, this vow is of secondary importance, it is an obligation which you owed to the Almighty, but the Almighty does not require you to fulfil a vow which might be productive of such disastrous consequences to the peace of society as the fulfilment of this vow would produce. In its view of all such cases the church may be deceived without affecting its infallibility with regard to doctrine.

If a person took an oath, the fulfilment of which would be injurious to the temporal interests of the church, would that be held so far to militate against the utility of the church as to be a sufficient cause for dissolving the obligation of it?—It would not be a sufficient cause, because the temporal interest of the church is a matter of secondary importance, compared with the obligation of an oath which binds us to the Almighty.

Are these matters defined by any general councils or any canons of the church?—There are certain great landmarks with regard to duties defined—the duties we owe to kings, sovereigns, persons of subordinate conditions, parents, &c.; but such is the complexity of human affairs, and such is often the conflicting variety of duties, that it will be impossible to determine every case with certainty. If all the cases were already determined, we should have no necessity for tribunals, either ecclesiastical or civil.

Can you point out any passage in any general council, or any canon of any description of the Roman Catholic church, imposing any limit whatever to the dispensing power of the Pope with respect to oaths?—There is no necessity for doing so, because it is so well understood, that such a canon would be unnecessary; because the power of the church, according to St. Paul, is for edification and not for destruction. The church itself will always point out the limit. I might apply a just remark of Burke on the necessary limits of every power, which is in some part of his works, and which he fortifies by the following reference to an ancient writer:

— Finita potestas denique cuique
Quânam sit ratione, atque alte terminus hærens.

His own interest then, and the nature of human affairs, if there were no higher consideration, would impose a limit on the pope's authority.

* Whenever I use the term convenience, it may be necessary to remark, that I always use it in the strict sense of moral fitness, in which it is used in theology, and particularly by that eminent master of the science, S. Thomas.

 Examination of
 Rev. Dr. Mac Hale.
 3 November 1826.

From the nature of those human affairs, may not the same act be for the edification of one party and for the destruction of another?—I speak however of the exercise of his power for the edification of the whole.

Who is to be the judge whether it is for edification or destruction; because some cases can be conceived upon which men might easily differ with respect to that?—If there is a case on which persons might easily differ, then reason itself will allow, that we are to yield to those persons who are supposed to have better lights and more authority. Our doctrines, with regard to the obedience we owe to the church, are always mixed up with the necessary explanations of its extent; so that the limits are generally very well ascertained. In our catechism we have it stated, that we are not obliged to obey parents or any individual in any thing that is contrary to the laws of God.

The present question relates not to obedience but to dispensation, and the question still is, whether any principle of limit has been clothed in language, or suggested to the mind of man, by any act of a council, or by any canon of the church, defining the bounds beyond which the Pope may not go in dispensing from oaths?—I know of no canon; such a canon was unnecessary; the reason is, the bishops in council assembled did not think it wise to be occupied with unnecessary suppositions. They knew very well that the lines of duty were so well defined that every body understands that the Pope could not dispense one from an oath that confirmed any superior obligation.

Have not facts, which are recorded in history, beyond all possible doubt, proved the necessity of such limits being defined?—Yes; extraordinary facts occur in history; and I might say also that the conduct of the Catholics has been in itself a proof that they knew there were limits beyond which the Pope could not go. With regard to fixing the precise limit of dispensation, it would be very hard to define it indeed; but there are ascertained principles, which I mentioned, to guide one; by the application of those principles one is to be directed in every particular case.

Pray state what those principles are?—For example; he cannot release a person from the obligation either of a vow or of an oath, where it would be contrary to the honour that is due to the Almighty, where it would be contrary even to the interests of the state, or where it would be contrary to any other duties which we owe to our neighbour or to ourselves; all which are obligations of paramount importance.

Who is to decide upon that in doubtful cases; is it the Pope, or any body else, who is to decide upon it?—If it be a perplexed case, in which every person is not able to judge, it will be left to the superior, as I have repeatedly stated; but if it be a clear case, then every person's own reason can judge. It is not however to be understood that each one can exercise the power of dispensing.

Many Popes have assumed the power of dispensing with oaths in cases in which it is evident that you would not approve of that being done; can you state any instances in which Popes have, either in their bulls or decretals, or letters, or in any other way, laid down any limit or principle within which they admit that their power was confined in those respects?—A dispensation may be granted in those cases in which the fulfilment of the oath would be contrary to the duties we owe either to God, to our neighbour, or to ourselves. The church is a spiritual society, instituted for the preservation of spiritual order. It is not then the business of any individual to prescribe a limit to the exercise of its power; but certain it is, that the church itself will never transgress those boundaries that have been set to its authority.

Do you trace any analogy in your own mind between the nature and extent of the power of the church with regard to its subjects, and that of the legislature of this country with respect to the constitution?—Yes, I do; the analogy is this; that the church is a spiritual constitution, established by Christ for the preservation of his spiritual kingdom; in the same way that the constitution of England, or the constitution of any country, is established for the preservation of civil order in the realm. Though it might be presumptuous in any individual to attempt to define the precise limits of the powers of Parliament, still, though it is called omnipotent, it has its boundaries, and might enact laws which none would be bound to obey.

Do you mean that the Pope is as omnipotent with respect to spiritual things as the Parliament is with respect to temporal things?—The church is; meaning by omnipotent, the supreme power in spiritual matters.

When you say that the church has the power of dispensing oaths, do not you mean the superiors of the church, and particularly the Pope?—The Pope and the bishops.

In some cases the bishops?—Yes.

But in all the Pope?—Yes; that is, in those cases in which they are dispensable.

Is there any case in which a dispensation can be granted in which the Pope cannot do it of himself, or in which it is necessary that there should be superadded to his power, the power of a bishop?—No, I know not any; he may for his own guidance, if it be a difficult matter, call to his aid the advice of the bishops.

Is not an oath strictly a religious act?—Yes; you call the Almighty to witness.

Does it not therefore fall correctly within the principle of the spiritual jurisdiction of the Pope as distinguished from discipline?—Yes, it does; but at the same time if the dispensation should clash with any defined clear duty which I owe to any authority, I am of course to disregard the dispensation.

You yourself being the judge?—I myself being the judge, if it is a clear case.

Does it happen, in point of practice, that there are frequent applications to persons in high station in the Roman Catholic church, to decide in cases whether oaths are binding or not?—

not?—Very seldom; it happens sometimes, and particularly with regard to vows or religious promises. Suppose a person promised that he shall fast such and such days from motives of piety, and afterwards, perhaps in consequence of weakness or infirmity, he cannot fulfil those obligations, he applies for a dispensation.

Are those applications made to the bishops?—Yes; there is a great analogy, as I have stated, between the civil constitution of any country and the ecclesiastical constitution of the church; as it would be inconvenient to refer to the Pope in every case, of course the constitution of the church requires that that power should reside in the bishop also.

The Commissioners will beg of you to translate for them a sentence that occurs in the first volume of the Class-book of Moral Theology, at Maynooth, at page 231, with respect to dispensations, beginning, “Notandum est primo?”—“It is to be observed, first, that a regard is to be had to the condition of persons; viz. the public weal requires, that the church should be more indulgent to princes and others eminent for their dignity, who on that account shall be more attached to it, and shall more freely give it their patronage or protection.”

Do you think that is a sound principle?—That is not a principle; it is a case which might influence the church to apply more freely a principle of dispensation.

Is it not one of the rules for dispensations recorded in that class-book?—It is recommended that attention should be shown to princes, whose authority must have great influence upon the good of the church, and also upon the repose of society. When I say the good of the church, I do not mean the temporal aggrandizement of the church, but I mean the church in a spiritual sense. I also say that it is just that those persons should be more attended to, who will be more attentive to promote the interest of society, than others who may be hostile to it.

Is it not the plain meaning of the passage, that persons in high station are to receive dispensations upon easier terms than their inferiors; and that for the reason assigned, that they may therefore be more inclined to patronize and assist the church?—I think I have translated the passage.

Do you mean that you do not think that the signification which has just been assigned is the true one?—No; I do not think it signifies upon easier terms.

The expression, you observe, is “plus indulgeat”?—That is, “should be more indulgent,” “should be more ready to grant it,” which would be a different thing from granting it on easier terms.

Suppose a prince had, as you suggested in a former part of your examination, made a vow of celibacy, and that that prince came by right to the crown, and it appeared to him desirable, in that case, that that vow should be dispensed with, in order that he might marry; the engagement he has entered into is an engagement with the church; if then it appeared to the church, that from the services he was likely to render to religion, and which children educated by him would be likely to render to religion, it would be desirable that he should be freed from his engagement, are the Commissioners to understand the meaning of that passage to be this, that in such a case as that, those considerations ought to weigh with the Pope in granting a dispensation?—Certainly; the meaning of it is, that the church would be more ready to grant a dispensation to that person than to another who would be more likely to be hostile to religion.

Could the church in that case, or in any other, grant him a dispensation from an oath or vow, which oath or vow did not contract a new duty, but went to ratify, by calling God to witness his promise, the obligation of a previously subsisting moral duty?—No; whatever he might do, were he to promote ever so far the interest of the church, if he were to be considered as great a benefactor to the church as even Constantine was, she could not grant him a dispensation that would absolve him from an oath or vow, which ratified, by calling God to witness, a previously subsisting obligation.

Does not the rule with respect to dispensations resolve itself very much into this: where an engagement is entered into, which engagement, it appears to the party entering into it, he might, without any violation of the law of God, be dispensed from; that in this case he shall not merely act upon his own opinion, but shall get a dispensation from the church?—Yes; I think I have stated that in the commencement of my evidence.

Are we to understand that in all cases the party seeking the dispensation must in his conscience be satisfied that it is a proper case for the dispensation to be applied to?—If he were not satisfied in his conscience that it was a proper case for obtaining a dispensation, he would sin in using the dispensation.

Does it not then follow, that the rule of the Roman Catholic church with respect to dispensations, instead of affording facilities for the breach of oaths, creates a difficulty in the way of breaking them, by not leaving it to the party to act upon his own judgment, but obliging him to take the opinion of another upon the subject?—Surely: when persons take oaths they do it sometimes rashly, without foreseeing either the impossibility or moral inconvenience of observing them; and such unfortunately is the propensity of man to favour himself, that if it is left to his own decision, he will not only dispense himself from an oath which would not be binding, but he will extend that privilege to another that will be binding; for the latter case, if he refers to a superior authority, he will be taught that there is no dispensation to be obtained.

Will you have the goodness to translate the following passage, respecting dispensations from oaths, from a work intitled “De Juramenti obligatione,” the work of Bishop Sanderson, formerly regius professor of Oxford: “Primo aperte causa justa est, cur non debeat res Juramento promissa præstari, ut si sit impossibilis, turpis, inhonesta, vel quovis modo

illicita: et tunc potest jurans propriâ authoritate, imò verò tenetur retractare quod juravit, non expectatâ Papæ vel alterius cujusquam dispensatione: ubi enim nulla est obligatio, conscientia libera est, nec dispensatione opus est. Vel secundò, aut nulla apparet justa causa cur non servetur fides juramento data; et tunc omninò servanda est: et peccat quisquis dispensationem aut petit aut concedit; quia manet obligatio, quæ humanâ authoritate tolli nec potest nec debet. Vel denique dubia res est, nec satis constat propter aliquas difficultates ex utrâque parte utrum jurans teneatur adimplere quod promisit; et tunc quidem utile erit viros divini juris peritos prudentes et pios consulere, et ex ipsorum sententiâ quid facto est usus statuere.”—“In the first place, there is either evidently a just cause why the thing sworn to ought not to be performed, as if it be impossible, flagitious, immoral, or in any manner illicit—and then the person who swears can by his own authority, nay is bound to retract what he swore, without waiting for the dispensation of the Pope or any other person whatsoever; for where there is no obligation the conscience is free, nor is there any need of dispensation: or, secondly, there appears no just cause why the oath should not be observed, and then it is to be observed entirely, and then whoever grants or asks a dispensation is guilty of sin, because the obligation remains, which cannot nor ought to be annulled by human authority: or, finally, the case is doubtful, nor is it sufficiently clear, on account of difficulties on both sides, whether the person swearing is obliged to fulfil what he promised; and then indeed it will be useful to consult pious and prudent individuals, and who are also skilled in the Divine law, and to determine from their opinion what is to be done.”

Do you perceive any substantial difference between the principle there stated, and the principles which you have opened to the Commissioners as to dispensations, except this, that the bishop here, in a doubtful case, says, you should go to some prudent and pious divine, and that in such cases Roman Catholics will go to a certain ascertained authority—the spiritual director of the individual, the bishop, or, if necessary, the Pope?—None at all.

Do you believe that the principle, that it would be sinful to ask the Pope for a dispensation, and for the Pope to grant a dispensation, which went to violate any moral duty, is a principle generally taught and perfectly well understood at Maynooth College?—It is taught, and distinctly understood, and frequently inculcated.

Will you have the goodness to look at a book intitled “True Piety”—(the same being shown to the witness)?—Is not that prayer book in general use amongst Roman Catholics in Ireland?—Very much so.

Does not that prayer book, in setting forth the principles of Roman Catholics, lay down this principle: “It is a fundamental truth in our religion, that no power on earth can license men to lie, to forswear or perjure themselves, to massacre their neighbours, or destroy their native country, on pretence of promoting the Catholic cause or religion. Furthermore, all pardons or dispensations granted, or pretended to be granted, in order to any such ends or designs, could have no other validity or effect than to add sacrilege and blasphemy to the above-mentioned crimes?”—It does.

Examination of
Rev. Dr. MacHale.
4 November 1826.

IN a bull issued by Benedict the Fourteenth, in the year 1741, beginning with the words, “Pastoralis Romani,” of which the Commissioners have procured a copy, they find in the seventh section an excommunication issued against all persons who assist heretics with warlike means in any war carried on against Catholics. Do you conceive that that relates to spiritual or to temporal matters?—I conceive the meaning of it is very plain; we anathematize and excommunicate all persons who furnish arms to the Saracens, Turks, or heretics, &c. To give a satisfactory explanation on that subject, it may be well to commence by a few clear principles. There is a spiritual authority in the Pope and church, and a temporal authority in our princes; such is the first principle. The second principle is, that those two powers are independent in their respective spheres, and are not to interfere with each other. But it happens that in every country, civil and ecclesiastical concerns approach each other so nearly, that there must be a variety of cases in which it will be very hard for any person to decide to which authority, the civil or the ecclesiastical, such a case belongs. It will not be a ground of reproach or of ignorance that one shall not be able to fix the boundaries between civil and ecclesiastical authority in every instance. The most ingenious lawyers that are in this country might be challenged to fix the boundaries between the civil and ecclesiastical jurisdiction, even with regard to the Protestant church. Having laid down this position, that the two powers are each of them independent, and that they are not to encroach on each other—should I find a case in which any one power would seem to interfere with the independence of the other, that moment I am to reject its interference. I will take those obvious principles to guide me in the construction of that bull, the independent power of the church in spiritual matters, and the independent power of the state in temporal matters. The bull is either very clear, or it is ambiguous, I care not which. If it is clearly confined to spiritual concerns, then it does not trench upon the secular secular power, and there is no difficulty to be resolved. If it clearly encroaches on the supreme civil authority, then I reject it. If it is ambiguous in its expression, I will take the obvious principle to direct me, that the church has nothing to do with the rights of sovereigns; and if it should seem to have such meaning, I will reject that meaning; and whether my king be a pagan, as Nero was when St. Paul preached obedience to him—whether I should consider him to be a heretic, which it would be invidious to apply to any monarch; but, if I believed him to be such, it matters not, I owe allegiance to him founded on the Divine law, which is superior to any ecclesiastical law, and from the obligation of which law no power on earth can release me. It will perhaps still appear to the Commissioners desirable that I should give an explanation of that bull. It will not be expected, I dare say, from the most learned canonist that he should have perused all the bulls that have ever issued from the see of Rome, any more than it would be expected from the most eminent lawyer, that he should have perused all the acts of Parliament that have been passed. Now I find, that in comparatively modern times an incessant war has been carried on, not against the Catholic religion alone, but against Christianity itself, by the Turks—that their fundamental principle is the destruction of Christianity—that theirs is an interminable war, and that they are never content but with universal empire, which was the principle of the great founder of their religion, Mahomet. Hence we find that all the princes of Christendom often confederated against them, lest they should subjugate Europe entirely; then the Pope does not exceed the limits of his spiritual authority in wishing to lend his influence in averting the arms of the Saracens from Europe, as their success would certainly be attended with the most disastrous consequences, not only by extinguishing our religion, but by destroying literature and morals, and every vestige of the Christian name. Besides the Saracens, he mentions heretics: I shall next apply myself to explain the meaning of that part. It happened, both in the Roman states and in other countries, that persons arose like John Huss, or like Wickliffe, who wished to overturn the established authorities. As far as the bull may relate to the Roman states, as the Pope is the temporal sovereign there, he has the like right to exercise that temporal sovereignty as every other temporal sovereign. As far as it extends to other countries, it only means that if any heretics should rise up against their lawful sovereigns, as the Calvinists did in France for example, he would excommunicate any catholics who would assist them in overturning the established authorities.

That is to say, in a case in which the movement was not only against the church, but also against the established authorities of the kingdom?—Against the established authorities of the kingdom; because I have laid down as a principle, that in no case could that bull extend beyond the principles of catholics. When the Pope issues a bull he understands the principles of the catholics, and he understands that if he issued a bull to this country to authorize the catholics to shake off the legitimate authority of the British Monarch, that bull would be flung back with disdain, if I might use the strong expression.

The question at present is, whether the authority attempted to be exercised in the section of the bull read to you, is in itself of a spiritual or temporal nature according to your view?—It is of a spiritual nature: for it will not appear inconsistent with the exercise of a spiritual authority that the Pope would excommunicate his own subjects, who would aid either Turks or heretics in invading his temporal dominions, or in subverting the religion of which he is the head. Would it appear to any person who imagines any danger in the exercise of this authority, that the late venerable Roman Catholic archbishop of Dublin, Dr. Troy, exceeded the limits of his just authority in excommunicating such Catholics as he apprehended would join the rebels in subverting the established government.

You will observe that the proposition laid down in this section of the bull is quite general, and it is this, that all those who assist heretics with horses, arms or instruments of war, “quibus Catholicos oppugnant” are excommunicated. Might not that sentence be applied by ignorant persons to the subjects of a king not in communion with the Roman church, who might be making war against a king who was in that communion?—When I answer here, I do not answer from the misapprehensions of ignorant people, but I answer from the principles of well-informed Catholics.

Then it is your conception, that the subjects of such a king ought to reject the application of that particular sentence to their own case?—It is my conviction, that if the construction that ignorant people would put upon it were to be adopted, we should consider all the Catholics of Ireland almost as excommunicated, for none have been more lavish of their blood in testifying their fidelity to the government; and I am sure no bishop or clergyman in Ireland would consider the people of Ireland as excommunicated, while those people were fighting for their sovereign.

Then have we here ascertained an instance in which the spiritual authority of the Pope is set at naught by the Catholics of Ireland?—Not the spiritual authority.

Have you not said that this was an exercise of spiritual authority?—It is an exercise of spiritual authority as far as it does not interfere with the superior obligations of civil allegiance, but as for the construction that all persons should be excommunicated who would ever furnish arms to heretical sovereigns, that is not the construction of it, and therefore in rejecting that construction, we do not reject the Pope's legitimate authority.

Would you consider that an English subject rejected the authority of the King, if he refused to obey the King when the King ordered him to do an unlawful act?—Surely not; the principle of my conduct in that case, a principle which may guide me also in the construction of that or any other bull, would be the principle of the apostles, when they were threatened not to preach in the name of Jesus, because they were thought to be subverting the established institutions of the country; and they said, "if it be just in the sight of God to hear you rather than God, judge ye." Whenever I find that my obedience to any person would trench upon my superior and paramount obligations to God, my obligation of subordinate obedience is dissolved.

The section of the bull goes on to excommunicate all those who give information to heretics to the prejudice of the Catholic religion, or any assistance, counsel or favour for that purpose?—Every other clause in the bull as to abetting, giving information, or aiding, is resolved on the very same principles I have already laid down, and which I trust have satisfied the Commissioners.

The fifteenth section excommunicates all those who bring ecclesiastical persons before lay tribunals; will you explain whether you think that has any, and what bearing upon the Roman Catholic subject of this country, who might be advised to bring an action in a civil court against his ecclesiastical superior for having subjected him to the consequences of a sentence of excommunication?—None at all, he is not affected by the excommunication; every layman in the country may bring an action, civil or criminal, against a clergyman, without the infliction or the fear of excommunication.

The question is this, suppose that a Roman Catholic clergyman has excommunicated a layman, and that thereby very grievous civil consequences have ensued to the layman; and suppose that layman, being a catholic, brings his action against his ecclesiastical superior to recover satisfaction for the injury sustained; does not such a case directly fall within the case that is here put by the bull, and made the subject matter of excommunication?—No, because on the principles I have already laid down, those bulls are not to be attended to, if they interfere with the obligations which we owe to another. Now it is a principle with us that the civil laws of every country bind in conscience; according to the constitution of this country every clergyman is certainly amenable for his conduct to the laws. If then the apparent meaning of any bull should be to annul that obligation of obedience, it is not to be attended to.

The question is, whether the plaintiff in such an action as is supposed, and an example of which has actually taken place, has incurred any spiritual censure upon the part of Rome; he has the civil right of bringing the action if he pleases, but the question is, whether in so doing, he incurs the spiritual censure?—No, he does not; the bull refers to the ancient jurisprudence prevailing in catholic countries through Europe generally, and I think it is the common law of England. The clergy were a privileged class; they had their own tribunals, and if any person should cite them before the lay tribunals, he was supposed to violate not only the obedience he owed to the Pope but the civil jurisprudence of the country. So far then from violating the obligations by which we are bound to the civil laws, in my mind that bull would confirm the authority of the legislature of any country.

You will observe that so late as the year 1741, there is a bull excommunicating all persons, without exception, or without any limitation of time or place, who bring Roman Catholic ecclesiastics before lay tribunals; can you explain how it is, that that does not apply to the case that is put?—With regard to bulls of this sort, they are never binding upon us, unless we receive and publish them; that bull was probably never published in this country, and therefore we have nothing to do with its contents.

Has not a Roman Catholic priest within a few days past prosecuted another Roman Catholic priest before the quarter sessions in the King's county for an invasion of his civil rights?—Yes, at Birr, without any excommunication.

Though no particular sentence of excommunication has ensued upon that act, the question remains whether this general excommunication, which has been read to you, does not apply itself to that particular case?—It does not in the sense of the bull. It does not on the principles of Catholics.

Is this an exercise of spiritual or temporal authority on the part of the Pope?—As far as his spiritual authority extends, it is a legitimate exercise of it—if it exceeds that, it is not.

Would you consider it an illegitimate exercise of his spiritual authority as applied to Ireland?—I would, and all the Bishops of Ireland would.

Pray state for the sake of illustration any case to which you conceive that excommunication would apply?—In a country where the clergy are still privileged as they were formerly, where they are to be tried by their own peers, if any person were to cite them before the lay tribunals of the country, in defiance of such law, he would incur the excommunication, provided the bull were previously published in the country.

You observe there is not the least question that the plaintiff has a civil right to bring such an action—the only question is, whether in the exercise of that civil right, he thereby incurs any spiritual censure under the terms of this bull?—I have answered, not.

In the nineteenth section of this bull there is an universal excommunication against all magistrates who interpose themselves in any capital or criminal cases against ecclesiastical persons; let us now suppose the case of a Roman Catholic justice of the peace in this country taking examinations against a Roman Catholic clergyman; does he not appear to you to come within the terms of this excommunication?—No.

Will you explain in what manner you conceive that he is exempt from it?—He does not come under it on the very same principles I have explained before. Every subsequent clause of that bull may be resolved by the very same principles. The reason that I do not mention them is, that I do not like to be tiring the patience of the Commissioners by unnecessary repetitions.

In the first section of this bull there is an universal excommunication of all Lutherans, Calvinists, Hugonots, and all and singular other heretics, by whatsoever name they are called; is that excommunication confined to any particular country, or does it extend to those heretics wherever they are found?—It extends to those heretics wherever they are found, in the sense I have explained the bull; provided the bull is received and published in those countries where they think it necessary to receive and publish a bull, in order that it should have force. In Italy, for example, it is considered sufficient that it be published at Rome in order that it should have its effect; it is not so in other countries. But in the sense in which I have explained the bull, and in those countries in which the bull would be received and published, it would affect them, but in no other sense.

Although the bull might not have validity in a country in which it had not been published, is it not sufficient to show what is the doctrine and what are the principles of the court of Rome upon those points?—Not at all; the doctrine and principles of the court of Rome are not sufficient to establish the doctrine of the Catholic church. We distinguish between the court of Rome and the see of Rome; for the court of Rome may be a scene of much intrigue and cabal, without affecting at the same time the authority of the Holy See or decrees of the Catholic church.

By the court of Rome is meant the Pope?—The court is a political expression.

Is not that bull sufficient to show the principles of Benedict the Fourteenth upon those subjects?—His bull is sufficient to show his principles, because his bull I consider an expression of his mind.

Is there any definite time within which a bull must be received in any particular country, after it is issued?—I am not positive as to the number of days required.

Is there any thing to prevent this bull of 1741 being now received in Ireland, or at any future time, supposing it has not been received here already?—There is the collision that would be supposed to result from the reception of that bull with the established authorities of the country. This is an insurmountable objection.

The question is, would the lapse of time prevent its being received, it being now eighty-five years since this bull was issued?—I know not whether the lapse of time may not prevent its promulgation. Old bulls, never published, are seldom indeed revived; at least there is no danger of their being revived in a sense contrary to that which I have explained. I should wish to observe, that whatever principles a Pope's bull may contain, that we are not to receive them as doctrine, because they are contained in such a bull. No matter what the clauses may be, the superiors of the church, I mean the bishops, are to ascertain whether the things contained in it are reconcileable with the fixed, the universal, and the ancient doctrine of the church. That is the principle which guides catholics—the principle of Vincentius of Lérins; what has been delivered always, every where, and by all. “Quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus traditum est.”

Are the principles which have been stated to you from the bull of Benedict the Fourteenth, consonant with those principles that have always been received by the Catholic church, and to which you have alluded as being received, “semper, ubique et ab omnibus?”—It depends on the construction that is put upon the bull; under a proper construction, it is not at variance with those principles.

Then are we to understand that it is not to be considered repugnant to those principles, construing it as not meaning to interfere with civil or temporal rights, except where the laws of each country warrant the application of it to civil or temporal rights?—Yes; the bull, under this construction, that a pope's bull is never to encroach upon the civil rights of any country, is not inconsistent with those principles.

These excommunications are stated in the bull to be issued “Ex parte Dei Omnipotentis Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus Sancti, auctoritate quoque Beatorum Apostolorum Petri, et Pauli, ac nostra;” will you explain what you understand exactly by the expression “ex parte Dei?”—It is generally a form used on those occasions. As the Pope is Vicar of Christ, who is God, it is natural he should use the names of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; as also those of St. Peter and St. Paul, whose successor he is.

What is the form of publishing a bull in this country?—I have seldom known one to be published; I do not remember any, except the late one of the jubilee. The form of the publication of that was by promulgation from the altars; it was left to the discretion of the bishop to publish it at his convenience; so much so, that it was not published in the diocese of Killala at the same time that it was published in Dublin.

Have no papal bulls been received and published in this country, in the sense which you attach to those words?—I do not know any lately.

To what period does that apply?—It may extend to a remote period; I have said lately, that I might not include some ancient bulls of historical notoriety.

How would it be known by a Roman Catholic clergyman, in this country whether a particular bull of the Pope was, or was not, received in Ireland?—Either from his bishop, or the metropolitan.

Supposing it was thought desirable to know whether a particular bull had been published in this country or not, how could that be ascertained?—From the bishops.

Is there any official or other means by which it would be possible to ascertain what bulls have been received in Ireland during the last century?—I cannot say; I should think Dr. Murray, or Dr. Kelly, or those bishops who are old in the ministry, would be able to furnish information upon that subject; but as far as my information extends, none have been received.

Was it not a necessary part of your duty, as professor of dogmatic theology, to lecture the students upon the marks of the true church, as contradistinguished from erroneous or false churches?—Surely; it was a duty which I strove to perform.

Appendix, N° 37.

Examination of
Rev. Dr. Mac Hale.
4 November 1826.

That formed a portion probably of every course of lectures you gave?—It returned in the course of every three years.

Every student in the college necessarily came under your instruction upon that important topic, in the course of his passing through Maynooth?—All who stopped to finish their studies did. The class, during my time, consisted generally of about one hundred and fifty persons.

The Established church necessarily formed more or less a topic of your lectures upon such occasions?—Not necessarily; scarcely was the established church, as such, introduced into our lectures.

Were not the marks distinguishing the superiority, which it must be supposed you very naturally attribute to the Roman Catholic church over the Established church, and by which that was known and proved in your view, necessarily referred to in the course of these discussions?—When I stated that it was not necessarily introduced, it was not from any apprehension lest the Commissioners should be surprised why we did not recognise in the Established church the marks of the true church; but the reason is, our lectures were positive. We explained the marks of the true church; we applied them to what we were convinced to be the true church, which is the Roman Catholic church; then, by way of a negative inference, we proved that all other societies, whatever they were, Established church, or any other not in communion with the see of Rome, did not belong to the true church. Hence it seldom happened that the Established church, as an Established church, formed any portion of the discussion; it came into discussion incidentally with the others, while we showed that all were divested of the features of the true church.

We beg to assure you, that we should be very far from considering it as any imputation upon the professor of dogmatic theology at Maynooth, or other than a fair discharge of his duty, to canvas, within certain bounds and limits, any point of difference between the Roman catholic church and the Established church; but we were merely inquiring as to the fact, whether that did not form a considerable portion of those lectures?—It did only in the sense I have explained; and I should consider myself unworthy of the situation I held, and unfaithful to the trust reposed in me, if I had shrunk from the responsibility of showing that the marks of the true church did not belong to the Established church. I conceive that the government of the country, in establishing the college of Maynooth, as a Catholic college, left us the free liberty of proving that the marks of the true church belonged to our own church, and of canvassing also the claims of every other. As it might appear that we were canvassing the merits of both, I must remark that we considered the two churches of Rome and England to be too dissimilar to be frequently compared in juxta position.

The Commissioners observe, that in point of fact the entire of the last fifty-eight pages of the class-book, intitled, "Tractatus de Ecclesia," which it was your duty to teach, are occupied with nothing else but controversy with the Established church?—Yes; but it was a part of the tract which I did not discuss, less from any apprehension of pressing on the students the conviction that the Established church did not belong to the true church, than from the apprehension of giving an obscure compiler an undue importance, by honouring him with any notice. Our object was to discuss principles generally, and not to notice the productions of individuals who were undeserving of academic attention; I scarcely ever, or rather never, in my lectures mentioned the name of the individual referred to there. That class-book was prepared before my time, and I omitted that part only for the reason I have stated, that I thought it beneath controversy.

During the time that you were professor of dogmatic theology, may the Commissioners ask whether you published in the newspapers, or in pamphlets, any letters or pamphlets upon the subject of the Established church?—I did.

Were those letters or pamphlets circulated at Maynooth among the students?—They were circulated like other such publications.

Is it a fact, within your knowledge, whether those pamphlets were in the hands of the students or not?—I know they were.

Do you know in what manner they came into the hands of the students?—I dare say they purchased them.

Will you have the goodness to state whether any particular pains were taken by yourself, or by any of your friends, to circulate them in the college?—I could not say that any particular pains were taken: I felt an interest, no doubt, in them, controlled however by a sense of delicacy. My anxiety was probably much less than is felt by other writers in the circulation of their productions.

Did you in any way, directly or indirectly, authorize any person to bring them into the college?—There was no positive prohibition against pamphlets; and I may have suggested to the bookseller the propriety of introducing some of them into the college.

Coyne was the bookseller who published it?—He was.

He is bookseller to the college of Maynooth?—He is.

Those letters bore the name of Hierophilos, did they not?—They did.

Was it not perfectly understood in the college, and a matter of notoriety that Hierophilos was the professor of dogmatic theology at the time?—Yes; at the time of the last publication addressed to Mr. Canning. In the commencement the writer was not known. He was influenced not by any apprehension of the consequences of his opinions, but because he preferred writing under an assumed signature.

Did not these publications contain, amongst other matters, a good deal of discussion as to the established church, as to tithes—as to the nature and character of the laws of this country—as to the feelings of the lower orders towards the upper classes in this country, and

and as to the respect and regard which England is entitled to receive?—I would suggest that the letters would speak for themselves. Appendix, N° 37.

We beg to direct your attention to a passage connected with one of the latter topics, namely as affecting the feelings of the lower ranks towards the higher ones—at page 31 of the Letters on the Moral and Political State of Ireland, the Commissioners observe this Examination of Rev. Dr. Mac Hale. 4 November 1826.

“To convey to the English reader an idea of the humanity of some of our Irish gentry, it will be sufficient to observe, that there are individuals who associate their exertions in preserving the peace with their sportful amusements. It is a literal fact, that on the evenings of some of the most tragic days that disgrace our country, these individuals express their horror of shedding human blood by the savage facetiousness of ‘a fine day’s grousing.’ In the absence of men of rank, and influence and integrity, the preservation of the peace is necessarily intrusted to men who are unfit organs to convey the spirit of the laws, and who often trade on their violation.”

We beg you to state your own view of that passage, and in particular that you would mention any individuals whom you may know to have used such an expression?—Before I enter on the explanation of any solitary passage, by which it would be unfair to form a judgment of any work, I trust I shall be allowed to make a few observations on the general tendency of the letters, and the circumstances which had an influence on their publication. It is scarcely necessary to remark, that this country is peculiarly situated; it is distracted by religious dissensions, and it has been the constant practice of individuals belonging to the established church, to assail the Catholic religion with unsparing vituperation. Our country has been also the theatre of Biblical exhibitions which have tended much to distract its peace, under the mask of promoting the spiritual interests of the people. When the mischievous purpose of those societies was discovered, many of the Catholic priests were taxed with want of zeal in suffering their people to be made the dupes of these hypocritical fanatics. Whilst our religion is not only tolerated but protected by the State, whilst the legislature has condescended partially to relax in the penal laws that have been enacted against Catholics, and even to found a national institution for the purpose of educating our clergy, the Legislature has taken the Catholic religion under its own special protection. We consider that we have the natural right of repelling unjust aggression, and provided we do not transgress the limits which the law prescribes for defending our religion, we only exercise that natural right, and at the same time fulfil an imperative duty. At the time that these letters were written, such were the circumstances of the country; few had then appeared to defend the Catholic religion. I conceive that a professor of the college, provided he respects the laws of the country, is not divested of the natural right which all possess of defending their religion, and repelling unjust aggression; and if the laws were to annex a condition to the place of a professor, that his energies or his zeal should be bound up without the liberty of exercising them in the defence of his religion, I must declare that I should not have filled for a single moment the chair of dogmatic theology in Maynooth. I should wish to exercise that liberty which I have received from the Almighty, in protecting from insult the revealed record of his own will; and were this privilege incompatible with my situation, I should have resigned it without a sigh, nor would the resignation have been a sacrifice. If a law should be passed prohibiting the professors of all universities and colleges from mixing in this polemical strife, the professors of Maynooth would cheerfully acquiesce in such an enactment; and it might be no loss either to the literature or the good feeling of the country if many of those productions that are issuing from universities and colleges were suppressed altogether. But I conceive at the same time, that while members of Trinity College, and members of other Protestant universities, are incessantly pouring out their abuse on the Catholic church, denouncing its doctrines as idolatrous and superstitious, its ministers either as ignorant or hypocritical—its people savage, turbulent, and sunk to the lowest degree of demoralization, in consequence of the influence of the priesthood; I conceive that any person, who has either talent or a spark of zeal for the Catholic religion, is called upon to repel such unwarrantable attacks: it was under such a conviction I embarked first in these controversies; my object, and, I trust, my tone were of a pacific kind, and if I have used any language which might appear warm, it has been fully warranted by the nature of the provocation. I have in my hand a publication signed “Declan,” and I believe it is as well understood that the publication of Declan was written by a fellow of Trinity College, as the Letters of Hierophilos by a professor of the college of Maynooth. Should it be observed that Trinity College was not responsible for his productions, the very same apology will extend to the college of Maynooth, that it was not responsible for the productions of its professors. Should it again be remarked, that the established church did not connive at such an angry production—I believe that the author of Declan, far from being rebuked for an unwarrantable attack on the Catholic church, has been promoted to a living, I am told, worth 1,500*l.* a year, a promotion generally thought to have been the reward of his controversial talents. Without alluding to any more recent transactions, I shall content myself with observing, that a spirit of hostility to the college of Maynooth manifested itself in offensive publications from the university of Dublin at a period anterior to the appearance of the earliest of these letters. Taking then into consideration the hostility of the Bible societies to the Catholic religion, the continual abuse which its missionaries were heaping on the Catholic priesthood and the laity of Ireland, and the repeated provocations which we received from the dignitaries of the established church, who ought to have practised peace and conciliation, it may not be deemed surprising if they they should have called forth a spirit of reaction, and fully justify the letters of Hierophilos.

As a passage, or rather a note, has been quoted by the Commissioners, I should beg leave also to refer them to the views of the writer, as they are put forth in the second letter addressed to the English people, as follows:—

“Non equidem hoc dubites, amborum fœdere certo Consentire dies, et ab uno sidere duci.”—Persius.

“Sure on both nations the same star has shone, Joint are their fates, their destinies are one.”

“Whatever may be the visions of some romantic lovers of country, it is one of soundest and most incontestible maxims of political science, that there are some countries whose fortunes must ever be obedient to the destinies of others*. This principle, which experience has confirmed in the example of other countries, seems peculiarly applicable to the condition of Ireland. To the strength and abundance of her natural resources I feel proud in bearing ample testimony; but as these must be estimated in relation to the surrounding countries, it must be confessed that she seems to have been destined to be an appendage of the English nation. Though this reflection may be mortifying to our national vanity, we should still be consoled with the consciousness that we may securely repose under the protection of the British empire, instead of being placed in the doubtful position of Anactorium, which, if we are to credit the account of Thucydides, was disputed by the contending claims of Corinth and Corcyra.

“This obvious principle has taken deep root in the Irish mind. The people are too sensible of the advantage of British connexion to wish for a separation. They would consider as their worst enemies those who would entertain the chimerical project of divorcing that connexion, and the only object they sigh for is, to draw closer its relations, by a fuller participation of its benefits. We know that it is the dispensation of Providence, that one kingdom should be swayed by the wisdom, and subject to the authority of another. We know that our fate is connected with that of England, and that in ‘the peace thereof shall our peace be;’ and therefore, that he who would attempt to seduce the people from their allegiance, would be realizing the language which Jeremias held to the false prophet Hananias, ‘thou hast broken chains of wood, and thou hast made for them chains of iron.’

“The principle of dependence on the English Government, which nature seems to suggest, and a sense of self-interest must confirm, derives from the Catholic faith a still stronger influence. The attachment of the Catholic to the person of his Sovereign is derived from a nobler source than those yet alluded to, and the loyalty he must feel, in common with every other subject, is hallowed by the peculiar instructions of his religion. It is a well-known truth that the relative duties of sovereigns and of subjects have been discussed in the sister country with a bold, and perhaps dangerous freedom of opinion. We know that some of its most eminent political writers have ventured to fix the boundaries where obedience would cease to be an obligation, and resistance would become a duty. These are discussions which in the Catholic church are considered as questions of a delicate and dangerous tendency; nay, they have even startled the impiety of Hume†. Seldom are these extreme cases agitated by its professors, and never proposed to its followers as maxims of practical adoption. We hold with Mr. Burke, that the speculative line of demarcation, where obedience ought to end and resistance must begin, is faint, obscure, and not easily definable; and that, with or without a right, a revolution will be the very last resource of the thinking and the good. Far, therefore, from entertaining the dangerous theory that would fix the bounds of suffering, which would justify resistance, we are reproached with extending our doctrine of obedience beyond what human nature can endure. Through the vicissitudes of eighteen centuries, the doctrine of the Catholic has remained the same that was preached by St. Paul‡, and illustrated by the commentaries “ of

† “Besides we must consider that as obedience is our duty, in the common course of things, it ought chiefly to be inculcated; nor can any thing be more preposterous than an anxious care and solicitude in stating all the cases in which resistance may be allowed. In like manner, though a philosopher reasonably acknowledges in the course of an argument, that the rules of justice may be dispensed with in cases of urgent necessity, what should we think of a preacher, or casuist, who should make it his chief study to find out such cases, and enforce them with all the vehemence of argument and eloquence? Would he not be better employed in inculcating the general doctrine, than in displaying the particular exceptions which we are, perhaps, but too much inclined of ourselves to embrace and to extend!”—Hume, Essay 13th, on Passive Obedience.

‡ “Let every soul be subject to higher powers; for there is no power but from God: and those that are, are ordained of God. Therefore, he that resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God. And they that resist, purchase to themselves damnation. Wherefore be subject of necessity, not only for wrath, but also for conscience sake.”—Romans, c. 13.

“Christians are aware who has conferred their power on the Emperors;—they know it is God: after whom they are first in rank, and second to none other. From the same source which impart life, they also derive their power. We Christians invoke on all the Emperors the blessings of a long life, a prosperous reign, domestic security, a brave army, a devoted senate, and a moral people.”—Tertullian Apologeticus adversus Gentes, c. 30.”

“ of Tertullian ; and it will ever be the reproach or the glory of our religion, that it will “ ever be inaccessible to the wisdom or the folly of modern maxims of allegiance. For the “ loyalty of those which rests on so firm a basis there is little room for apprehension ; it is “ not that fluctuating loyalty which may shift with times and circumstances, and which “ is measured by the calculating standard of interest or convenience ; ours is a loyalty “ depending on an eternal principle—the dispensation of a ruling Providence, and of which “ the calls of a capricious self-interest can never annul the obligation.

“ To any who soberly reflect on the conduct of the Catholics, through the sad vicis“ situdes of our national history, it must be a matter of surprise how that conduct could “ ever have furnished grounds for impeaching their loyalty. With a fidelity which no temp“ tation could shake, they clung to the fallen fortunes of one prince, until dire necessity had “ severed every obligation ; and surely such heroic constancy, instead of justifying the foul “ impeachment, ought to be considered a pledge of sincere fidelity to every future sove“ reign. The frequent and invidious reference is made to the insurrections which occasion“ ally disgraced our country ; they have never sprung from the influence of Catholic prin“ ciples. Thus, in the instance of the rebellion of ninety-eight, of which the memory is “ industriously transmitted in every anti-Catholic publication, the leaders of the Irish Direc“ tory declared, on examination before the Irish Parliament, that instead of being actuated
“ by the desire of establishing the Catholic religion, they would have gladly exchanged
“ the cross for the crescent. On this subject much adverse learning has been expended ;
“ and notwithstanding the many able vindications of our conduct that have been occasionally “ offered to the public, yet there are some drivelling writers who are ever pouring upon the “ English ear the obsolete calumnies of men deservedly forgotten ; and who, in the dull “ round of slander, exhibit all the dexterity of the Athenian charioteer, who could perpet“ ually revolve round the same course, without deviating from the former track or marking “ a new impression.

“ Metaphysicians displayed much idle cavil in attempting to prove the impossibility of “ civil allegiance, when spiritual obedience was exacted by the Roman pontiff. Our feelings
“ and our conduct refuted their subtle speculations. To put an end, however, to the inter“ minable contest, the King graciously became our advocate, and a single ray of royal “ benevolence has dissolved the rusty prejudices, which have resisted the weight and vigour
“ of arguments an hundred times repeated. In spite of the calumnies of ages, and the mis“ givings of some individuals who distrusted or affected to distrust our allegiance, he resolves
“ to come among us ; the most distant parts of the kingdom pour in their thronging multi“ tudes to greet his approach. With unhesitating confidence he generously flung himself
“ on the fidelity of his Irish people ; and surely it was a glorious spectacle to have seen him “ borne aloft on their buoyancy.

“ His parting address spoke in language that will long be remembered, and has made
“ an impression which will not easily be effaced. The interposition of a cold and opaque “ body intercepted for some time the light and heat of the royal luminary. But he again “ beams on our country through the medium of a viceroy, who, while he adequately sustains
“ the represented majesty of the throne, most faithfully reflects the kind feelings of our “ benevolent monarch. We shall therefore be content that a host of noxious writers tax
“ us with disloyalty, while we are conscious that the Royal mind has received a different “ impression. If, therefore, when the Government was known to the Catholics only through “ the severities it inflicted, they cherished a strong and steady loyalty which no force could “ pluck out of their breasts, they cannot be disaffected to a Government which cherishes
“ and protects them, unless we suppose their loyalty to be like the famous tree in Switzer-
“ and*, which thrives on the barren rock, exposed to the tempest, but withers and dies
“ under a kinder cultivation.”

I have just to remark that these extracts set forth the principles with which I commenced writing, and I have no doubt but those principles will be found such as to be consistent with the duty that every person owes to his sovereign, and also to the laws of his country. As I have mentioned in the letter, probably I was more liable to provoke the anger of Irishmen than that of the Protestants of England, in writing such a passage as that in which I have said that even nature seemed to have destined Ireland as an appendage of the British empire : at all events I have laid down principles of obedience which are the principles of the Catholic church, which are found in the inspired writings, and from which I trust, in the course of the subsequent letters, I have not departed. If I have freely expressed myself on the abuses of the country, I was only using the privileges of a British citizen. I trust, at the same time, that there is nothing in the letters which could be supposed to wound personal character, or to be unworthy of my station.

There cannot be the least question as to the right of the professor of dogmatic theology to

“ I must confess, however, that we are so incapable to keep pace with the progress of mind, as to

to publish his sentiments in print, except so far as the statutes of the college may interfere; and the course of examination at present pursued is intended merely to give you an opportunity of explaining what were your views when you held that situation. The last question that was proposed did not suppose you to have entertained views hostile to the connection of the British islands; it had reference merely to the passage relating to the conduct of the magistrates in the country, respecting whom it is there stated as "a literal fact, that on the evenings of some of the most tragic days that disgrace our country, these individuals express their horror of shedding human blood, by the savage facetiousness of 'a fine day's grouching';" the question was to ask you to name the instances you have there referred to?—The instances I must say have now escaped my memory, but I can say also that I had it from one or more of the newspapers of the day; but as I do not specify any individual, I could not injure personal character. As to the reflection on the magistracy, I shall appeal to a public fact: that shortly after the present viceroy came to this country, he instituted an examination into the conduct of the magistracy of the country, and many persons were removed from their situations. I should consider that the Marquis Wellesley would be incapable of removing any person from any official situation on account of any imputations which were not founded in truth; therefore the observation I have made is justified by reference to the conduct of the Lord Lieutenant.

Might he not very reasonably have been the cause of their removal from the magistracy, for instances of unfitness or delinquency, falling far short of that which you have attributed to them in the note; will you explain what you mean by the expression of "a fine day's grouching?"—I have not marked the degree of their delinquency. That some were corrupt is proved by the fact I have stated. I had seen the expression in one of the papers at the time; it is so long since that it cannot be wonderful that it should have escaped my memory; but it was mentioned in one of the newspapers that they had said, after killing some people, that it was "a fine day's grouching."

You have said that that was a literal fact; surely there are many things mentioned in the newspapers that are not literal facts?—Yes; but things are not to be rejected as literal facts, because they are mentioned in the newspapers.

Do not you think such a statement calculated to excite very unpleasant feelings towards the magistracy of the country?—I should wish to have the whole note read; for the truth of the statement I am not answerable, as I found it in the newspapers.—"While I express a just horror at the outrages of some of the peasantry, it is only justice to the public to state, that the odium might be divided with some who affect a zeal for the public interest. These outrages, cruel as they are, are much exaggerated. The English people may form a proper estimate of our Irish journals, when they learn that I have now before me a journal, which heads a paragraph by the appalling title of 'Dreadful Murder committed by the Insurgents;' and, strange to say, not a vestige of a murder is discoverable through the entire paragraph. This gazette is, by way of lucus a non lucendo, called the Patriot. That I may not be reproached with vague reference, the article to which I allude is found in the paper of the 31st of January. The artifice was not without its object. Conscious that few would enter into the penetralia of his composition, he wished to produce a powerful effect by a dreadful frontispiece. In looking for these murderers, you only discover the breaking down of a bridge, which, to the imagination of this gazetteer, was transformed into murder, as the windmills were metamorphosed into giants by the prince of chivalry.

"For a similar purpose, this same paper inserted a story about some persons being murdered for refusing to comply with a certain ceremony, which of course he was afterwards obliged to contradict. These insertions and retractations are not, however, without their end, as the editors well know that the first story will be circulated, and make a due impression, where the contradiction will never reach.

"To convey to the English reader an idea of the humanity of some of our Irish gentry, it will be sufficient to observe, that there are individuals who associate their exertions in preserving the peace with their sportful amusements. It is a literal fact, that on the evenings of some of the most tragic days that disgrace our country, these individuals express their horror of shedding human blood by the savage facetiousness of 'a fine day's grouching.' In the absence of men of rank, and influence, and integrity, the preservation of the peace is necessarily intrusted to men who are unfit organs to convey the spirit of the laws, and who often trade on their violation.

"The dispatches of our viceroy show that the people may be the dupes of systems, of which the origin is not ascertained. He mentions that illegal oaths are now administered in the county of Down, which proceed from a committee in Dublin. Would to God that all the illegal associations were traced to their source; it would then be discovered that the people are often actuated by an impulse of which they know not the cause, and that their acts, however irregular, might converge to one common centre."*

To show that I have spoken respectfully of the government and the gentry generally, I beg leave to call the attention of the Commissioners to some passages of the letter to which the note is appended:—

"When Cicero pleaded the cause of the injured Sicilians, and denounced the crimes of those

* It is but justice to the Patriot to remark, that that journal is quite improved since the period in which the letter was written.

“ those who were the authors of their wrongs, he did not waste his time in idle declamation, nor in the vague description of injuries, which could convey no distinct idea of their extent or their magnitude; but, like a true master of eloquence, he flings away the subordinate draperies of fancy, and interests the sympathy of the Roman people for his clients, by exhibiting to their view the naked victims of that misrule on which he invoked the retribution of their justice.

“ And could not I exhibit to the indignant compassion of the English people evidence equally affecting of the miseries I describe? I do not, I cannot make any allusion to the government, whose wisdom and clemency I must, in common with every good man, applaud, and whose influence could not perhaps reach the source of those evils. For,

‘ Of all the varied ills which men endure,

‘ How few that kings can cause, or kings can cure !’

“ But could I not exhibit to the view of the English people many an unfeeling little ruler, through the periodical crowds of Irish labourers who cross the Irish Channel, stowed almost to suffocation, in order to procure subsistence by hard labour, and to restore that life which, for want of wholesome nutriment at home, had almost expired out of their emaciated frames? To uphold, in a foreign land, a style of living disproportioned to their incomes, some scruple not to sacrifice the comfort and enjoyment of thousands; and when these unfeeling men happen to meet these living spectres gliding through the streets of London, like Ulysses, on encountering the indignant shade of Ajax, they must sustain the reproachful glances of the wretched beings whose happiness they have murdered. The apology often pleaded by the absentees is, the danger of residing in a country where their persons and properties would be continually exposed. They ought, however, to consider that fear, like affection, is generally reflective; that perhaps they are the first to inspire the terror which they feel; and that within their miniature dominion they might apply to themselves the observation of the Roman sage,

‘ Timet timentes, metus in auctorem redit.’

“ This reflection is justified by the pleasing contrast of some noblemen, who have resisted the contagion of vanity and fashion, and reside in tranquil security on their estates, diffusing among their tenantry the blessings of their wealth and example. The traveller, in passing through the country, finds occasional relief amidst the contemplation of uniform wretchedness. On approaching the residence of those individuals, you immediately perceive the influence of intellect and benevolence that reigns within the happy circle; and your feelings, sickened by the surrounding scene, here find a grateful repose. From within the sphere of their beneficial sway discontent is banished; and should disaffection attempt to cross the forbidden boundary, it dies in the unpropitious atmosphere. Among those whom I could name on the present occasion, I shall content myself with adverting to one individual, who measures his superiority in rank by the superiority of his public virtue; diffusing his wealth over a contented and tranquil neighbourhood; enjoying the happiness which he communicates; and standing the foremost in his country, as much by the unostentatious display of a practical patriotism, as he does by the splendour of his title, and the thick honours of a long and illustrious ancestry.

“ While I expose the causes of the discontent of our peasantry, let it not be imagined that I am the advocate of that discontent, or the apologist of their crimes. Were I to address the people, instead of irritating their sense of suffering, I should endeavour to soothe them to patience in the meek and christian language of St. Peter, ‘ Be ye subject, therefore, to every human creature for God’s sake; whether it be to the king as excelling, or to governors as sent by him for the punishment of evil-doers, and for the praise of the good: For so is the will of God, that by doing well you may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men. . . . For this is thankworthy, if for conscience towards God a man endures sorrows, suffering wrongfully. For what glory is it, if committing sin, and buffeted for it, you endure? But if doing well you suffer patiently, this is thankworthy before God.’

“ However I may lament the extreme poverty of our people, I must confess that language would not sustain my efforts to convey my abhorrence of some atrocities that have been committed. No provocation could extenuate these outrages; they were inspired by a more malignant principle than the mere importunity of distress. Their authors, if you will, were monsters whom human nature indignantly disowns; but, for God’s sake, let not the misdeeds of these miscreants, by a constructive imputation, be visited on the whole people.”

It is to these passages the note is annexed; and I conceive that, in order to form a fair judgment of the one, it is necessary to have a correct knowledge of the other.

In page 35 of the letter to Mr. Canning by Hierophilos, published in 1824 by Richard Coyne, bookseller to the college of Maynooth, there is the following observation upon the character of England: “ England boasts of her morality. If her morality were to be measured by the number of her bibles, she would undoubtedly be the most moral nation upon earth! But alas! we have frightful instances of the unfeeling indifference of her children to any moral responsibility, not only in those moments when, in the phrenzy of passion, duty may be forgotten, but even in the moment of awful import, when the terror of approaching judgment ought to shake the most hardened insensibility. What avails, then, the profusion of bibles that are never read; or, if read, are turned into a subject of “ridicule or profanation?” Do you now feel that to be a just character of England, or do you consider that it was expedient that such a representation of her character should be made to the students of Maynooth?—That is a twofold question; with regard to the first part of it, I should have no objection to write the entire of it again, because I think it a just character. With regard to the second part of the question, whether it was expedient to make that representation to the students of Maynooth, I shall just say, that I never made the representation to the students of Maynooth. As a fellow of Trinity College, who would be giving lectures, might write perhaps in his pamphlet, or in his book, some things which he would not consider very expedient to deliver in his lectures in his class, though it might afterwards reach his pupils, I, in a similar manner, wrote this on my own responsibility, never intending, as a professor of Maynooth, to introduce it to the students.

Do you think it a just representation of the character of England?—I do; it was written after the execution of the famous Thistlewood, who rejected the proffered services of the ministers of religion. There were other instances of similar insensibility to which I alluded, and I dare say it will be found, on a comparison of the criminal calendars of England and Ireland, that in proportion to the population of the two countries, crime has multiplied to a much greater extent in England than in Ireland. I had also in view an observation of Dr. Milner, which he illustrates by particular references to the History of England, and to the calendar, that crime seems to have multiplied in proportion to the ascendancy of Bible societies.

Do you yourself believe that proposition to be true?—I have no doubt of it; it is a matter susceptible of all the clearness of mathematical calculation.

Which do you think it, a concomitant circumstance, or a consequence flowing from the institution of those societies?—It is a coincidence which is a curious one. I will not say it is a consequence flowing from it, though I believe that if Bible societies were to prevail in this country, and to supplant the ancient religion, that crime would multiply in the same extent.

Do you think it desirable that the students of Maynooth should be taught to entertain sentiments of affection and regard for England, or the contrary sentiments?—I think it is very well that they should be taught a regard for what is excellent in it, but not for its Bible societies. To teach political sentiments, either of regard or disregard to England, I do not think the duty of a professor in his chair, save the duties of allegiance to the Government. The professor has a twofold character; he is a professor in the college of Maynooth; he is also a priest and a citizen; as a professor he is to adapt his course of lectures to the line of duty which is marked out for him; as a priest he is at liberty to defend his religion, provided his defence does not violate the laws of decorum; and as a citizen he can maintain and publish his opinions as well as any other citizen, enjoying, while he lives under the British Constitution, the “rara felicitas temporum” which Tacitus applies to the period when he used the expression “sentias quæ velis, et quæ sentias, dicere.”

Do not you think that his opinions upon such subjects will circulate with a peculiar force amongst the persons attending him at the time as students in a course of lectures intimately connected with those same subjects?—They may; and I also think that the sentiments of the fellows in Trinity College, and the masters of Protestant schools in different parts of the country, will circulate among their pupils at least to the same extent.

Was there not this peculiarity in the constitution of Maynooth, that there was a regulation against the circulation of pamphlets amongst the students at the time?—The peculiar regulations with regard to pamphlets or newspapers I do not well recollect; there have been some regulations to that effect, but I could not be precise about them; they will be found in the resolutions of the trustees.

Is not a regulation to that effect to be found in the statutes of the college?—I do not know any with regard to such publications; there is, I think, with regard to periodical works.

What is there in the statutes upon the subject?—I do not think there is any thing in the statute applying to it. There is a statute to this effect: “Si quis libros in Academiam Scriptave comportaverit, ad Religionem Catholicam Romanam maledictis violandam pertinentia, moresve labefactandos, seditionesve concitandas: etiamque si quis iis libris, quibus omni Domo à Praeside vel Decano interdictum sit, nihilominus utatur.”

Pray look at page 44 of the statutes, where you will find the following passage: “Si quis omnium libros scriptave evulgaverit, edentibusve conscius fuerit, Præsides et inscio et improbante, exigitur.” Pray translate that passage?—“If any individual shall publish books or writings, or shall be conscious to their publication, without the knowledge of the president, or against his approbation, let him be removed from the college.”

In point of fact, was the president aware of the introduction of the writings of Hierophilos into the college?—The statute has no reference to introduction of books; it is to their publication.

What is the force of the word “evulgaverit,” surely it is not publishing, but making common?—I think publishing is the meaning of it, which is the same as making public.

What is the force of the word “edentibus,” which is put in opposition to “evulgaverit”?—It is not in opposition, since the first part refers to publishing, and the other to a consciousness of others having done so.

Was the president, in point of fact, aware of the publication of the letters of Hierophilos?—No, he had no official knowledge of it.

Does it not appear to you that the introduction or publication of those letters, under the circumstances you have stated, was at variance with that statute?—No; I look upon that as a statute to the penalty of which I voluntarily exposed myself, without any sort of moral infraction of the laws of the house. That statute shows the caution with which works must be published there. The works of the professors of the college would be supposed to be published in the name of the college itself; and therefore, to prevent any persons putting forward doctrines either seditious or dangerous, it is required that the president shall know and approve of those publications; but when I published without my name I incurred no responsibility whatever, nor did I expose the college to any responsibility. The work was anonymous, and it was discretionary with the author whether he should reveal his name.

Rev. Dr. Mac Hale.

You consider then that a person would be justified in publishing anonymous works under that law?—Yes.

You mean that if a person publishes anonymously, the onus probandi is then thrown upon the college; but supposing the fact should be established against him of publishing anonymously, is he or is he not in that case liable to be expelled?—He subjects himself to the penalty of expulsion, of which I was aware; but the fact that I was the author was one which I need not have disclosed.

You felt yourself at liberty to adopt a course that subjected you, in your own opinion, to the penalty of expulsion?—I had not the least apprehension of it.

Have you not said that it was matter of notoriety that you were the author of the books?—There are many things which are matters of notoriety, and yet could not be legally proved; and after all this conversation, it would be difficult to prove that I am the author of Hierophilos. Lest it should be imagined that it was from any consciousness of doing wrong that the author of Hierophilos did not wish to reveal his name to the public, he now openly declares that he has never written, nor shall he write, any thing which he should be ashamed to avow. Hence he considered there was no sort of moral infraction of statute in the publication of the letters. There are some recent publications which were anonymous, but which, on account of certain initials, are ascribed to an eminent individual. It would be very hard to prove that he is the author of them, though there has been as little doubt upon the subject as on the writings of Hierophilos.

The Commissioners beg now to point your attention in a particular manner to three resolutions, which were all passed by the trustees of Maynooth, on the 13th of December 1809, and which must be taken in connection with each other. One is,—“Resolved, That any member of the college convicted of writing anonymous letters on any subject whatever, whether printed or not, or circulating them in the college or elsewhere, shall be expelled.” Another of the resolutions is,—“Resolved, That the introduction of newspapers and other periodical publications amongst the students has alienated them from the necessary attention to their studies and other duties, and that the president be and is hereby required to prevent it.” Another is,—“Resolved, That any student convicted of reading newspapers, magazines, or similar periodical publications, in the prayer, study, or lecture halls, shall be expelled.” The question is, whether you do not think that the course you adopted was at variance with that pointed out in those three resolutions?—No, I do not think it was.

Pray explain your views upon that subject?—I do not imagine that what I did was at all at variance with those resolutions. I wrote those letters upon my own responsibility; at the same time the Commissioners will be pleased to look to the object of those resolutions, which was to prevent the introduction of publications of a dangerous or an inflammatory tendency. If the students who are expressly named read those letters, they knew they were not guilty of a violation of those rules.

The Commissioners will beg now to direct your attention to another statute, which will be found in page 38 of the printed volume:—“If any master or pupil wishes to publish any thing of his writings, let him do that with the consent of the president, on whom the trustees are to cast the responsibility, if any thing is improperly laid down in these lucubrations.”—[“Si quid scriptorum suorum magistratus, alumnusve edere voluerit, id facito, Praeside concedente, a quo Curatores jus repetituri sunt, quidquid improbè positum in istis lucubrationibus extiterit.”]—Did you consult the president in pursuance of that statute with respect to the publications in question?—I mentioned that I did not consult him.

Do not you think that the statute required that you should consult him?—If I were to publish any thing with my name, the statute required it.

You think that the circumstance of your publishing it without your name left you at liberty to avoid the requisition of the statute?—Just so.

Was not its influence likely to be at least as great if it was circulated amongst the students of the class, it being a matter of notoriety that the professor was the author of the work, as if his name were actually attached to it?—Yes; but that question would seem to suppose, what I cannot suppose, that there was any thing improper in the letters. I wrote them from a high sense of duty, with a conviction that they would be useful to religion, and that there was nothing in them subversive of established order, or injurious to the government; and if I did not give my name, it was from a delicacy of not appearing before the public.

Does it not appear to be the intention of the statute to throw the responsibility of judging as to any such publication upon the president?—The intention of that statute was to prevent the publication of any improper or dangerous works. There were some gross publications circulated at the time in Dublin, which I should not condescend to mention, and in which respectable characters were hardly dealt with. The resolutions of the board were passed in consequence of individual attacks upon personal character; and I am sure that

Appendix, N° 37.

Examination of
Rev. Dr. Mac Hale.
4 November 1826.

the letters of Hierophilos were not of a class to come under the spirit which dictated those resolutions.

Was not the object which it was the intention of the statute to prohibit equally accomplished, if the publications took place without the knowledge of the president, and were circulated under a feigned name amongst the students, they perfectly knowing who was the real author?—The object of the statute was to prohibit the publication of any book or letter which would be injurious to the college, and therefore the end of the statute was not defeated.

Was it not the object of the statute to make, not the publisher, but the president the judge as to the nature of the contents of any publication?—If it were published with the author's name it was the immediate one; the remote object was as I have stated.

Do not you think that a professor who published a work, without laying it before the president, though he did so anonymously, would, in the event of the fact being established against him, render himself liable to expulsion?—I think he would, if it were discovered.

Do you think that a professor is at liberty to adopt any course that would subject him to expulsion if discovered, under the hope, or in the belief, that it will not be discovered?—Surely he is at liberty to do so under the conviction that it will not be discovered.

Must he not be conscious that he is guilty of the infraction of a rule?—I mentioned that I conceived he must not; I do not conceive there is any infraction.

Do you conceive that it violates neither the spirit nor the letter of the statute?—I do not conceive it violates the spirit of the statute.

Or the letter?—Or the letter of the statute; I do not know that it does.

Should you have been at liberty to have published those letters with your name, without having been considered guilty of an infraction of the statute?—Surely not.

Must it not follow of course, that to publish them anonymously is a substantial offence against the statute, and that the penalty is evaded only by the circumstance of your name not being attached to them?—No; I looked to the spirit of the statute more than to the letter of it; the spirit of the statute was, as I mentioned, to prevent the publication of any improper books by the professors or others, whose writings would be identified with the college. I conceived in publishing those letters, that I published letters which were intended to serve the Catholic religion, without at the same time saying any thing that would be disrespectful to his Majesty's Government.

Had you a full knowledge of that statute at the time you were publishing that pamphlet?—Perfectly; I was perfectly aware of all the statutes. It may be useful to remark here, that there are in every college, and the remark may extend to every society, some rules which, provided they do not prohibit a malum in se, are not deemed of much importance even by the legislators; such are suffered to go into disuse, and lie a dead letter on the statute-book.

If any young student in the college had been discovered writing a work with a feigned name, would he, in your judgment, have been liable to be expelled?—He would be liable to it; but the expediency of expelling such a man would be left to the discretion and the conscience of those persons that had the power of judging whether he deserved such a punishment. As an instance of statutes that were not enforced, I may refer to that regarding the election of professors; it was not until a late period that any concursum took place, though the statutes from the commencement expressed that the chairs should be disposed of by competition.

Would not the law require him to be expelled if it were executed?—It would not in my mind. Were the case to come before me, for I was one of the individuals who composed the council that was to decide on the application of the laws to doubtful cases, I should not require any judicial knowledge of his name, though it were a matter of notoriety; or if such knowledge came before me, and that the production was of the character of the letters under consideration, though the letter of the statute should be deemed to give us the right, I should think it "the most odious of all wrongs" to inflict the last punishment. Though at the same time every one feels a wide disparity between the cases of a student, whose time might thus be diverted from the necessary studies which he has not yet completed, and a professor, whose literary pursuits are regulated by his own taste and discretion.

We beg now to point your attention to another passage in the letter to Mr. Canning, at page 33—speaking of the established church of England, there is this passage:

"However, if the opinions of Paley, or some of the other most admired champions of the church, were fixed for an orthodox standard, the cumbrous creed of the establishment would be soon reduced to more than apostolical simplicity.

"You must therefore easily observe, that amongst the most distinguished Protestants there is little of conviction in the leading articles of their creed; and we know that where the principles of belief are loose, the rule of private or public virtue cannot be rigid. That approbation then of every error, which insensibly creates an indifference to religion and enervates the vigour of public morals, must be eventually injurious to society."

Pray explain what you mean by the "approbation of every error" by the church of England?—That indiscriminate approbation of the sectaries which seems to characterize the present state of the establishment.

Do you mean then to attribute to the church of England, that it approves of all the errors of all the sectaries?—There is scarcely an error of the sectaries that has not been approved of by some of the distinguished dignitaries of the church of England, even the fundamental errors of Socinianism; I mean that they consider it a matter of indifference to believe those things or not to believe them.

You

You consider that the dignitaries of the church of England consider Socinianism as a matter of indifference?—I consider that some do, and if necessary I shall state proofs.

What do you mean by “the cumbrous creed of the establishment?”—That the creed of the establishment seems too cumbrous to those reformers who would wish to “reform her again.”

What did you mean by “more than apostolical simplicity?”—That they would reduce the present creed to fewer articles than are contained in the apostles creed.

Did you mean to convey to the readers of the letters, that there is little of conviction of the truth of the leading articles of their creed among distinguished Protestants?—Among many distinguished Protestants, I did.

Do not you think that Protestants may be as sincerely attached to their opinions and to their religion as Roman Catholics?—In the extensive sense of the word Protestant, it is nothing more than a negative title. Provided one is not a Pagan, in the sense in which we understand the word Protestant, it is sufficient not to be a Catholic to be a Protestant. So that there is an immense interval between absolute infidelity and Catholicity, which is filled up by such a variety of opinions, all characterized under the name of Protestant, that I do not know any fixed creed that a Protestant has, except that he rejects the authority of the Catholic church, and believes the scriptures according to his own private interpretation. In this sense then, in opposing the Catholic church, and believing what he pleases, a Protestant may be sincere.

Does not this passage relate, not to Protestants in general, but to the established church in particular, and is so expressed?—I will show the Commissioners how I understand the word Protestant, by a reference to other parts of the letters of Hierophilos, where I give something like what I conceive to be a definition of it in two places. In page 50 there is this passage, which shows that I take the word Protestant in a larger sense than the establishment:

“For what is the Protestant religion but a negative system, fashioned to the genius of every clime, and bending to the caprice of every teacher; incorporating in its creed doctrines the most discordant, and concealing, by a community of name, sectaries the most irreconcilable: Episcopalian in England—rejecting Episcopacy, as Anti-Christian, in Scotland and Geneva—in the expositions of Drs. Marsh and Burnet, making the thirty-nine articles the standard of orthodoxy—in the moderation of Dr. Hoadly, enlarging the terms of communion,—but in the unbounded liberality of Dr. Watson, admitting the human race, by adopting the phrase of Tacitus as its maxim, sentire quæ velis et quæ sentias, dicere. No wonder that a system so loose and arbitrary would conduct its votaries to downright scepticism. It has been well remarked by Rousseau, that the philosopher who rejects revelation, and the Catholic who admits it without reserve, are both consistent; but the Protestant who attempts to steer a middle course, by adopting for his religion an unnatural mixture of faith and freedom, exposes himself to the just ridicule of either.

‘To take up half on trust, and half to try,
‘Call it not faith, but bungling bigotry.’”

Now I will refer to page 194, to show that I did not confine the word Protestant to the church of England:

“When I am told that the Bible is the religion of Protestants, the word Protestant presents an idea of such unbounded and intricate meaning, that I must confess it is difficult to comprehend its extent, or unravel its perplexity. The Protestant religion must be true, as the Bible is its sole rule of faith. A member of the church of England must therefore be right, because the Bible is his rule of faith, and he is a Protestant. The Presbyterian must be right, because the Bible is his rule of faith, and he is a Protestant. The Socinian, who shakes the pillars of revelation, must be right, because the Bible is his rule of faith, and he is a Protestant. The Antinomian, who piously absolves his followers from the obligation of the evangelical law, must of course be right, because the Bible is his rule of faith, and he is a Protestant. And thus, while infidelity and popery lie at the opposite extremes, inaccessible to her influence, truth, with the variety of aameleon and the velocity of lightning, beams on each chequered and deformed system that fills up the immense interval.”

It was in that sense that I generally used the word Protestant.

We beg to direct your attention to the passage that immediately follows the one you have been referring to, in which you sum up the argument thus, (page 36):—“I have thus discussed the religious complexion of the Protestant establishment at some length.”—Does it not follow from that phrase, that it is not Protestantism in the abstract, but the Protestant established church of these kingdoms that is the subject of discussion in the passage referred to in your books?—It may be. To give however a clear and satisfactory answer to this question, I beg leave to refer the Commissioners to the following passages, page 28, 29:

“In speaking of the Protestant establishment, it may be considered in the relation of a religious or political system. If we view it merely under the former complexion, there is no Christian who will think it deserving of his reverence, only in the same proportion as it reflects the revealed doctrines of Christianity. Under this point of view, its conformity with the doctrines of Christ becomes a subject of fair investigation; and should it appear that the doctrine of the establishment has departed widely from that which Christ has revealed, such a religion could not be deemed essential to society; unless we were to suppose that error is more favourable than truth to the happiness of mankind, or to adopt the “ paradox of Hobbes, as dangerous in its consequence as it is absurd in its principle; that truth and error entirely depend upon the caprice of legislators, and that the will of the Government is the sole standard of our faith, and the sole measure of our duties.

“ If, on the other hand, we view it as a political establishment, endowed with temporalities, deriving its origin entirely from the legislature, and thus proving by the admission that it can be dissolved by the authority by which it was created, then we are relieved from the embarrassment that is produced by confounding it with its religious pretensions. We may bring to the subject a mind unawed by the reverence which a belief in the true religion imposes, and judge of the utility or inutility of the Protestant establishment, by an impartial view of the benefits which it confers, or the evils of which it is productive.
“ Or, in fine, if we should consider the Protestant establishment as a religious and political system, united by the legislature, the question will resolve itself into the views already exhibited, since no state can derive support from religion but because it is supposed to be true; nor is it easily conceived, that any religion of mere state creation can lend to that state by which it was created, any other authority than that which it has received from the state to which it owes its creation.”

I refer to these passages because they show that the Protestant church is viewed under different relations. As far as the members of the established church form a political body, the word Protestant is understood in that exclusive political sense: as far as they are considered professors of a religious creed, we find them as unsettled in their system of belief as any other Protestants in Europe.

IS it your opinion that it is the tendency of the established religion to lead to that “ indifference about truth or error which extinguishes those moral obligations that mitigate the sway of government and ennoble the obedience of the subject?”—I have made some observations already to which I think it necessary to add a few others: if I were to be questioned on every particular passage in those letters, I think it would be almost an interminable discussion; it is also my opinion that it is at variance with the principles of interpretation of the works of any writer: I think it sufficient to avow the productions as mine, and then, if there be any thing in them that is at variance with the laws of the country, if I am correct in my views, I think they are the proper tribunal before which my opinions are to be discussed. If the writings of the most innocent author that ever wrote, were to be taken sentence by sentence, and passages forcibly linked together that have no natural connection, I think the worst construction might be put upon the purest writings, and I am safe in saying that the inspired volume itself has been, by means of the perverse ingenuity of interpreters, tortured into a variety of senses, of which it was not susceptible. To what can I attribute the different errors that have sprung up in the church but to the mischievous refinement of interpreters? If the scripture were rightly interpreted, those evils would not follow: I know that the meaning of scripture, if properly interpreted, is a meaning that will promote the glory of God, the interest of society, and the peace and morality of mankind; but unfortunately, by the perverse interpretation of expositors, it has been wrested into the worst meanings. According then to a fair rule of criticism, the meaning of Hierophilos is to be determined by the general bearing of his writings, and by the tone which pervades them. I think I shall be very safe in stating that the principles laid down here are principles of obedience to the established authorities, principles of acquiescence in the laws of Parliament, principles also of peace and reconciliation among the different classes of society; and if these are found to be the principles of the book, I think it would be very unfair to wrest any particular passage to a construction at variance with the whole. I shall also venture to say that the manner of writing of Hierophilos has not been intemperate, and though I should free the Commissioners from any improper motive, I should think it strange that letters which have been so long before the public, the printer of which was well known as the printer to the college of Maynooth, and which have been so long subject to the tribunals of the country, should now be subject to any thing like an inquisitorial examination.

The Commissioners are not suggesting any interpretation of any passage, but they are merely asking for your interpretation of some passages which appear to them to require it?—I must again say that with regard to them, as with regard to any other writings, the interpretation is the obvious interpretation that the sentences bear; I do not think it will be necessary to sound them for a deeper meaning than appears on the surface, or to be looking for any under-current of sense, such as is said to be found in many writings, which have both a primary and an allegorical construction. I wish to make this further observation—this book is either considered at present as it affects the character of the college of Maynooth, or as it affects mine. As far as it is connected with Maynooth, I must say that I feel a deeper interest for the establishment of Maynooth than any that can arise from mere personal considerations, and therefore I should be more delicate on the subject of this publication, so far as it is connected with the college of Maynooth, than I should be, so far as it would be connected with my own personal character. For my own personal character I have no apprehension—with respect to that, the writings are before the public, and its judgment has been fixed; but the reason reason of my delicacy arises from my former connection with that institution; therefore I wish to disconnect the publication entirely with the college, by the avowal I have made at the commencement of my examination, that it had no responsibility whatever for the writings of Hierophilos; and the reason is, because according to the statutes that were mentioned, no professor should write without acquainting the president, and without subjecting his work also to the opinions of the council. I interpreted this statute as relating to avowed publications of the professors in the college—whether I was right or wrong will be determined by the trustees, whose right it is to interpret a doubtful statute, but those were my own sentiments; I looked upon the statute as relating to avowed publications, because such publications alone I considered to be identified with the character of the college. When I was writing under another signature, I thought I did not involve, in the most distant way, the character of the establishment, as the productions did not appear on the face of them to be the productions of the professor of theology—I considered therefore the president and members of the council and the trustees acquitted of any responsibility, because no publication came before them with the name of any professor, or in such a manner that it would, even in the most distant way, compromise the character of the college. Should it be observed that those letters were known to be mine, they were known to be mine merely from public notoriety—they were not known to be mine by the president in his judicial capacity, and therefore he could have no motive to make inquiries about the author of Hierophilos, except from a persuasion that his writings were dangerous to religion, or subversive of the government, which would come under another statute. But conscious there was nothing in these writings which could be stigmatized with that character, of course I had no apprehension. It may be said that I incurred danger in violating the statute—I beg to say that it was a statute which I looked upon as not contemplating the case. I looked at the statutes, and one of them was to check the circulation of irreligious or seditious or licentious productions: I looked at the other statute, which prohibited the publication of works of any kind, except with the sanction of the president. As my writings, so far from being of the character described, tended to protect the Catholic religion from wanton assault, and as, so far from being opposed to the established laws of the country, they inculcated in every way the greatest respect for those laws, I could not consider that any motive whatsoever could have prompted the president, or the trustees to institute an inquiry into the writings of Hierophilos, and therefore I apprehended no danger—in short the supposition of danger in such a case would appear absurd to any reasonable man. I observed in the commencement of my examination that had I known, or could I have suspected, that my situation as professor would be a check upon the well-regulated liberty of protecting my religion from wanton assault, or at the same time of expressing my opinions on political affairs, as far as they would not interfere with the respect due to the established government, I would not have held the situation of professor for an instant; I did not apprehend any danger, because, could I think that any inquiry would have been instituted into my writings—could I think that persons would offer such violence to public opinion, as that they would wish to rank among writers, who were intended by the spirit of the statute, a writer who did not at all come under it—It would have been very easy for me to resign my situation in an honorable way, which I would have done rather than be debarred a right of vindicating my religion.

Did you present a copy of the work to the president?—I think I did—at the same time I did not avow myself as the author, as well as I recollect.

But you presented it to him yourself?—Yes.

Did you present it also to any of the professors in the college?—I think I did, but very few. When I said it was not known to the president, I mean it was not known to him in his judicial capacity; I never told him that I was the author: supposing that the president had wished to institute an inquiry, it would have been very easy for me to say, which I could say to any one, except to such as I had avowed it to, “if any thing comes under my name I am liable to be brought to an account for it—this is not published under my name, you cannot prove that I am the author.”

Have you any reason to know or to believe whether the president approved or disapproved of the circulation of the works of Hierophilos in the college?—I do not know with regard to the circulation of the works of Hierophilos; but I think it due to my character to observe that from the nature of the writings of Hierophilos I would have thought it unwarrantable on the part of any president or superior to prohibit the introduction or the circulation of the writings of Hierophilos, considering especially the nature of the work to which it was a reply, and from which I shall shortly read some extracts.

Was the book submitted to the president before it was published, or did you mean that a copy of the work was sent to the president after it had been printed and published?—After it had been printed and published; I never submitted my writings to the president or any other individual.

In what manner did you present the work to the president?—I presented the work to him as a mark of respect for the president of the house.

Did you present it in person?—I think I presented it myself, that is the impression on my mind.

Did you present either of those works to any of the trustees of the institution?—I did present it to some of them. If I presented it to the president, I very cautiously abstained from ever noticing the author by putting “the author’s compliments,” or any thing that would lead him to know I was the author, that is to say officially.

Do not you think when you presented as marks of esteem several copies of this work to persons at Maynooth, that every person must have understood that you were the author of it?—I think I said before that it was generally understood, at the time I wrote the letter to Mr. Canning, to be mine—it was a matter of notoriety—but there was not that judicial knowledge of it that the statute required—it was as well ascertained nearly as if I had put my name to it. At that time, I held my situation in the college very loosely, I was determined to leave it—the process of my appointment to the situation I have the honour of now filling was in a state of forwardness, and I had not the least doubt of my appointment to the episcopacy; I had less restraint upon me than I would have had if I had remained in the college connected with the body—not that I would have written differently from what I did, but a person who is connected with an establishment must always have a delicacy on that account, which may control him, if not in the expression of his sentiments, at least in identifying them with a body, with which they ought not to be identified.

Were you teaching at the time?—Yes, but I think I never discussed the topic of tithes in the class. I would discuss as a writer topics that I should not introduce in the class.

Had not the letters of Hierophilos been in the course of appearing for two or three years in the newspapers prior to the appearance of the letter to Mr. Canning?—They were in the course of appearing from the year 1820.

Then through the course of four years at least the letters of Hierophilos had been before the public?—Yes.

At the time you published the letter to Mr. Canning are we to understand that you had been actually recommended for the appointment of bishop?—I had been recommended I dare say two years before. I had been recommended to Rome three or four years before my appointment. When I was understood to be the author of Hierophilos, I would not have been recommended if there was any thing in those letters that was thought of an improper tendency.

Will you endeavour to recollect whether the president ever intimated to you in any way that he either approved or disapproved of the letters of Hierophilos circulating at Maynooth?—I do not think he ever did. I never entered into conversation with him about it.

Was there any manner in which he could have suggested to you his disapprobation?—He would have thought it very probably officious, because he might have apprehended that I would have respectfully told him—I have not put my name to those writings, and you are not responsible. I was myself a member of the council which was to interpret the application of the statute to the particular case, and I must confess that though I should be the first to punish a person who would write either seditious or irreligious productions, yet if there was a person who was rumoured to be the author of letters that I looked upon merely as a defence against frequent and wanton assaults on the Catholic religion, I would not have cited such a person merely because he might have violated the statute by writing without the president's permission, and I conceive that others might have a similar feeling.

You have said that you presented a copy to the president, and a few to the professors, and some to the trustees; can you recollect whether you presented any to the students?—If all the letters are meant, the following is my answer: Of Mr. Canning's letter I do not recollect to have presented a copy to any student. Of the letters to the English people I presented a copy to one; and of other smaller editions of them, not containing however Mr. Canning's or those to the English people, I may have given copies to one or two others. I was the more delicate in circulating copies on account of being thought the author of them; in short their circulation required no effort of mine.

In addition to those copies that were introduced into Maynooth as presentation copies, there were some that were sold; can you form any estimate as to what number were sold?—I cannot answer as to the number; that is a question which probably the bookseller can answer.

Did not you give us to understand that the bookseller was directed to send some to the college for sale?—I do not think I contradict that now; I do not think however that I went so far as to say that he was directed; there might be a sort of understanding that he might sell some of them at Maynooth, because other productions of a similar nature were sold there. It will not be thought strange that Hierophilos should have been circulated at Maynooth, when the work to which Hierophilos was a reply was also circulated at Maynooth, the pamphlet of Declan, who was at that time as well known to be a fellow of Trinity college as the author of Hierophilos was known to be the professor of dogmatic theology in the college of Maynooth; and after mentioning that this work was bought up by the students without any thing like censure on the part of the superiors, and circulated in the college, it will not be deemed surprising that Hierophilos might have been bought up as an antidote, and naturally with greater avidity.

In point of fact was Declan circulated in the college by the consent of the president and the professors?—Just by the same sort of connivance: it was not prohibited.

Do you mean to state that if a person had come to the door of Maynooth college with a quantity of copies of Declan's letters, which were contained in the catalogue sent in to the professors, that that work would not have been struck out of the catalogue, but would have been allowed to be sold to the students?—I do not know that it would have been struck out.

Did you ever in fact know that that book was included in any list of books sent up by any itinerant seller of books, and not struck out by the president or the professors?—I do not know.

Can you state to the Commissioners whether, according to your belief, Declan was freely circulated and publicly sold at the college as well as Hierophilos?—It was freely circulated and and bought by the students, not I am sure to the same extent, or with the same desire as Hierophilos.

Do you believe from your knowledge of the habits of the college, that if any student had been caught with that book in his possession, he would not have been subjected to censure for it?—I do not think he would.

Have not all the students of the class of divinity free access to the library?—They have.

Are there not in the library modern works of controversy against the Roman catholic church as well as works in favour of it?—There are, and they are read by the students.

Would not Declan's work have fallen under one of the descriptions in the paragraph about to be read: "Si quis libros in academiam scriptave comportaverit, ad religionem Catholicam Romanam maledictis violandam pertinentia, moresve labefactandos, seditioesve concitandas: etiamque si quis iis libris, quibus omni domo a præside vel decano interdictum sit, nihilominus utatur."?—Whether it would come under that statute I should be able to decide, if the matter was proposed to me in council. I do not know what opinion I should form upon it, but I believe at present that it was not considered to have come under that statute because Declan was circulated in the college.

You have read Declan, and are aware of the nature of the work; do you not consider Declan's book as one "ad religionem Catholicam Romanam maledictis violandam pertinentia"?—Certainly it is, but it is often hard to draw the line between such books and others of a merely polemical character.

Is it not the understanding of the college that works that may be considered of an argumentative nature against the Roman Catholic church, if written in fair and good language, may be freely circulated?—Certainly.

Is or is not this statute of the college considered as directed against publications of a scurrilous and immoral nature?—Against publications of an immoral and scurrilous tendency. With regard to the last question, I may state that the works of Paley and many other Protestant writers, which are certainly opposed to the Catholic church, have been bought and sold at public auctions in the college without censure.

Can you state whether Grier's answer to Milner's End of Religious Controversy was or not sold in the college?—I cannot say, but I think there would have been no objection to it.

Is it in the library to which the senior scholars have access?—I cannot say, but I believe it is. As some passages in the letter of Hierophilos may be better understood by considering the character of the work to which some parts of that letter are a reply, I will beg, with the permission of the Commissioners, to read a few passages from it. I will first read a passage which is contained in page 49 of the second edition which was published in 1824. "On the other hand, my Lord, many weighty purposes have been answered, by having the mass of our population, a population proverbially imaginative and impetuous, kept apart from the turbulent and disaffected spirits of the other portions of the empire. This important end, an end which could not have been attained by merely human foresight, has been the care of an over-ruling Providence; and its instrument, an exclusive and unsociable creed. That creed has secured the same equilibrium, the same sustaining antagonism between the great divisions of our people, which sages study to preserve between the estates of the realm, or the principal members of the European community. The result of this economy has frequently appeared—in 1641, in 1745, in 1798, and again within the last few years. It is in vain that some of our demagogues have made overtures of fraternal union with the radicals of England; that others publish softening vindications of their theological system; that they expatiate on their liberality, nay even on their liberalism. Spite of all their efforts, their religion is a repellent, and no coalition can ever be made. Thus, my Lord, if popery be continued here, it is not for its own sake, as I. K. L. has told you, but for the sake of Britain. Providence has placed a talisman in the hands of British statesmen; and the genius of popery, the slave of the talisman, is compelled to labour for the safety of British Protestants. And when the slave shall have done his work, and Britain shall no longer require his services, the talisman may be broken; the scales will drop away from the eyes of our people, false miracles and false prophecies will be remembered no more, or remembered only to be classed with the superstitions of the Druids." Now I beg to remark, that the impression made upon my mind from this passage was, that the author seemed to look upon the Protestant religion as being fostered by Providence itself in perpetuating the slavery of the Irish people; that it was a principle, a repellent principle, established by Providence itself to keep the different orders of this great empire in a state of hostility with each other; that so far from looking on the Protestant religion as a medium of conciliation or coalition between the different classes, he looks upon it as a providential instrument producing rebellion in 1641, in 1745, and in 1798, and that the obvious meaning of the passage seems to me to be, that however anxious the Catholics are for coalition with England, the genius of their religion is a repellent. He compares our religion to a talisman, which is as a slave to Britain, and when that slave shall have done his work, the talisman may be broken, and false miracles shall cease; and in a word, as the climax of his abuse, he classes the Catholic religion with the superstition of the Druids. I will now beg to read another passage from page 80 of the work of Declan, which will enable the Commissioners to understand other passages of my reply. "But thus far is certain, that the Irish peasantry are in, what ethical writers have called, a state of nature; that they are a law to themselves, and that they follow this law to the utter exclusion of all instituted jurisprudence. To give their last drink of milk to a stranger at midday, and at midnight to burn him in his bed, if he came to take the farm upon which they resided, are with them acts of the same nature, proceeding from the same "code of principles, and regarded in the same light by the judgment of their consciences. "In a similar manner, in spite of all that sovereigns or senates may decree, they are persuaded that they have a right to the land, and their clergy to the tithe; and when opportunity offers, they will act upon the persuasion." In my apprehension, that passage gives such a picture of the Catholic peasantry as to involve, in a great measure, in the same censure, the clergy by whom they are instructed.

We do not observe that either in the titlepage of your Letter to Mr. Canning, or in any passage in the book, except in two passages in pages 45 and 60, is there any allusion at all to the work of Declan?—It is enough if his name were mentioned but once. It is partly an answer to Declan's book, though the general topic is emancipation.

With reference to one of the last questions put to you on a preceding day, is there any thing you would wish to add?—With regard to what I mentioned about an indifference with respect to formularies of faith and creeds, I beg leave to cite the following passages from "Paley's Moral and Political Philosophy," from an edition printed at London in 1817, chap. 22, page 137.

"Subscription to articles of religion, though no more than a declaration of the subscriber's assent, may properly enough be considered in connection with the subject of oaths, because it is governed by the same rule of interpretation, which rule is the animus imponentis. The inquiry, therefore, concerning subscription will be, quis imposuit, et quo animo? The bishop who receives the subscription is not the imposer, any more than the crier of a court, who administers the oaths to the jury and witnesses, is the person that imposes it; nor, consequently, is the private opinion or interpretation of the bishop of any signification to the subscriber one way or other. The compilers of the thirty-nine articles are not to be considered as the imposers of subscription, any more than the framer or drawer up of a law is the person that enacts it. The legislature of the 13th Elizabeth is the imposer, whose intention the subscriber is bound to satisfy. They who contend that nothing less can justify subscription to the thirty-nine articles, than the actual belief of each and every separate proposition contained in them, must suppose that the legislature expected the consent of ten thousand men, and that, in perpetual succession, not to one controverted proposition, but to many hundreds. It is difficult to conceive how this could be expected by any who observed the incurable diversity of human opinion upon all subjects short of demonstration. If the authors of the law did not intend this, what did they intend? They intended to exclude from offices in the church, 1. All abettors of popery; 2. Anabaptists, who were at that time a powerful party on the Continent; 3. The Puritans, who were hostile to the Episcopal constitution; and in general the members of such leading sects, or foreign establishments, as threatened to overthrow our own. Whoever finds himself comprehended within those descriptions ought not to subscribe. During the present state of ecclesiastical patronage, in which private individuals are permitted to impose teachers upon parishes, with which they are often little or not at all connected, some limitation of the patron's choice may be necessary, to prevent unedifying contentions between neighbouring teachers, or between the teachers and their respective congregations. But this danger, if it exist, may be provided against with equal effect, by converting the articles of faith into articles of peace."

Now, I wish to read another passage from the same work, which has reference to this subject, which is contained in the chapter on religious establishments and toleration:—

"If it be deemed expedient to establish a national religion; that is to say, one sect in preference to all others; some test by which the teachers of that sect may be distinguished from the teachers of different sects, appears to be an indispensable consequence. The existence of such an establishment supposes it; the very notion of a national religion includes that of a test."

"But this necessity, which is real, hath, according to the fashion of human affairs, furnished to almost every church a pretence for extending, multiplying, and continuing such tests beyond what the occasion justified. For though some purposes of order and tranquillity may be answered by the establishment of creeds and confessions, yet they are all at times attended with serious inconveniences. They check inquiry, they violate liberty, they ensnare the consciences of the clergy, by holding out temptations to prevarication; however they may express the persuasion, or be accommodated to the controversies, or to the fears of the age in which they are composed, in process of time, and by reason of the changes which are wont to take place in the judgment of mankind upon religious subjects, they come at length to contradict the actual opinions of the church, whose doctrines they profess to contain, and they often perpetuate the proscription of sects and tenets from which any danger has long ceased to be apprehended."

"It may not follow from these objections that tests and subscriptions ought to be abolished; but it follows, that they ought to be made as simple and easy as possible, that they should be adapted from time to time to the varying sentiments and circumstances of the church in which they are received, and that they should at no time advance one step further than some subsisting necessity requires."

I think, after that, I am borne out in saying that if Paley's opinion was adopted, the cumbrous creed of the thirty-nine articles would be reduced to more than apostolical simplicity. With respect to the point that there is very great indifference to what may be considered the fundamental articles of Christianity among the dignitaries of the church, I beg to state, as a proof of my assertion, that Dr. Clayton, bishop of Clogher, in the preface of his Essay on Spirit, remarks on the articles, that scarcely any two thinking men ever agreed upon one point of them.

Examination of
Rev. Dr. Mac Hale.
6 November 1826.

We beg now to revert to the question with which this day's examination commenced, and to ask, as we did at first, whether it is your opinion that the tendency of the established religion is to lead "to that indifference about truth and error, which extinguishes those moral obligations, that mitigate the sway of the Government, and ennoble the obedience of the subject?"—Any religion where subscription to creeds is considered merely as a subscription to articles of peace, rather than articles of religion, has a tendency to relax those moral obligations which depend upon strictness of belief.

In pages 40 and 41 we observe you have occasion to speak of the Archbishop of Dublin and the Archbishop of Tuam, and that you denominate the first, Dr. Magee, and the second Dr. Trench, without giving to either of them the title of archbishop of their respective sees—will you state whether you consider them as de jure bishops of those sees?—I consider them Protestant bishops of those sees.

As bishops de facto or bishops de jure?—I consider them de facto, Protestant bishops of those sees, and de jure as far as the laws of the country have given them a title.

Was there any particular reason why you did not in that pamphlet give them the title which the laws of the country give them?—The title I would always give them would be that of Protestant bishop, or bishop of the church as by law established; I think I then satisfy the laws of the country.

Have you in any other part of your work given them the title which the law gives to them?—I have, in the preface to the third edition of the Letters of Hierophilos, where I have said, "And if the issue be found such as to excite the regret of the friends of the established religion, let them only recollect," (and I have not here qualified it with the epithet, which I certainly would in future) "that the Archbishop of Dublin has flung down his gauntlet, and therefore cheerfully courted the danger of discomfiture;" at the same time, I beg leave to remark, that the reason I annex the word Protestant as an epithet, is lest I should exclude the Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, whom I consider as the legitimate heir of the apostles.

When you mentioned Dr. Magee and Dr. Trench, had you any design at the time in omitting their legal titles?—I do not think I had; because we very frequently speak of the Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, simply as Dr. Murray; I will cheerfully give them any title which the laws give them.

Is there, upon the part of the Catholic bishops, any unwillingness to recognise the bishops of the established church, as established by law?—Certainly not, considering the title as a legal title derived from the law.

But you will observe that the title given to the prelate by law is not that of Protestant bishop but that of bishop?—I must confess that I do not look upon any of them as the Catholic bishop of the see. There is a Catholic bishop in each of the sees. I use the term Protestant as a distinctive epithet, to distinguish them from the Catholic bishops.

The title which the law gives to Dr. Magee being that of Archbishop of Dublin, do you consider him entitled to that appellation without coupling with it the adjunct of either Protestant archbishop, or Catholic archbishop?—If the title of Archbishop of Dublin means merely that he is considered as the bishop of the church established by law, I have no objection to take it in that sense. But if it would be understood that by calling him Archbishop of Dublin, I am to recognise him as the Catholic successor of the apostles, I shall refuse him that title.

Or as Archbishop of Dublin, exclusive of any other?—I shall not acknowledge him as Archbishop of Dublin, exclusive of the Catholic Archbishop of Dublin.

Do you recognise him to be that Archbishop of Dublin, who has a right to exercise all that species of power called ecclesiastical, which is conferred by law?—Yes.

And to enjoy all the revenues and jurisdiction which are derived from the authority of the state?—Yes, and temporalities; but I do not consider him that Archbishop of Dublin who inherits the ancient apostolical doctrine of the Catholic church.

Do you consider him as of right possessing any spiritual authority whatever?—All that spiritual authority which he can derive from the laws; in short, I give him all those privileges which the law gives him.

Do you conceive that the law of the land is competent to confer spiritual authority on him?—No; I do not think the law of the land is competent to confer spiritual authority; it is not the source of spiritual authority.

Do you think that he has any spiritual authority, even over Protestants in the established church?—Whether that be spiritual authority or not, I know not; they may consider it spiritual authority; I will not quarrel about whatever authority is exercised over Protestants, but I distinctly state that I do not consider that the temporal law can confer spiritual authority. It is no wonder that I should doubt whether they can exercise any spiritual authority, since I have doubts about its source. Valid ordination is the ordinary channel through which spiritual power is transmitted, and as I entertain serious and well-grounded doubts about the one, I entertain similar ones regarding the other.

We observe that in the original letters of Hierophilos to the English people, you apply to the Archbishop of Dublin the title to which he is entitled by law; but we observe, that in the letter to Mr. Canning, at pages 40 and 41, you do not attribute that title either to him or to the Archbishop of Tuam, but you call their Graces simply Dr. Magee and

Dr. Trench; had you any particular reason in your mind, or motive for withholding their legal titles when you were writing those pages?—The Commissioners will see that I have not withheld the title, by a reference to other passages immediately following those referred to in the question:—“While Dr. Magee denounced from his cathedral the religion of Catholics, without condescending to assign a particle of argument for the sentence of proscription, the profound corporation of Dublin pronounced his Grace to be an oracle of theological wisdom. After the grave decision of so competent an authority, it would have been impiety to dispute his Grace’s pretensions.”—In using the term “his Grace,” I recognise him as the Protestant Archbishop of Dublin.

In those two places where “his Grace” occurs in the passage just quoted, was not the expression used in a tone approaching to contumely or ridicule?—With regard to contumely or ridicule, there is a tone of irony through the letters of Hierophilos which I do not disclaim, and in which I shall be borne out by reference to high authorities; but I must say that the irony is here directed to the corporation. In point of fact, I have given to the Protestant Archbishop of Dublin, and to the bishops of the church established by law, the titles which the law requires; this is evident from a reference to that passage, and also to other passages in the work.

In the letter addressed by you to his Grace, in answer to his charge, do not you address him directly as the Archbishop of Dublin?—I do. In pages 40 and 41 there is this passage: “Dublin, however, was not the only stage on which the Protestant ecclesiastics stimulated the expiring power of their followers. Doctor Trench, whose exertions in relieving the poor of the extensive diocese of Tuam are gratefully remembered, evinced, in the course of last summer, a more than ordinary zeal for the Protestant establishment. It is with reluctance that I associate Doctor Trench with the other individuals who have endeavoured to ferment their flocks with the leaven of religious bigotry. Had his Grace refrained from those invectives against his Catholic brethren and their religion which he discharged from the pulpit, he might have descended to the grave with the character of a meek and pacific prelate.” The whole of that passage I wrote from the fulness of my soul. I beg leave to refer to another passage with respect to the feeling of the people towards such a man: “On that occasion the solicitude of the bishop was unremitting.” That shows that I had no design but to speak the language of law and the language of respect for an individual filling his exalted station. “On that occasion the solicitude of the bishop was unremitting in applying the relief which had been obtained from Government and the English people to the wants of the distressed peasantry. This kindness was not lost upon the people; and the day on which his Grace witnessed his harvest cut down by the gratuitous labour of the neighbouring peasantry, proved that they are not the insensible wretches they are represented to be by the violent and venal defamers of their creed. Such acts demonstrate that they possess a generous susceptibility of kindness from whatever quarter it proceeds; nor do they confine to the professors of their own faith the retribution of their gratitude.” I think it quite necessary to refer to this passage, as it will be a refutation of the pamphlet to which I replied, and which represented the peasantry of Ireland as a people who were a law to themselves, and whose acts of violence and acts of benevolence proceeded from the same principles. I beg to observe too, that in the course of two pages the word “his Grace” is found applied to those two prelates five or six times. At the same time that I do not consider them as the heirs of the apostolical doctrine, I shall never withhold from any individual the titles which the law gives him, though I do not look upon the municipal law as the supreme standard of fixing one’s belief. Were the law to guide our creed we should adopt the doctrine of Hobbes, who teaches that religion may be modified according to the caprices of human governments. With regard to the preceding topic of discussion, the following passage from St. Augustine may be illustrative of that respect which the author of the letters is disposed to pay to every person according to his station in society; it is contained in page 19 of the Letters to the English People: “They still continue to be the preachers of that doctrine, whose salutary influence on the peace and happiness of society is conveyed in the feeling apostrophe of Saint Augustine to the Catholic church: ‘By you the young, the adult, and the old are taught the respective duties of their age and condition. By you the wife is connected with the husband in the bond of affection, chastened by virtue, and subjected to his person by a control mitigated by religion. Through you the father and the child exercise the reciprocal relations of filial obedience, exalted into piety, and paternal authority softened into love. Through you the ties of kindred and of blood are more closely knitted together by the hallowed influence of charity. Through you the servant forgets the hardships of his condition, and converts into a willing duty the servitude which necessity first imposed. Through you the master relaxes his dominion, while he is taught to conciliate by kindness those whom nature has subjected to his control. It is you that connect citizens in the bonds of concord, spreading the affections of consanguinity over the different families of the human race by the recollection of a common origin. Thou teachest kings to watch over the welfare of the people, and the people to bow to the majesty of kings. And through all the gradations in society, it is thou that teachest who are the objects of fear, of affection, of respect, of punishment, of consolation, of reproof and of correction; impressing on our minds that while these must be apportioned to different individuals, ALL are to be the objects of our charity, and NONE of our resentment.’” I do not think there is a finer passage in any writer.

In page 28 of the Letter to Mr. Canning we find the following passage: “In speaking of the Protestant establishment it may be considered in the relation of a religious or political system.”

“system. If we view it merely under the former complexion, there is no Christian who will think it deserving of his reverence, only in the same proportion as it reflects the revealed doctrines of Christianity. Under this point of view, its conformity with the doctrines of Christ becomes a subject of fair investigation; and should it appear that the doctrine of the establishment has departed widely from that which Christ has revealed, such a religion could not be deemed essential to society, unless we were to suppose that error is more favourable than truth to the happiness of mankind; or, to adopt the paradox of Hobbes, as dangerous in its consequence as it is absurd in its principle, that truth and error entirely depend upon the caprice of legislators, and that the will of the Government is the sole standard of our faith, and the sole measure of our duties.

“If, on the other hand, we view it as a political establishment, endowed with temporalities, deriving its origin entirely from the legislature, and thus proving by the admission that it can be dissolved by the authority by which it was created, then we are relieved from the embarrassment that is produced by confounding it with its religious pretensions. We may bring to the subject a mind unawed by the reverence which a belief of the true religion imposes, and judge of the utility or inutility of the Protestant establishment by an impartial view of the benefits which it confers, or the evils of which it is productive.

“Or, in fine, if we should consider the Protestant establishment as a religious and political system, united by the legislature, the question will resolve itself into the views already exhibited, since no state can derive support from religion but because it is supposed to be true; nor is it easily conceived that any religion of mere state creation can lend to that state by which it was created any other authority than that which it has received from the state to which it owes its creation.” Is the bearing of that whole passage that the present church establishment might well be dispensed with?—If it seemed wise to the legislature, to which it owed its birth. I beg to state that an answer to that question may be collected from a reference to two other passages; in page 59 there is the following passage: “While I thus combat the weakness of those arguments on which the advocates of the establishment would fain rest it, let me not be numbered among those rash theorists who, without regard to the urgency of the circumstances, would instantly subvert a long established system. With such theorists I have no concern, conscious that their immature conceptions would be often more dangerous in their execution than inveterate abuses. Instead of advancing any thing disrespectful to the Government or legislature of the country, my design has been to expose the presumption of those who would fain place any portion of society beyond the reach of legislative interference. In the enactments which the wisdom of Parliament will pass the Catholics will acquiesce, nor shall they refuse, while the state requires it, to contribute to the support of its public functionaries.” I fancy that a person who has written that, has no wish to subvert by violence the established church of the country; but if the King, Lords and Commons, in their wisdom, thought any modification necessary, we would acquiesce in such laws, because they are the supreme source of legislation.

The question did not mean to attribute any intention of subverting the established church by violence, but the object of it was to know whether it was the meaning of the whole passage that it was better that the church should be dispensed with?—If the King, Lords and Commons thought it better that it should be dispensed with, we should acquiesce in the wisdom and justice of their resolves. The church establishment of course I look upon as a work of human contrivance.

Was it not meant to suggest by the passage, that it would be wise in the legislature to take that course?—I do not think myself of sufficient importance to imagine that the legislature would adopt such a suggestion from me; but there is no doubt in the world, if the legislature adopted such a course, but we should consider it a very wise one, from the respect we have for the legislature.

Is it not the import of the passage that the continuance of the Protestant establishment in Ireland is inconsistent with the good of the country and the improvement of the people, and that it ought, as a corporation which has not answered its end, to be put an end to?—Without reference to Parliamentary enactments, I do not consider the church establishment in this country as an institution propitious to its welfare. But as I am bound to obey the laws, I shall acquiesce in the enactments of the legislature. If there were no laws to bind me, I should feel no respect for the establishment; but as it is upheld by the legislature of the country, I respect those enactments by which it is upheld.

In page 54 we find the following passage: “Whatever may be the natural tendency of the Protestant religion to a latitude of belief, ultimately fatal to the best interests of society, while those great principles on which it reposes are respected, its stability is upheld, and those by whom they are inculcated confer a political benefit. Hence the Protestant clergy have in England a natural and constitutional right to the tithes, since they are the real as well as the constitutional ministers of religious instruction. Here the case is different; the instruction of which the people stand in need is imparted by the Catholic clergy. With Protestant ministers they hold no communion; and hence, as no spiritual benefit is conferred on one hand, there is no obligation of paying tithes on the other, save what the civil law imposes. Since, then, there is no natural claim to tithes arising from the interchange of reciprocal duties and relations, beyond what the law has established, it follows that the law can annul an obligation which is founded on no higher principle.” Did you mean to suggest that the Protestant clergy in England have a sort of right to the tithes, which they do not possess in Ireland?—I think the passage is so clear that it scarcely wants interpretation. I think that in both countries they have a right, and that in England they have a higher right; they have in Ireland a right which arises from the enactments of the legislature, and

I recognise no other, because, as is mentioned here, they confer no benefit in my mind on the great body of the people, and therefore, independently of the municipal law, there would be no natural obligation. In England they are the instructors of the people, and therefore I look upon them as having a natural as well as a legal right. In both countries they have a legal right. I dare say if to-morrow an Act of Parliament was passed depriving the ministers in the Protestant church of any right to tithes, it would not be considered by the warmest advocates of the establishment that they had any natural claim to them from Catholics. Such is my meaning. At the same time that I should not consider that the ministers of the Protestant church have any Divine right to tithes, I also consider the ministers of the Catholic church equally destitute of any similar claim; for nothing is further from me than to insinuate, either by word or writing, a right of resumption of the tithes on the part of the Catholic clergy, although they should be forfeited by the others; and the reason is, because tithes, as tithes, are not of Divine precept; the only thing that is of Divine precept is the necessity of paying the clergy.

In page 54 we observe this passage: "It is therefore an useless waste of time to prove that parsons have a legal title to their tithes; it is a position that is not controverted; but it is contended that they have only a legal claim. Little, therefore, will be effected by the advocates of the system, unless they demonstrate that these rights lie deeper than mere legal enactments, and that they cannot be overturned without digging up some of those foundations which legislators themselves are taught to revere, and on which all the superstructure of civil law is erected. But instead of finding a claim to tithes connected with those sacred principles, such a claim is at variance with them all. The Protestant clergy of Ireland may insist that tithes are a portion of their rights; but these are rights, to use the language of Mr. Burke, which are the most odious of all wrongs, and which, as soon as they degenerated into wrongs, the legislature may abolish. Whether the legal rights of the Irish Protestant clergy are among those wrongs, the wisdom of Parliament will eventually decide; for certain it is that they are held by virtue of no other authority." Is it not intended to state there, and very strongly, that the sooner tithes are got rid of the better?—If the Parliament wishes to do so, I have no objection; it is not meant to stimulate the Parliament to such a measure.

Is it meant to state that tithes "are the most odious of all wrongs?"—I beg to observe that in that passage there is a typographical error; as, instead of the words "but these are rights," it should be "but there are rights which are the most odious of all wrongs." If the legislature thinks that those rights may be numbered amongst them, who is it that will controvert the wisdom of Parliament? I do not think that a person can be accused of writing any thing disrespectfully to the Government; who seriously, and in almost every page, appeals to the wisdom of Parliament.

In page 55 there is the following passage: "But the establishment has now become conscious of its strength; and though in its infancy it acknowledged the competence of the power that erected, and the omnipotence of the hand that enriched it, it assumes a haughty tone and defies annihilation. The establishment of the church of England is a work of human contrivance, growing with the progress of mind, and gradually partaking of all the improvements of the times. Its artificers ought therefore to practise a lesson of respectful moderation, lest by aspiring to an independence of the power to which it owed its origin, they should give a proof of their folly, instead of an argument of their wisdom; and by despising, in an evil hour, the omnipotence of Parliament, they should provoke its vengeance to suspend their daring undertaking, and scatter the workmen in confusion over the earth." Will you explain what is meant by the phrase "scattering the workmen in confusion over the earth?"—It is an allusion to a passage in scripture.

To the tower of Babel?—Yes.

Who are the workmen intended here?—I consider that the meaning of the entire passage will be illustrated by a reference to the works of Paley, which I have already cited. He seemed to think that formularies of faith were to be adapted to the growing improvement of the times. But in making use of an allusion, I do not think an author was ever yet called upon to explain every single word of any figure or allusion; it is enough if it have a natural though general application.

The question is, whether it is not the plain import of the whole passage that the time is to come when the church of England is to be scattered over the face of the earth as the workmen of the tower of Babel were?—The omnipotence of Parliament may do it. I would not have it imagined that I mean any thing that is disrespectful or profane in using the term. I allude to an expression of Blackstone, in which he characterizes the Parliament as omnipotent; and I mean, that as the existence of the church establishment is owing completely to the power of Parliament, that very same Parliament, if it seems wise to it, may achieve its annihilation.

There is no question as to the power; the only question is, whether that passage does not express an anticipation that the power will be exercised?—Undoubtedly. I do not look upon the church establishment as an eternal institution; I think it is like all human institutions, subject to the vicissitudes of time and decay; but that is quite different from the anticipation of violence.

But you do look upon the church of Rome as an eternal institution?—As coeval with time.

And to continue as long as time shall exist?—And to continue as long as time shall exist; and I distinctly state so; it is that church of which Christ said "that the gates of hell shall not prevail against it;" and I think that in the uninterrupted continuance of that church church to the present time, we may behold in some measure the fulfilment of the prophecy of the Redeemer. I beg leave to remark, that I should not think it would be disrespectful to the establishment to say that, in process of time, the very same Parliament could dissolve it, which created it two or three hundred years ago.

In page 58 we find the following passage: "And if it be to cement an union between England and Ireland, we are taught by the clearest reason that an union cannot be effected between extremes, by a medium which has not a sympathy with both. Now instead of the establishment being such a connecting medium between the countries, it is calculated to keep them asunder; and doubtless they should approach with stronger affinities by the removal of the intermediate body, with which one cannot associate. Happily, I have before removed any possible suspicion of being unfavourable to a connection between England and Ireland." Is not this passage intended to represent the church establishment as preventing, so long as it exists, an union of the two countries from being either strong or permanent?—From being stronger than it is, I dare say it is; to use what is called an argumentum ad hominem, I shall again refer to a passage of Declan, in page 49, where he says, "On the other hand, my Lord, many weighty purposes have been answered by having the mass of our population, a population proverbially imaginative and impetuous, kept apart from the turbulent and disaffected spirits of the other portions of the empire. This important end, an end which could not have been attained by merely human foresight, has been the care of an overruling Providence, and its instrument an exclusive and unsociable creed. That creed has secured the same equilibrium; the same sustaining antagonism between the great divisions of our people, which sages study to preserve between the states of the realm, or the principal members of the European community." From this passage it appears that if I have been wrong in my sentiments, I was only taking the very same view with a person who is generally supposed to be a distinguished Protestant minister.

If it be, as it is stated in the passage quoted from your work, the effect of the church establishment to prevent the union between England and Ireland being cemented, is not the passage intended as a strong argument for getting rid of that establishment, just in proportion as you set a value on the union?—I think that the manner in which a great number of the Protestant clergy demean themselves towards the population, by their angry zeal and their vituperative writings, interposes a great bar to a more effectual union in mind and spirit between the different classes, and that their conduct has prevented the population of this country from being so attached in affection to the English connection as they would have been. Fortunately I have obviated any objection to my letters on that ground; for I believe no writer has advocated more strongly the necessity of the union between the two countries.

In page 60 there is this sentence: "As the ministers of the established church are officers who are paid, because they are supposed to perform certain duties, to grant them annual pensions out of the exchequer would remove much discontent, and answer all the ends of distributive justice." We beg to know whether you would call the ministers of the Roman Catholic church by the appellation of officers?—No; but I speak there the sentiments of some of the first reformers. I have not the work by me now; but I dare say I should be able to show that Cranmer, and some of the first distinguished Protestants, considered themselves as functionaries or officers, who might be removed or appointed at the pleasure of the Crown. This may be the reason I call them officers.

Is it not meant by the expression to imply that they have no higher character than that of a mere officer?—No, it is not; however, it is very doubtful whether they have any higher character than mere ecclesiastical functionaries. If by character is meant the character of ordination, I have very strong and well grounded doubts about it. In another place I call them the ministers of the established church; the word officer implies nearly as much, since it comes from officium, and means a person who discharges a duty.

Do you state that the use of that term was not intended disrespectfully?—I do not think it was, unless it be meant disrespectful to express a doubt of the validity of the ordination of Protestant ministers.

Observe the next clause in the sentence, "because they are supposed to perform certain duties;" does not that phrase mean to imply that they do not really perform those duties?—They are supposed to perform certain duties; that is, to fulfil those duties towards the community, from the discharge of which duties the obligation of paying tithes, or any remuneration, would naturally arise. As they perform no duties to the great mass of the Catholic population, there is no natural obligation of paying tithes; I say natural, since they are still entitled to them by law. If the legislature thought wise to pay them out of the treasury, it might remove some discontent.

The question is, whether the expression used there is not meant to imply, that they do not really perform the duties they are supposed to perform?—They certainly do not perform towards the Catholic population those duties, the performance of which would naturally imply the obligation of paying tithes, or any ecclesiastical dues; at the same time I distinctly state, that while the law requires tithes to be paid to them, Catholics will acquiesce in its decisions.

Did you mean to insinuate by that passage, that the Protestant clergy do not discharge their duties towards their own flocks?—Not at all; but in some parts of the country they have scarcely any flocks, and therefore but few duties to perform. I could refer to a part of the country in which I live, where there are entire parishes in which there is scarcely any Protestant flock, and where, of course, the minister is not burdened with much duty.

In page 61 we find this passage:—"It is then unnecessary to dwell on the obvious reasons that,

“that attach many individuals to the Establishment. While it possesses wealth and patronage to lavish on its adherents, it will not want the aid of those who may mistake the splendour of its honours for the splendour of its evidences. If the mind should hesitate between opposite motives of belief, the weight of the tithe-system may have some influence in deciding its fluctuation.” Is it meant to deny, in that passage, that there is a conscientious attachment on the part of Protestants to their religion?—It is meant that a great many of them are attached to it from motives of mere worldly interest. It is not said that none are attached to it from conviction; the passage is not susceptible of such a meaning; but it plainly states that a great many are attached to it, and are brought over to it from mercenary motives.

Is it meant that the majority of Protestants, for instance, are not conscientiously convinced of the truth of their religion?—I declare I do not think that if a person were putting a construction on my writings, and were to ask me, did they mean such and such a conclusion, which might be wrested from them, that I should be called upon to answer every such question. The passage is, “While it possesses wealth and patronage to lavish on its adherents, it will not want the aid of those who may mistake the splendour of its honours for the splendour of its evidences. If the mind should hesitate between opposite motives of belief, the weight of the tithe-system may have some influence in deciding its fluctuation. Instead of wondering then at the conduct of those who desert the religion of their birth to enlist themselves under its banners, it is a matter of surprise that greater numbers are not attracted to its service.” I think that passage is so clear that it requires scarcely any explanation.

In page 64 we find this passage:—“While therefore the benefits of the Protestant establishment are eulogised by those by whom they are exclusively possessed, we are ready to make large allowances for the exaggerations which gratitude inspires. That it should be commended by those who have been taught from their infancy to associate it with whatever is venerable in their religion, cannot excite our wonder; but that it should have subdued all the prejudices of early impressions, is a circumstance that may be viewed under different complexions.” Is the meaning of that passage, that no convert to the Protestant religion from the Roman Catholic church can be conscientious in his conformity?—I scarcely think any, or if he be conscientious, he must have a very erroneous conscience indeed. I think the greater number are swayed by motives of worldly policy and worldly interest.

In page 65 we find this passage:—“In the enormous fortunes that are amassed by those ecclesiastics,” meaning of the established church, “the reader may perceive the benefits that are derived to the humble tenantry. It has been often insinuated that the Catholic clergy look with an evil eye on the temporalities of the Protestants, and that their hostility proceeds from a hope of one day participating in the spoil. Those, perhaps, who saw themselves ejected from the temporalities which they long possessed, and which were transmitted by a title as sacred, at least, as that by which they are held by their present proprietors, might naturally enough have cast a longing eye after their possessions, and cherished some lingering hope of restoration. But that generation has long since passed away. Like the descendants of those who were stripped of their patrimonial estates, and who have long since acquiesced in the transfer of the law, the priesthood of Ireland have relinquished every claim to the possession of the church lands; they have, in retaining their doctrine, succeeded to the best and most valuable portion of the inheritance of their predecessors; nor should they ever covet the temporalities of the Establishment, lest they should share the fate of the unfortunate Giezi, and lest by succeeding to Naaman’s wealth, they should inherit Naaman’s leprosy.” We will beg you will explain what is meant by Naaman’s leprosy, as applied to the established church?—It is a passage in the 5th chapter of the 4th book of Kings; and it belongs to that class of allusions, or figures, regarding which, provided there is a general analogy, no master of the laws of language or of rhetoric will require a rigorous adaptation of every phrase. If it is happy, it will be a proof of good judgment; if not, it may betray a want of taste.

Still we apprehend there is some meaning in a figure of rhetoric. We are perfectly aware of the story of Naaman; the only question is, what is meant by Naaman’s leprosy as applicable to the established church?—The allusion has surely its appropriate meaning, which is, lest by inheriting the wealth of the established church, we should inherit its errors.

What kind of errors appear to you to flow from wealth?—Sloth and luxury; vices rather than errors. But it has religious errors too, which often follow in their train.

In page 88 we find this passage:—“Like ancient Rome, England glories in her piety, because she extends to every sectary the privilege of citizenship; and because, with the exception of the true faith, she excludes no form of error from her worship.” Do you really consider that a just character of the church of England?—I declare I do; in the language of Osee, “according to the multitude of her fruit, she hath multiplied altars;” and in the words of another prophet, “according to the number of her streets, she hath set up altars of confusion.” But as it is only a partial character which might be thought to exhibit its darkest side, it is only justice to that great nation, and my feelings towards her, to adduce another passage, which represents her portrait more fully and fairly to the reader. “Nay, when I contemplate the singular lot of that nation, poised in the happy mean between democracy and despotism; enriched with the treasures of every art, and ennobled by the conquest of every science; her chief city ‘the mart of the nations, and her traders the nobles of the earth;’ still more agitated by religious factions than the waves that are breaking breaking around her cliffs, I am obliged to characterize her in the language of one of the divinest of our own bards:—

“ ‘ A wand’ring bark, upon whose pathway shone

“ ‘ All stars of heav’n, except the guiding one.’ ”

Examination of
Rev. Dr. Mac Hale.
6 November 1826

In page 91 we find this passage: “ Having thus taken a patient review of the state of Ireland, and the condition of its inhabitants, I cannot dissemble my conviction that the great source of its misfortunes is the malignant character of its laws.” Will you explain the meaning of the epithet “ malignant,” as applied to the laws of this country?—I look upon those penal laws as malignant which proscribe the Catholics, and require of Protestants, as a condition to obtain office, to declare before God, that the religion of Catholics is damnable and idolatrous.

You will observe that the character that is here passed upon the laws of the country is quite general; there is nothing in the passage that appears to restrict it to the laws against the Catholics?—As the Commissioners wished to have my meaning, I chiefly referred there to those penal laws which have been passed in hatred of the Catholic religion.

Was it not meant also to include the laws which uphold the Protestant church establishment?—No, unless negatively; i. e. as far as the laws which proscribe Catholics are deemed essential to the safety of the Protestant church establishment. In that passage I chiefly regarded those laws which have persecuted the Catholic religion, and of which some of the venom still poisons the charities of life. I beg leave, in reference to that point, to read a passage regarding what I consider the influence of good or bad laws, in page 7 of the letter to Mr. Canning:—“ It is a profound remark of Montesquieu, that ‘ the customs of an enslaved people are a part of their servitude, and those of a free people a part of their liberty.’ Of the justness of this remark England is perhaps one of the happiest illustrations. Though soil and climate may have some influence in the formation of character, yet it is little, compared to laws and education, by which all the natural obstructions arising from climate have been subdued. To what are we to trace the vast difference between the inhabitants of the same country in different epochs of their history, if not to the difference of their moral and political institutions. Carthage, whose commerce once covered every sea, and whose resources enabled her to grapple with the Roman strength, now languishes under the despotic sway of the Dey of Algiers; its site almost a problem, and its inhabitants exhibiting the last symptoms of human degeneracy. Athens and Sparta still enjoy the same mild and temperate climate, which preserved their inhabitants equally free from the effeminacy of the eastern, or the ferocity of the northern nations, to which their sages ascribed their superior civilization. Yet, if we except some transient gleams of their ancient glory, which are occasionally seen to cross over the melancholy condition of Greece, in vain do you look among its inhabitants for those sublime models of the human character which were formed by the laws of Solon, and the lessons of Socrates. While those nations exemplified, in the salutary influence of their laws, whatever was elegant in the arts, or abstruse in the sciences, Britain was yet unknown or despised; yet when the corruption of the principles to which those states were indebted for their greatness gradually produced their dissolution, the vigorous seeds of jurisprudence that were first transplanted from the forests of Germany have thriven in the British soil, and spread into such majestic growth, that arts and science, and peace and freedom, securely repose under its protection.” From that passage it will appear what vast importance I attach to laws in improving or demoralizing a people; and from the concluding paragraph there, it will be seen how much I admire the British laws in general, as being productive of arts and science, and peace and freedom; and that, therefore, when I spoke of the malignant character of the laws of Ireland, I spoke of those laws which a hatred of the Catholic religion first suggested.

Do you think this a desirable sentiment to be brought before the young minds of the students at Maynooth?—I never contemplated bringing it before the minds of the students of Maynooth, more than the sentiments of Paley, or of any other writer on religion.

But surely Paley has not represented the laws of England as malignant?—No; but Dr. Johnson, another Protestant, has those strong words:—“ The Irish are in a most unnatural state, for there we see the minority prevailing over the majority. There is no instance, even in the ten persecutions, of such severity as that which has been exercised over the Catholics of Ireland.”—[See Hierophilos’ Letters to the English People, page 38.] After such an observation from him, I may look upon those laws which have proscribed the Catholic religion, which have put the same price upon the head of a priest and the head of a wolf, as of a most malignant, nay savage character; but I distinctly state that I did not introduce those topics before the students of Maynooth; it was unnecessary; the students of Maynooth cannot close their eyes on the history of their country.

At the bottom of page 68 you will see this passage: “ Thus it is evident what a clear connection exists between the emancipation of the Irish Catholics and the full attainment of those other political advantages of which we stand so much in need. At present, instead of any encouragement being held out to the working our mines, or establishing manufactures, these objects would be instantly checked, lest the trade of England should be injured. We have coal mines in abundance, and others still more valuable, but no capital to work them; or should the attempt be made, the jealousy of the merchants of the sister country would render it abortive by giving a premium for discontinuing the work;” can you now possibly retain the opinions expressed in that passage?—Probably there has been improvement since, but this arose from conversation with men more versed in those things than I have been; and I heard merchants and other people, in the little intercourse I had with them, express such opinions.

Has not there been abundance of proof, in the course of the last two or three years, that no sentiments, similar to those charged upon England in that paragraph, are really entertained?—I have just remarked that the letters were written previously to that period; and we are disposed to acknowledge there has been a great improvement, and a great spread of liberality since that period; in any future edition of those letters I should gladly acknowledge this improvement, and be happy to have further opportunities of expressing gratitude to England.

In page 85 we find this passage: "The Parliament is told that Ireland is in a peaceable state; let them not, however, mistake the peace of Ireland for the repose of happiness and order. It is not that state of tranquillity enjoyed under the reign of Solomon, and described by the inspired writer under the smiling image of 'each one dwelling without fear under his vine, and under his fig tree;' no, but the intervals of peace which she enjoys are the troubled and boding silence of Tacitus, which succeeds the violence of discontent after it has subsided into the sullenness of despair;" will you explain what is intended by the word "boding?"—The meaning of it is what it has in the English language; for example, in Johnson's Dictionary.

What does the silence there spoken of bode?—When those insurrections of the people are checked by military force, that unfortunately occur in spite of all the exertions of the clergy to preach peace and subordination, there is afterwards a sullen discontent which frequently is more boding of future disturbance than it is expressive of contentment.

In page 97 we find the following passage: "To illustrate more clearly the justice of our cause, let us reverse for a moment the relative condition of Catholics and Protestants; and suppose that the interests of six millions of Protestants were sacrificed to the pride and intolerance of half a million of Catholics: would not the empire ring with the loud and reiterated complaints of injustice? but no; the Protestants, instead of bending to unavailing complaint, would assert with their swords the common inheritance of freedom;" will you explain what is meant to be conveyed by the last sentence of that passage?—Nothing but what the words are obviously expressive of; there is no secondary meaning couched under the language.

Is it meant to imply that the mode of settling the question by the sword would be a proper or an improper one?—I think the answer to that question can be well collected from the general tone and tenour of the letters of Hierophilos, which inculcate allegiance in the strongest terms; and the person who could attribute such a meaning to it would mistake very much the pacific views of the writer; so far from that being the proper mode of settling the question, we should consider as rebels, violating the obligation of a law by which they are bound to the Almighty, such as would attempt to settle the question in that way; if the subsequent part of this page were read, it would be a sufficient answer to the last question: "Those who are conscious that their principles are the best stay of Government are excluded from its benefits; while those whose allegiance is only precarious and conditional, are loaded with its choicest favours. The obedience which Catholics render to the Government has its high origin in Heaven. But reflect, Sir, that they whose principle of obedience is so sublime, expect to see the Government reflecting, in the equal distribution of its laws, the wisdom and benevolence of the Divinity, from whom their obedience is derived. There are reciprocal relations that bind sovereigns and subjects to each other, and which are still subordinate to those which bind both to the Almighty; who, if he commands obedience on the one hand, commands justice, and wisdom, and benevolence on the other. Such, Sir, is the powerful influence of Christianity, which, by teaching princes their obligations to the people, has given stability to their thrones, and so mitigated the monarchies of Europe, as to form a striking contrast with Asiatic despotism; such is the doctrine which the ministers of the gospel conveyed to the ears of kings in every period of the church; such was the doctrine by which the bishop of Milan humbled the greatest prince that ever swayed the sceptre of the Roman empire into a public penitent, in the porch of the temple; and such were the lessons of clemency which Bossuet addressed to Louis XIV. amidst the very career of his conquests. In a Government deemed arbitrary, Massillon spoke to the court in language which might be deemed sufficiently bold for the meridian of England. 'C'est pour les peuples tout seuls que le trone lui meme est élevé. En un mot les princes ne sont pour ainsi dire que les hommes du peuple.' As we have not the powerful interposition of such holy and eloquent men to protect us, hence the necessity of the shield of the laws. The Protestants of this country are protected by equal laws; the Catholics of France were secure in the interposition of the church. Alas! we are deprived of the benefit of the one, without ever experiencing any thing but severity from the other. Yes, Sir, the observation of a celebrated historian, that 'seldom were the banners of the church displayed for the rights of the people,' may be justly applied to that of England; whereas, if extended to the Catholic church, it is amply refuted by the examples I have quoted. Whenever our complaints are conveyed to the Legislature, we are repulsed in no quarter with so little mercy as from the episcopal benches; and with one solitary exception, the venerable and illustrious Bishop of Norwich, those who ought to breathe the mild spirit of the gospel have been the most inexorable advocates of rigour and exclusion. As we cannot therefore turn to the church, we again implore the protection of equal laws. And in the name of that God whose image a wise Government ought to be, we solicit the restoration of our rights, in return for the strong, and steady, and uncompromising allegiance which the "terrors of persecution could not shake." That passage expresses my feelings and my sentiments about allegiance.

Whose allegiance is referred to in that passage as being conditional?—I might, for example, refer to the Orangemen, who often declare that they will not hold allegiance to the King but as long as he upholds their own monopoly.

In the 34th page of the letter of Hierophilos to Mr. Canning, this passage occurs, speaking of religious sects: "To share in the overflowing wealth of the country was devoutly wished for by many a needy adventurer who could not reach it by the ordinary channels of trade or commerce, or the learned professions. Hence a new and unheard of factory of Bibles was set up, to which all contributed who sought a character for sanctity; and which employed a vast number of hands in their printing and circulation. Such is the real origin of the Bible system, of which I may have occasion to speak again, affording evidence of England's wealth, but none of her piety;" will you explain what the author meant by "the Bible system?"—The system of Bible societies which have been set on foot under pretence of converting, but in our mind to pervert the Irish people.

Does the author mean that pecuniary gain was the object and motive of those who first established or promoted the establishment of those societies?—He meant it then, and it is still his conviction; there may be some honest and well minded persons, but his conviction is that the greater number of those persons, who are engaged in the Bible societies, are persons who have no other interest in view than that of promoting their own worldly purposes, or of subverting the established church.

And this is applied to those who originally promoted those societies?—I explained that there may be some well minded people who are exceptions; but that is the general character which applies to the persons engaged in those societies. With regard to Bible societies, I do not think any zealous believer in the Christian religion could look upon them with indifference. They were the very persons who first provoked the author of these writings. Before he ever addressed a line to Mr. Canning, or to any of the dignitaries of the church, he was provoked by the imposture of the Bible societies.

In page 243 of the class-book in which you lectured at Maynooth, we find these words: "Sacerdotalis potestas apud infideles non sit à Deo, sed à Diabolo." The question now put does not refer to your own private opinion; the object of it is to ask you to explain what is the sentiment that is intended to be expressed by that passage of the class-book; does it mean to assert that the sacerdotal power in heretical or Protestant churches proceeds from the devil?—It has no such possible meaning; it means the priesthood of the infidels and pagans.

In the very same page the word "infideles" is used twice in a manner that would seem necessarily to include Protestants, beyond all possibility of doubt?—No Catholic writer, however ignorant, would imagine that it means Christians of any denomination.

Then in your opinion the word "infideles" cannot include Christians of any denomination?—I am sure of it, in that sentence.

Will you examine whether it is not used twice in the same page, in such a manner that it must include all Christians not in communion with the church of Rome?—It does not mean it in any part of the page.

Observe these words: "4º Per institutionem Sacerdotii Legalis, non immutavit Deus rationem ac statum Regiæ ac supremæ potestatis, nihilque sacerdotali ordini juris attributum, ad ordinanda temporalia, sive apud fideles, sive apud infideles;" according to the construction you have put upon the word in the former sentence, it would appear that the words "fideles" and "infideles" do not mean to include the various classes of Christians there mentioned, but on the contrary, that that passage meant to assert something about Roman Catholics and Pagans, and meant to be wholly silent about Protestants, excluding them altogether from consideration?—My answer is, that in the former passage there is only a question of the word "infideles;" there was no opposition between the words "fideles" and "infideles."

In the passage last read to you, are Protestants included under one or other of the terms "fideles" or "infideles," or are they left out of consideration altogether?—My apprehension of that passage is, that the expression "fideles" and "infideles" means Christians in general and Pagans; it has no reference, by way of opposition, at all to Protestants and Catholics, but it has a general reference to the great classification of mankind into Christians and Pagans.

Then we are to understand that in the passage last read to you the term "fideles" includes Protestants?—It means Christians of all denominations.

Including Protestants?—It does not exclude them; it refers to the two great divisions of Christians and Pagans.

Could you point out any other passage in any Roman Catholic author that ever wrote, in which the term "fideles" is applied to heretics?—I think not; but it would not be necessary to illustrate my interpretation, because the very object of the writer shows in what sense it is to be taken. When he contrasts "infideles" with a few, it is clear he means Pagans; when it is contrasted with Christians, it has the same meaning; though the term "fideles" is never applied to heretics, still sound logic might teach one that they may be included in the denomination of "fideles" as contrasted with Pagans. Thus though the term "rational animal" should never be applied to a fool, still a fool would not, as contrasted with the brute species, be excluded from the general classification of "rational animals," in which all men are included.

Was the full extent of your opinions, upon the subject of the rights and the stability of the the established church, stated in the letters to which the Commissioners have referred in the preceding part of your examination?—It is a subject to which I gave very little attention, save what I gave expression to in those letters; as to its forming any part of my lectures, the temporal rights of the established church were not at all introduced; I might have discussed the Church of England as a part of the other portions of Christians, who are not in communion with the Roman Catholic church, and applied to them the very same general arguments; but as to discussing its temporal rights or possessions, it never formed part of my lectures in the class.

The question is, whether the letters of Hierophilos contain the whole extent of your views as to the prospect of permanence of the established church in this country?—That is a question that regards my interior sentiments; human tribunals only judge of external actions and opinions.

DURING the time you were at Maynooth as a professor, did you publish any other pamphlets than those two which have been named?—I did publish some other letters under other signatures. I make the declaration, not because I think myself obliged to answer concerning writings which might have been hitherto not known to be mine, but as a sincere proof of what I stated in the letters of Hierophilos, that I should never publish a line which I should not cheerfully avow.

Were they letters in the newspapers?—Letters in the newspapers; for example, in the Courier and Morning Chronicle and Dublin Evening Post—they were very few, and they were some time ago.

The question related to the time during which you were professor?—It was during that time.

Did you bring such publications under the observation of any of the students at Maynooth?—I do not think I did; I was not known to have written them.

Have you ever given or sent to any one at Maynooth, any publication of yours on the subject of the established church, or its dignitaries, other than those bearing the signature of Hierophilos?—Never—I am sure I have not given any other publications of mine, on the subject of the established church, since I never wrote any.

Did you ever give or send to any one at Maynooth any publication of yours upon those subjects, except those publications bearing the signature of Hierophilos?—I cannot say whether those few letters I alluded to did involve discussions upon the established church; the impression on my mind is that they did not.

Did you ever publish any series of letters, as a pamphlet, besides those of Hierophilos?—Never; the letters are very few indeed, probably only two or three, which appeared in the Evening Post and the Morning Chronicle, but never in the shape of a pamphlet.

Do you recollect to what they related generally?—One of them was a defence of the college of Maynooth, against the attack of the Courier, published in the Morning Chronicle.

What other papers did you send letters to?—None, save those already mentioned, viz. the Evening Post, the Morning Chronicle and the Courier; the letter in the Courier was under the name of Hierophilos—it was after the distress in Ireland—a letter of acknowledgment to the English people for their very generous contribution to the Irish in distress; besides those, I wrote another with the initial letter of Hierophilos in the usual journal, of which the object was, if the Bible societies were sincere in endeavouring to reclaim the Irish from the errors of popery, to recommend to them to furnish the peasantry first with roast beef and comfortable clothing, without which necessary preliminaries, they would labour in vain for their conversion. These letters, together with those which bear the signature of Hierophilos, and these alone, form the sum total of my published correspondence.

How many letters may you have sent to the Dublin Evening Post during the time you were in the college?—I cannot say, I think two, under different signatures from Hierophilos.

Upon what subject?—One of them contained pointed, but I thought salutary remarks on the spirit of polemical writing, which seemed to have seized many at the time.

Did you communicate or contribute to any magazine or periodical publication?—Never; the composition of a long and laborious work, which I intend soon to publish, may account for my little leisure, as well as my disinclination, to contribute to periodical publications. I think the other was an expression of just indignation at the assault made at the theatre upon his excellency the Lord Lieutenant, and it was in accordance with the tone of the others.

Is there any thing further that you wish to state to the Commissioners?—In order to be able more accurately to state my opinions to the Commissioners, I would wish to make a few observations upon some of those subjects on which I was examined with respect to the letters. I wish to state that the publication of the letters of Hierophilos was entirely my own act, and an act for which the college had no responsibility. However, in my anxiety to acquit the college of the responsibility of those letters, I should distinctly have it understood, that I did not mean any thing in the way of apology, or of retractation of those opinions, opinions, and I think I owe it to my own character to state, that the opinions which I have given expression to, as a professor in the college of Maynooth, I should now express as a bishop of the Catholic church. With regard to our dispensations from oaths, there is one remark I should wish to make, which is, that I do think the uniform conduct of Catholics is in itself the best evidence of the respect they have for an oath, and how unwilling they are to look in any quarter for a dispensation. If they had more flexible consciences on that subject than they have, they would have attained honour from which they are excluded. My examination also turned partly on the authority of popes to depose kings, and I wish distinctly to state that on that subject, my conviction is, that the authority of kings, or whatever name the supreme civil magistrate may be called in my country, is supreme, and totally independent of any spiritual authority, so that subjects cannot be released by any power from their sworn duties of allegiance; I can therefore state that the ultra Montane opinions were not taught in the college of Maynooth. These opinions would be quite, in our conception, destructive of that allegiance which we owe to our gracious Sovereign; but at the same time that I state that the ultra Montane opinions were not taught in the college of Maynooth, I wish distinctly to declare, that we did not adopt what are generally called the opinions of the Gallican church, contained in the four propositions of 1682, which are connected with the Gallican liberties. The opinions of the ultra Montanes would seem to us to be destructive of the authority of kings, and the other opinions, if pressed to the consequences of which they seem to be susceptible, would appear also to be subversive of the due independence of the church. Between these dangerous extremes, as I think them, the ultra Montane and the Gallican doctrines, there is a very wide interval of sound theology, where the most scrupulous may rest, and where the most excursive mind can find ample scope for the exercise of its energies. It is no wonder that in the college of Maynooth, we should not have been addicted to any of those opinions that divided Catholic schools on the continent. We know very well that other theologians must have been influenced by the place of their education, and that the same motive which induced the French divines to abridge, might have induced the Italian theologians to extend the Pope's authority. There, he was a temporal sovereign as well as spiritual pontiff, and the theologians in the Italian schools might naturally enough have mixed up his temporal with his spiritual character. Here, we were quite remote from the operation of any of those causes that might have influenced the Italian or the Gallican schools, and therefore we were not bound to embrace any theological opinion, but so far as it seemed to incline towards the defined principles of theology.

Can you point out in what particular principles the Gallican church appears to you to go too far?—In saying that the opinions of the Gallican church appear to me to go too far, I refer principally to a proposition in which they say that they will defend the decree of the council of Constance, regarding the superiority of councils over popes. The discussion of the relative superiority of councils over popes, or of popes over councils, seems to me to be exceedingly inconvenient, nor does the council of Constance seem to me to be one of those cases from which a principle of ordinary operation ought to be deduced. The council of Constance was convened in very troublesome times, when the peace of the church was distracted by the contending claims of three rival pontiffs, and therefore it was necessary to restore peace to the church by an exertion of power beyond any former example; the fathers of the council of Constance resolved that they should depose those different claimants to the pontifical throne and establish another. That seems to me to be a case of exception, rather than a case of general rule or application; it may have an analogy with a case of extraordinary revolution in the state, and those who would deduce from it superiority in councils over pontiffs, would appear to reason as erroneously as those who familiarized the ears of the English people to what Burke calls the king cashiering doctrine from the case of the revolution; now the case that occurred in the council of Constance is solitary in the history of the church, and it seems to me to be the operation of that conservative principle, by which vigorous bodies always are enabled to throw off the disease by which they are oppressed, and recover their constitution. To extend the principle of that extraordinary case to ordinary occurrences in the church, seems to be a principle pregnant with danger, and the observation is justified by a reference to the council of Basil, which before the lapse of fifty years since the council of Constance, had, by an abuse of its decrees, attempted to depose the legitimate pontiff; however, in France the dangerous tendency of this decree was happily corrected by the piety of that church, and their strong attachment to the holy see: this justifies me in saying, that I would think it dangerous to embrace the Gallican liberties to their entire extent. I may further state as a fact, that in the full sense of the term, they never were taught in the college of Maynooth; nay, Dr. Delahogue himself, a native of France, showed one of those minds that are superior to prejudices of country, or of education, and content to follow the defined line of catholic doctrine, he did not obtrude particular opinions on the college. Having no motive to be attached either to one or the other opinion, we have neither taught the ultra Montane doctrine, nor the liberties of the Gallican church. I should also say, that the introduction of all the propositions of the Gallican church would seem to me to lessen the salutary influence of the Roman pontiff, which we consider necessary for the interests of religion. In those countries where his power has been extinguished, the spiritual has become in some measure the footstool of the civil authority; when I say so, I wish to be distinctly understood, that I do not mean the honours, or titles or emoluments of the ecclesiastical authority—these may be preserved with a considerable diminution of that spiritual influence, which is connected with the salvation of mankind, and which is never vigorous in promoting that lofty end, but when united with the holy see. In speaking of the established church, in my publications, the opinions I expressed were always expressed

Appendix, N° 39.
Rev. Dr. Mac Hale.

pressed in reference to any prospective enactments of the legislature. I conceive that all property, as well as church property, not only here, but in every kingdom is, subject to legislative interference—that the state has a supreme authority over it, and if the King, Lords, and Commons, which are the sources of legislation, were to make an arrangement with reference to the property of the established church, it would be presumption in me, or I think in any individual, to canvas the wisdom of their enactments.

Were you in the habit of inculcating those opinions, or any other opinions, with respect to the temporalities of the established church, during the time you were in the college of Maynooth, either by conversation or by lecture?—No, never. If I recollect rightly, it was the project of Mr. Pitt to dispose of the church property, and to lodge its amount in the treasury. However, as I mentioned, I expressed those opinions always with the greatest respect to the legislative authority, and as to the dignitaries of the church, we never shall refuse to acknowledge their titles, pre-eminence, civil jurisdiction, and temporalities—they are possessions and titles which we conceive the state can confer, and the state can take away; and following the counsel of St. Paul, we shall never refuse to give honour to whom honour is due, tribute to whom tribute, and fear to whom fear; but, at the same time, that we do not refuse them those titles, or desire those possessions, we do not look upon them as the heirs of the doctrine of Christ, or the legitimate successors of his apostles. With regard to the last question which was proposed, whether I was in the habit of inculcating these things in my lectures, I distinctly stated that I was not, and that answer may be useful in showing the Commissioners, and also in showing the country, that whatever opinions the students at Maynooth may entertain on this subject, they are not the result of academical education. The students of Maynooth cannot close their eyes on those legitimate struggles that are making by their Catholic countrymen to obtain constitutional freedom; these things are openly discussed: they see Catholics almost of every age and profession, they hear them express their opinions, and, consequently, whatever opinions are expressed in the country by clergymen, may be derived from other sources than their collegiate instruction. Bodies like individuals must participate in those opinions that circulate through every country; nor can it be imagined, while all the Catholics of Ireland feel and express their sentiments on emancipation, that the college of Maynooth should be like an insulated spot, over which the tide of public opinion should never roll. Wherever they are educated, the clergy of the country cannot be at all indifferent to emancipation; as long as they know the inconveniences to which they are subject from the denial of the just rights of every citizen, and the advantages which they would reap from their restoration to the constitution, they must of course be anxious to obtain all those privileges, at the same time, following a peaceful and constitutional course. In defending the supreme authority of the Pope, in spiritual matters, and the supreme and independent authority of the King in temporal matters, we conceive we are only giving a legitimate construction to the precept of Christ himself—to give to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that appertain to God.

Appendix, N° 40.
Examination of
Rev. T. W. Dixon.
25 October 1826.

YOU are now a clergyman of the established church?—I am.
Have you any cure of souls?—Not at present.
Where do you now reside?—In the county of Mayo.
When were you ordained?—It was, I think, in 1816.
By whom?—I was ordained deacon by Doctor Waldron, titular bishop of Killala, and I had priest's orders from the Roman Catholic archbishop of Tuam.
Of what part of Ireland are you a native?—Of the county of Mayo.
Have you no preferment whatever in the church?—None; I have been employed in the church at different periods; I have been for nearly five years a curate in the diocese of Killala; I have also had employment in the diocese of London as a curate.
Where were you employed in the diocese of Killala?—In the parish of Balliskerry.
As curate?—As curate.
For what length of time?—I think nearly five years; and I also, within the same period, discharged the duties of another cure in which I had been at one time priest.
What was the name of that parish?—The name of that was Ballycastle or Dunfeeny.
Are the Commissioners to understand that you discharged the duties of a Protestant clergyman in the same parish where you had formerly discharged the duties of a Roman Catholic priest?—Yes, for six months I discharged the duties of a parish as Protestant clergyman, where I before discharged the duties of a parish priest.
Did you hold a curacy in London?—I had not been regularly licensed, but the bishop of London privileged me; indeed he recommended me to the rector, to discharge the duties of the church.
In what parish?—In the parish of St. Mary, Somerset, Upper Thames-street.
For what length of time?—I believe I had been nearly a year discharging the duties of that parish.

When

When did that duty cease?—It ceased in April or May last.

Were you educated in the college of Maynooth?—I was.

From what diocese were you recommended?—From the diocese of Killala.

Who was the Roman Catholic bishop by whom you were recommended?—Doctor Bellew.

Where had you been previously educated?—I had been first educated at home for the first year, and afterwards I had been to a public school at Castlebar.

In what situation in life was your father?—He was in humble circumstances; he farmed some land.

In what way did you receive your education at home; were you a day scholar?—A person principally resided in the house with my father, who had some employment out occasionally, but he devoted the greater part of his time to my education.

In what year were you admitted into Maynooth?—In the year 1810, as nearly as I can recollect.

Into what class were you admitted?—I was admitted into the humanity class; it was then the first class of humanity.

Who was professor of that class at that time?—Mr. Lovelock.

Did you pass through the classes in the regular gradation?—I did not pass through the divinity class regularly; but I passed regularly through the humanity and logic classes.

In what class were you when you left Maynooth?—In the divinity class.

And you had been in it for two years?—It was in my second year in the divinity class that I left Maynooth.

Were you then altogether in the fifth year of your residence at Maynooth?—I had been obliged, from ill health, to absent myself part of the time: I should apprehend I was in my fourth year.

What part of your time had you necessarily been absent from ill health?—After the Christmas examinations of the first year, towards the close of the year, I was obliged to absent myself.

For what length of time?—I should suppose, as well as I recollect, about three months of the first year, and in the second year I totally withdrew. I was recommended to withdraw altogether, my health being then in a very precarious state.

Did you withdraw altogether?—I withdrew from Maynooth in the second year of my divinity course, and I have not returned afterwards.

Previously to your going into the divinity class, what theological instruction had you received?—I occasionally received catechetical instruction once a week.

Did that comprehend any thing but instruction in the catechism?—It was an historical analysis of the Old Testament; very short indeed.

Do you mean Reeve's History of the Bible?—Yes.

By whom were those catechetical lectures given?—The dean generally presided.

Who was the dean at that time?—In my time there were three who filled that office successively; Mr. Fitzpatrick was one, Rev. Mr. Crowley succeeded Mr. Fitzpatrick, and a Mr. Kenny I think succeeded Mr. Crowley.

Did the Old or the New Testament at that time form any part of your study?—Except the extracts used there, the Old or New Testament, considered as such, formed no part of the study then, or at any other period.

What extracts do you refer to?—Reeves's extracts, and afterwards extracts made by the scripture professor.

Do you mean to say that Reeves's book consists of extracts from the scripture?—It is a compilation, and I accordingly consider it as consisting of extracts chiefly; I do not know how to understand it, except that it is an arrangement of extracts from the scriptures.

Does it not contain a great deal of other matter?—Yes, observations by way of note upon the preceding arranged analysis of the Bible.

Were you in possession of a Bible at the time?—No.

Had you access to any Bible at the time?—No.

Had you access to the library during the time you were there?—In the latter years I had, from being acquainted with the librarian, as an accidental circumstance.

Were you in the habit of frequenting the library, and reading books in it?—I was occasionally.

Are the Commissioners to understand you as saying, that during the four years you were at Maynooth, you had not a copy of the scriptures in your possession as your own private property?—I had not that I can recollect, nor was it required of me that I should have such a book as a class book.

Was it not required of you, upon entering the college, that you should furnish yourself with one for your own private use?—Certainly not that I can recollect.

Was there not such a regulation generally adopted in the college?—It is certainly the first time I ever heard of it.

Do you mean that you never heard that such a regulation existed till the present moment?—That is what I mean to express.

Is it your distinct evidence, that at the time when you were in the college, it was not the habit of the young men to have each a copy of the scriptures in his own private apartment?

—Decidedly, as a general practice.

Do you mean to say that you knew of none who had it?—I was not required to have a copy of the scriptures in my possession, nor to have recourse to them; nor did I know of its being the case that many other persons had.

Appendix, N° 40.

Examination of
Rev. T. W. Dixon.
25 October 1826.

What was required is one thing, and the matter of fact, whether they had them or not, is another thing: the question now put to you points to what was the matter of fact?—I certainly state to the Commissioners what is the impression strongest on my mind at this lapse of time. I do not recollect that I was enjoined, on my entrance, by any regulation of the college, to possess myself of a copy of the scriptures as a class book.

How many students, under the rank of the divinity class, do you think were in the college when you were there?—I understood that the whole number was about three hundred at the time I was there. I cannot, with exact numerical precision, answer that question.

Was the majority of them under the rank of the divinity class, or in that class?—Rather a minority I should think.

Speaking of that minority, whatever the number may have been, what proportion of them do you conceive, as a matter of fact, had the scriptures in their private possession in their rooms?—I really did not know of any.

Not of one?—Not of one.

Could they have had them, as a general regulation, without your knowing it?—Certainly not; some might have had them, but I am decided that it was a voluntary affair for any person to have them; it was not required that a person should have a copy of the scriptures as a class book.

The question refers more to the matter of fact, than as to whether it was required or not?—I am not aware that it has been so; some might have had them, but I do not recollect at this lapse of time to have seen a copy of the scriptures in the possession of any of the students of the minor classes.

According to the best of your recollection, if you had possessed yourself at that time, before you went into the divinity class, of a Bible, have you any reason to think that it would have been objected to?—I have no reason to think so.

Supposing the divinity class to have contained rather more than a majority of the total number of the students, in what proportion do you suppose the individuals who composed it were supplied with copies of the scriptures?—I do not think that many of the divinity students were possessed of copies of the scriptures.

Were they not obliged to attend scripture lectures twice a week?—They were.

In what manner did they prepare themselves for those lectures if they were not furnished with copies of the scriptures?—The divinity professor compiles in the course of the week a lecture, which he commits to writing; on the assemblage of the class, he dictates those lectures for the course of half an hour, and then each of the attending students takes down this dictate in writing.

Do you mean verbatim?—Verbatim. Then when he has dictated as much as he thinks necessary, he lectures and explains the part that he has dictated; it is not regularly reading out of the scriptures, but his own observations upon certain passages. He employs a part of his time then in explanation, and another part of it in requiring from the students an account of their proficiency, to ascertain the attention they paid since the preceding or last lecture.

Do you know a book called Menochius's Commentary on the Scriptures?—I do.

Was it not required as a regulation that every student in the college should supply himself, during the first year of his course, with Menochius's Commentary?—I certainly was not aware that it was, because I am satisfied that it would be impossible for them to attend to many commentaries on the scriptures, or on any other subject, and to get through the task prescribed to them in their different classes, from the difficulty of studying the course of education in theology, it being in Latin.

The question is not as to the reasonableness of the regulation, but as to the matter of fact; do you mean to say that there was no such regulation, making it necessary for each student to have a copy of Menochius's Commentary in his possession?—No imperative regulation that I recollect.

Had the majority of that portion of the students who were under the divinity class, Menochius's Commentary in their possession?—No.

Had any and what proportion of them?—I cannot answer that question, because the cause of their possessing such books was merely accidental; they might or might not have them, it was a matter of free will. I have not known any imperative obligation upon the subject.

The question is as to the matter of fact, not as to whether it was a matter of necessity?—I have seen the book in the hands of some, but certainly they were the fewer number.

Of the students in the rank of the divinity class, can you say whether there was a majority who were in possession of Menochius's Commentary?—I conceive there was not a majority who were in possession of that Commentary.

At any period of the course in Maynooth, was it a matter that you have ever heard objected to, that a student should possess a copy of the scriptures for his own unrestrained perusal?—The Douay Testament I never heard objected to.

On any occasion did you ever hear any objection made to any other version of the Testament?—I know that there were none allowed except the authorized version, which is generally considered the Douay Testament, with the notes accompanying.

Do you mean distinctly to state that the majority of the students attending the scripture lectures did not refer to the original scriptures, in order to prepare themselves, but rested satisfied with the notes you describe?—I am perfectly satisfied it was so.

Was that the course you took yourself?—Certainly.

Was

Was it the course that those took with whom you were personally acquainted?—It was, and I studied in the same hall with the rest. We had one public hall. We were not obliged to study in our private apartments. There are public hours devoted to study, and the students all study in the public halls, and by occasionally moving through the hall, I could then have an opportunity of ascertaining what books they were generally possessed of, and resorted to at the hours of study.

While they are preparing in the public halls for the scripture lectures, what number of copies of the Bible may you have seen upon the tables?—I may have occasionally seen perhaps a few copies of the Douay Testament lying on the desks, but I have not known them to have been laid before a person for regular study; because in the dogmatical or controversial course of theology, Dr. Delahogue's book comprises the principal course; and in moral theology, they had a book called Antoine's Moral Theology, and they considered themselves perfectly well prepared, if they were enabled to answer those questions and commentaries, and observations, that were set down in that book of Dr. Delahogue's, and also in Antoine, without looking at any other extraneous matter.

You observe that the present questions have distinct relation to the scripture lectures, and to none other; the question is, when the students were in the common halls preparing themselves for answering the scripture questions, what number of copies of the scriptures you may have seen before any number of students, either the Douay version or the Latin vulgate?—Certainly; I give the same answer that I gave before, that I may have seen a few odd volumes strewed about the hall, but I have seen each person with his manuscript in his hand studiously conning it over, committing it to memory, in order to be able to please the professor, who was generally more gratified at having his own commentary repeated to him again, than any observation the student was able to make in consequence of referring to any other source of information. A few curious characters perhaps might be anxious to see how far the observations of the professor corresponded with the original text, but certainly it was only a few that I believe would have given themselves (or confining myself to the matter of fact) did absolutely give themselves the trouble of referring to the original text.

You have spoken of there being a few Douay Testaments, did you mean by that expression to negative that there was any copy of the whole Bible?—I recollect I think seeing a few copies of the whole Bible.

Where?—They were exposed for sale I think by a hawking bookseller in the hall, and some of the students bought a few copies.

When you spoke of there being a few Douay Testaments, did you mean to exclude the fact of there being copies of the Latin vulgate lying about the common hall on those occasions?—A few copies; not in any proportion to the other books, and not in the proportion of one for each student.

About how many students in the time you speak of used to prepare themselves for the scripture lectures?—I suppose more than half the number, perhaps about one hundred and sixty or thereabouts.

Can you state no general impression about how many copies of the scriptures, including the Latin vulgate and the Douay Testament, and the Bible at large, may ordinarily, upon a fair average, have been upon the tables at which the one hundred and sixty students were ordinarily sitting and preparing for their scripture lecture?—Perhaps from half a dozen to a dozen.

Were those the property of individuals?—The private property of individuals I suppose.

Were they read by those individuals, or by the students at large?—By the individual that chose to read them.

Whether it was his own book or his friend's book?—That depended upon the friend giving him permission.

Were they ordinarily handed about from one to another, or were they not?—Not handed about, but if I chose to ask for one, if the student who was possessed of such a book, and that he chose to lend it to me, I then used it.

Supposing you individually happened not to have a copy of the Bible in either language, and wished to refer to it, were there not at all times books upon the table to which you could refer, by asking the person to whom the book belonged?—It was entirely a matter of courtesy; if he chose to concede that privilege to one, he might.

Have you ever known that privilege asked by any individual in the class and refused by the person to whom the book belonged?—I cannot tax my memory with the fact.

Were you ever refused upon application to look at your friend's book?—I certainly have been refused by some who were not very kind or gracious in their manner; I have been often refused those little civilities.

Have you ever been refused permission by any of your fellow students to refer to their Testament or Bible?—It is a matter I cannot charge my mind with; I know I have been refused permission to look at books, and perhaps the scriptures among the rest.

Had you a copy of the Testament yourself while you were at the college?—Never.

What would be about the price of a copy of the Testament at that time?—I cannot say.

When you were in the divinity class, did you never think of purchasing a Testament?—No.

Were you ever discouraged in any way from possessing yourself of a Testament?—I was not; I spent no thought about it; because I thought it sufficient to answer the questions that were contained in the school-book. I never knew questions from the scriptures to be put; it was not necessary; the course of education did not comprise that mode.

Appendix, N° 40.

Examination of
Rev. T. W. Dixon.
25 October 1826.

Had you ever, at any time, occasion to think that any other individual in the class at the same time with you was discouraged from possessing himself of a Testament?—No, I certainly was not aware of any.

Then you mean to say that there was neither encouragement on the one hand, nor discouragement on the other, to the students possessing themselves of Testaments?—Just so.

But you have known them brought into the public hall for sale, in the presence of the professor and others?—I saw them brought into the hall at the time of recreation.

Could they have come there without the knowledge of the professors?—The professors did not exclude people from bringing things in for sale.

Did the professors permit books to be brought indiscriminately for sale into the common hall of the college?—I have not known such an exclusion; I know the students are not allowed periodicals, such as common newspapers.

Is it usual or customary for persons to bring books for sale into the common hall of the college, without the knowledge or approbation of the superiors?—They are not allowed without some approbation. Those who come there generally come recommended with their books; without some recommendation people certainly were not allowed to come there indiscriminately with books to sell; in the one instance that I allude to of a Bible being brought there for sale, it was a copy of the Bible that had been published at Cork, I think, and the person who brought it there for sale had a recommendation.

Is not the Testament exposed publicly for sale by the bookseller to the college of Maynooth?—In his shop, I suppose, but he does not send them to Maynooth for sale.

Does not the bookseller of the college of Maynooth openly sell Testaments to any person who chooses to buy them?—I suppose so; I never bought one from the bookseller to the college of Maynooth; the only books that the students were obliged to buy are Dr. Delahogue's Treatises upon Controversial Theology, and also a small treatise that the professor of mathematics published; the students were obliged to possess themselves of these books, and I have not known them to be obliged to purchase any other books.

When you had access to the library, can you state whether there were any copies of the Bible in English or in Latin upon the shelves, to which every person who was permitted to enter the library had free access?—There were copies upon the shelves, but the students had not free access to the library.

Were those students, who had free access to the library, in any manner restrained from referring to the Bibles upon the shelves of the library?—I am not aware that they were.

Had not all the students in the divinity class free access to the library?—I am not aware that they had; the library was only open at occasional times.

When did you leave the college?—I think I left it in 1814.

Was Dr. Crotty president before you left it?—He was, and Dr. Everard was when I first entered.

What were the periods of admission to the library for the divinity class at the time you were a student?—I do not recollect that exactly.

Was there not some period on every day in the week during which they were admitted?—I am not very clear upon that subject; but I think it was only on one day in the week.

Were you in the habit of frequenting the library?—I was, very much.

Were you ever prevented from frequenting it?—I was admitted beyond the regular routine, as matter of favour, by the librarian; I used sometimes to assist him, and in consequence of this he admitted me into the library.

Was there at that time upon the shelves of the library any collection of Bibles for sale to the students?—Certainly not, that I recollect.

Had the other students, not in the divinity class, access to the library?—Occasionally, as a matter of favour, it might have been conceded by the librarian.

What was the nature of the illness you had; in what degree did it incapacitate you for your studies?—I undertook too much; I obtained premiums the first year after my admission into Maynooth, and being desirous to continue that sort of school-boy ambition, in the prosecution of that object, by too close an application to study, I became affected in my chest; I was recommended to leave the college and go home.

At what time after your leaving the college did you conform to the established church?—I think, in about three years, or nearly four.

How long were you acting as a Roman Catholic priest before you conformed?—Nearly two years.

Did the doubts as to the truth of the Roman Catholic doctrine, which must have arisen in your mind previous to your taking that step, any of them suggest themselves to you before you quitted Maynooth, or in consequence of any thing that happened at Maynooth?—I must confess that in studying the controversial theology, doubts often suggested themselves to me, but I had been always able to combat them, as I thought at the time, by the explanation given by Dr. Delahogue; for I entered the Roman Catholic church in the full persuasion that she was the mother and mistress of all churches, and that all other churches, particularly Protestant heresies, being excluded from her pale, were subjected to eternal damnation.

What amount of income did you lose by abandoning the Roman Catholic church?—About 300 l. a year.

What prospect had you of obtaining any, and what income, in lieu of it in the Protestant establishment?—None.

Had you no sort of expectation of preferment in the Protestant Church?—None whatever.

Did

Did you become entitled to any annuity, under any law, in consequence of conforming to the established church?—No.

What is the greatest amount of emolument you have ever had in the Protestant church, since you conformed to it?—£. 75 a year, sometimes 80 l.; when I was doing the duties in England it was more than that.

And you voluntarily gave up 300 l. per annum in the Roman Catholic church?—I did.

You must have had some conflict with yourself before you came to that decision?—I certainly had; for it is a very hard thing not only to sacrifice personal emolument, but to sacrifice the good-will and friendship of a person's own family and acquaintance, and to alienate one's self from one's family and one's father's house.

Did you become discountenanced by your family in consequence of taking that step?—In a great measure.

Where did you go to live immediately after you conformed?—Soon after my conformity, though I had no expectation of it at the time I conformed, I obtained a curacy.

From whom?—From the Archdeacon of Achonry, Archdeacon Verschoyle.

Were you acquainted with Archdeacon Verschoyle before you conformed?—No.

Where was that curacy situated?—Within a mile and a half of Killala.

Was it near to the scene of your former duties as parish priest?—It was within six or eight miles of the place where I commenced to officiate as Roman Catholic priest.

How came you afterwards to officiate as a Protestant clergyman in the same parish in which you had been a Roman Catholic clergyman?—While I held the curacy of Balliskerry, the rector of the parish, part of which I possessed as my parish when a priest, being deprived of the assistance of his curate, in consequence of his going to Cambridge to obtain his degree, applied to the Bishop of Killala for an assistant; the Bishop of Killala told him I could undertake the duties of that parish for some months, and that he would procure assistance for me in the discharge of my own, on those days in which I was obliged to attend his duty, as it was only alternate duty once a fortnight, and it was by these means that I performed the duties of a Protestant clergyman in the parish where I had formerly been parish priest.

Was it not particularly disagreeable to you to be posted in the same parish in which you had before that performed other duties?—It was not very pleasant; but at the same time I considered that I had committed nothing that was criminal in changing my religious opinions from motives of conviction.

Must it not occasionally have brought you into unpleasant relations with respect to those persons who had formerly known you as a Roman Catholic priest?—I generally avoided them, except those that I had some idea were liberal.

While you remained at Maynooth did you state any of those doubts which you occasionally began to entertain, to the professors or teachers?—Not at Maynooth; but while I was a priest. I had often had disputations on those subjects in the house of the bishop.

Are you married?—I am.

How long was it after you conformed that you married?—About six years; I conformed in 1818, and I was not married till 1824.

Had you it in contemplation to marry the particular person that is now your wife before you conformed?—I never saw her till long after that.

When did you first see her?—I saw her, I believe, for the first time, about six weeks before I was married to her.

Was any sentence passed against you by the authorities of the Roman Catholic church in consequence of your conduct, immediately at, or about the time of your conforming?—I recollect that the Protestant Bishop of Killala handed me a letter addressed to his care, after I became curate in his diocese, and on breaking the seal, I observed a suspension directed to me from the titular Bishop of Killala; which I immediately handed to his lordship, and explained to him that I believed the reason of transmitting it to his lordship, was that I might have been presented with this letter before I was admitted into the church, in order that they, the popish party, might insist upon my having been a suspended or a degraded character before I was admitted into the church; however, the Bishop of Killala made strict inquiry into my character before he admitted me, and I brought such respectable testimonials as would have induced him to receive me, though I had been maliciously served with this formula of suspension.

The Protestant Bishop of Killala was ready to receive you notwithstanding the suspension?—He said that he set no value upon the suspension, in consequence of his having been satisfied as to my high character.

That if he had received the suspension before you were admitted to conform, he would, notwithstanding that, have received you into the church?—He would have received me under the impression that I did not deserve to be suspended; that it was only a manœuvre or trick that was resorted to, in order that they might say that I was disgraced.

This conversation occurred of course after you had received the suspension?—Yes, and after I was received into the church.

Upon what grounds did that form of suspension issue?—As well as I can recollect, the form of the suspension was in Latin, and it was “propter disobedientiam,” and “propter salutem animæ.”

What could that refer to?—The private judgment that bishops in the Romish church consider themselves privileged to exercise without accounting for it.

Have you any idea what that expression “disobedientia” referred to?—I did not attend the

Appendix, N° 40.

Examination of
Rev. T. W. Dixon.
25 October 1826.

the conference, and instead of attending the conference, I went to the Bishop of Killala to beg he would admit me into the church.

Was it known that you had offered yourself to the Bishop of Killala before that suspension issued?—I believe they had some surmise, for some time previous, that I would not continue in the church of Rome, because I expressed publicly my doubts of it to several of the priests for nearly a year prior to leaving the church of Rome. I had spoken of the differences between the Protestant and the Romish churches in the presence of the bishop, and he uniformly silenced me, after some disputation on the subject, by the interposition of his authority, and frequently threatened me with suspension, if I continued to speak upon such subjects; and I do believe it was fully known that I was admitted into the church before the suspension alluded to was issued.

While you were at Maynooth, did you observe that there was any doubt in the minds of any of your fellow students as to the truth of the Roman Catholic religion?—When I had been there about three years, I had intercourse with some of the more advanced students; I often heard them express what I was shocked at, what I thought was very irreligious and improper. I have heard them express doubts upon the nature of Popery, not perhaps altogether coming to a public declaration, but there are various ways of communicating our doubts.

Doubts of what nature?—Of the truth of the superiority and supremacy of the Romish church.

Did they go so far as to doubt the truth of the Christian religion?—Not that I recollect.

You did not observe any tendency to Deism?—I did not; but I heard some doubts as to the paramount authority of the Roman Catholic church.

How were those doubts in general received by those that they were communicated to; did they excite indignation or discussion?—Generally indignation; but the persons that expressed those doubts to me were acquainted with me, and thought they could rely upon my honour that I would not complain of them.

Have you heard such doubts expressed openly, for instance in the classes?—No.

Was it one person or more that expressed those doubts to you?—I heard perhaps at different times half a dozen people express their opinions in this way, some of whom left the college without taking orders.

Are you acquainted personally with any others who have been educated at Maynooth, and who have since conformed?—I am.

Will you mention their names?—There is a young man of the name of Brennan who has conformed, who studied at Maynooth in my time.

Did he ever express any doubts to you upon the subject?—I was very little acquainted with him then.

Can you name any others?—There were several, some who are still priests, who applied to me when I was in the diocese of Killala, after I became a Protestant clergyman, to try whether I could have them admitted into the Protestant church. I laid those communications before the Bishop of Killala, and he told me that there being no grand jury presentment allowable for the support of such people as formerly, and his diocese being supplied with clergymen, he had no means of making a provision for their maintenance, and that he would think it an act of cruelty, on his part, to admit those men into the Protestant church, depriving themselves of the means of support, and that he could not receive them, and recommended me very warmly to beg of them to reconsider the matter more seriously, and if they were not actually influenced by a sense of conviction, and an inward feeling of religion, not to attempt to conform to the established church with any hope of being provided for in consequence of such conformity.

Do those individuals still continue in the Roman Catholic communion?—Some of them left the country, but I have known some still to continue in it.

Can you state how many?—One left the country, and one died, two I have not made any inquiry about, but I happened to come in contact with four of them since.

Did the one who left the country leave it in the character of a clergyman?—He did.

To go upon a foreign mission?—Yes.

As a Roman Catholic priest?—As a Roman Catholic priest.

Did the gentleman who died, die as a Roman Catholic priest?—He did, I believe.

In the profession of the Roman Catholic faith?—He did: he died suddenly: he died, I believe, of apoplexy.

When you spoke to the bishop, were you persuaded that those persons were sincerely convinced that they were in a state of error in the Roman Catholic church?—I certainly was afraid that the views of some of them were of a temporal nature, because some of them were men whose characters I did not approve of myself. I mentioned to the bishop that there were some among those that made application to me, whose characters were not strictly good, and that it would be very desirable to investigate the motives of all before such people should be admitted, but there were some to whose characters there could be no objection made.

Did you attend Dr. Delahogue's lectures when you were in the college?—I did.

Are you acquainted with the contents of his tract?—I studied it then. I must confess that I could not subject myself now to an examination upon it, but I studied it then. I was obliged to study it, and I prepared myself as well for the examination as I could, but since that time, now several years, I have certainly applied my mind to various other studies.

When you were at Maynooth, were the students required to take the oath of allegiance?—Yes, I recollect they were.

Did

Did you take the oath of allegiance?—I did.

Did you consider yourself bound by that oath?—I considered myself bound by that oath certainly; but at the same time I considered that I could obtain absolution from the oath, if the interests of the church should require it.

The oath itself contains a declaration that you do not hold any such belief; did you make that declaration, believing it at the time, that is, did you make a false declaration?—I was very young at the time. I took the oath, and I was very incompetent to the exercise of judgment. There were several at quarter sessions who came to take that oath: the oath and the declaration were read, and we were required to hold the book and kiss it, and after this ordeal, to make our bow to the chairman and withdraw. I was very young at the time, and I devoted more of my time and my thoughts to my Latin and Greek than to any political consideration.

How old were you at the time?—I am now thirty-three years of age, and I entered the college in the year 1810, so that I was about seventeen years of age at that time.

Did you ever take the oath of allegiance upon any other occasion?—I took oaths on being admitted to the Protestant church.

Did you ever take the oath of allegiance as a Roman Catholic, except upon the occasion of your taking it as a student upon admission to the college?—I do not recollect that I did.

Did you consider the oath when you took it, or during the period during which you afterwards remained in the Roman Catholic church, a lawful oath?—I considered it a lawful oath under the conditions above stated.

Do you recollect having presented a petition to the House of Lords?—I do.

Do you recollect stating in that petition “that your Lordships petitioner can repose little confidence in any oath of allegiance, however qualified, sworn by Papists to a Protestant king, as they consider such an oath unlawful”?—Yes, I do.

Will you have the goodness to explain to the Commissioners how you reconcile the statement in that petition to your former answer, in which you stated, that you considered that oath lawful, being a Roman Catholic at the time?—Being directed by my superiors at Maynooth to take this oath, I considered it lawful for me to take this oath, in consequence of their order—but then I considered that they could absolve me from the obligation of that oath the next hour, if they chose to do it.

What reason had you to suppose that?—That was the general impression on my mind, and I am confident that it was an impression that prevailed generally on the minds of those who accompanied me.

Is any such principle inculcated in Doctor Delahogue’s book on Dogmatic Theology?—I do not recollect that there is.

What is the principle inculcated in that book with respect to allegiance to a Protestant sovereign?—Doctor Delahogue, as well as I recollect, endeavours to reconcile with his general condemnation of Protestants, the necessity of being faithful to them; in class he does that, but there are certainly a variety of ways of communicating hints upon such a subject, and also to save appearances under the circumstances in which he is placed: it is my private opinion, that though Doctor Delahogue sets forth that in his book, and in his class, he is of a different opinion.

What reason have you for supposing that Doctor Delahogue is of a different opinion?—Because at the time that this had been taught in class, I am fully of opinion that the generality of those, who were in the class, believed that they could be absolved from that oath of allegiance, if the church required it; and I consider that such a feeling, coming in direct opposition to the lecture publicly taught, must have arisen from the conviction that it was policy to teach such doctrines.

Have you ever heard any professor of the college of Maynooth at any time, under any circumstances, teach or express an opinion that the oath of allegiance taken to His Majesty was an unlawful oath?—I do not recollect that I have, because my intercourse with them was very limited—it was confined to the class hours; but I can state that the general impression upon the minds of the students is, that it is an oath elicited by circumstances, forced by circumstances, and that a priest, or a bishop, or the Pope can absolve them from the obligations of that oath.

You were a priest in the Roman Catholic church, and had a cure of souls?—I had.

You had charge of a parish?—I had.

Did you inculcate upon your parishioners that it would be lawful for them to break that oath?—I do not think I am bound to answer that question.—[The witness was informed that he would be required by the Commissioners to answer the question.]—I certainly did not inculcate such principles. I never told the people that they were at liberty to violate their oaths, but I know that they were fully of opinion, that I could absolve them from the obligations of that oath.

The question is, whether you taught your parishioners that the oath of allegiance taken to His Majesty by Roman Catholics, and which you yourself took, was an unlawful oath?—I certainly did not teach them such a thing.

Would you consider it your duty, as a Roman Catholic clergyman, to inculcate that principle?—I would consider it my duty, as a Roman Catholic clergyman, to inculcate that principle, if I got such instructions from the bishop, or the Pope, or any superior authority.

The question is, what you felt it your duty to teach your parishioners?—While I was in strict obedience, and in perfect amity with the doctrines and principles of the church of Rome, I considered the Pope’s authority superior to any temporal one, and I considered that disobedience to him was the greatest crime that I could, generally speaking, be guilty of;

of; and I certainly considered that he could absolve me from the obligations of that oath, and that if he required that I should preach to my people that it was necessary for any given reason to violate the obligations of that oath, I should consider it my duty to obey him.

That was your sincere opinion?—That was my opinion then.

Was that your opinion when you were in the charge of a parish?—At the period of time when I was admitted to priest's orders, and at the period of my professional duty, it was.

Your opinion was, that though you had solemnly sworn allegiance to His Majesty, and though you had sworn that the Pope had no right to interfere, directly or indirectly, in matters of a civil or temporal nature—though you had sworn that it was no article of your faith that the Pope was infallible—though you solemnly declared before God, that you did not think that you could be absolved from that oath by the authority of any pope, or any bishop, or any authority of the see of Rome, although they should declare that it was null and void from the beginning—notwithstanding all that, you held the reverse of what you so expressed and swore to?—I held that the Pope could absolve me from the obligations of the oath of allegiance.

Although you swore to the contrary?—Yes; such was the impression I brought with me in consequence of my education, that the Pope could absolve me from all this, if it had any tendency to promote the interests of the church.

Does Doctor Delahogue in his book make any reference to the oath of allegiance taken by Roman Catholics?—I have not looked into that book prior to coming here; it is some years since I have looked into that book, and I beg leave to decline answering those questions that merely regard reading, because I am not particularly aware of what is contained in the book, without having the book before me.

Do you believe it to be a principle held by all Roman Catholics, that the Pope may absolve them from their oaths of allegiance to their Sovereign?—I believe all Roman Catholics hold, that the Pope may absolve them from their oaths of allegiance.

Do you suppose that a Roman Catholic gentleman, who takes the oath of allegiance, believes that the Pope can absolve him from it?—A Roman Catholic, who fully holds the opinions of his church, I do verily believe must consider that the Pope has authority to absolve him from the obligations of that oath; but I do verily believe that there are many Roman Catholic gentlemen who do not go that length of bigotry, and also, satisfied with yielding an external obedience to the doctrines of their church, and not entering perhaps into the very full extent of its bigotry, may not hold those opinions; but when I speak of every Roman Catholic believing it, I mean every Roman Catholic who is bigotedly attached to the most objectionable doctrines of the Romish church.

The question is, not with regard to the objectionable doctrines of the Romish church, but with regard to doctrines of faith; do you mean to say that every sincere Roman Catholic holds, that it is lawful for him to break the oath of allegiance which he takes to his King?—I do believe, if he be a papist, that he must.

The question is, not as to being a papist, but the question is, as to a Roman Catholic who takes the oath of allegiance appointed by the law of this country?—There are some Roman Catholics who are liberal men, and there are others who are extremely illiberal and bigotted; there are some that I believe are men of honour, who would not violate their oaths, because I do not consider them bigotted papists; but bigotted papists, who subscribe fully to all the doctrines that I consider objectionable, and who consider the Pope as paramount to every other law, even to the apostolic ordinances, and to the gospel of Christ, I consider that those men would be weak enough to be influenced by the terrors that the Pope or their confessor would hold over them; and consider it a meritorious act to violate their allegiance, in order to promote, as far as they could, any object that would have for its tendency the abolition of heresy, and the re-establishment of popery again in this realm, as it was prior to the Reformation. Such is the opinion I entertained at the time I presented that petition, and such is the impression I have now on my mind. In making this statement I do not mean to give offence to any person's private opinion; but a bigotted papist, (which is the acceptation in which I take the word Roman Catholic,) I am perfectly persuaded must consider himself at liberty to lay aside the obligations of his oath, and to act in direct opposition to it.

You understand a bigotted papist and a Roman Catholic as synonymous terms?—So far as I have explained, and as the times generally go; but I consider there are some exceptions.

Are you acquainted with any persons in the rank of gentlemen in the Roman Catholic church?—Many of those with whom I have been, and am acquainted, would feel much offended if I did not give them that title.

Have you been in the habit of associating with persons whom you considered Roman Catholic gentlemen?—Yes.

Do you believe that those persons whom you considered as Roman Catholic gentlemen would all be wilful perjurers, so far as the oath of allegiance is concerned?—Many of them I believe would not, because I considered that the absurdities of their religion sat very easy on them; but those who yield implicit obedience to the doctrines of the Romish church, and are afraid of the censures that are held over them, I believe would.

You think that those whose religion sat easiest upon them would be the first men to keep their oath?—I consider that they would be the first men to keep the oath; in explanation, I mean such as are not bigotted. I consider that the feelings of honour of such men would induce them to keep the oath; but I consider a completely priest-ridden papist to be under the the influence of his priest, and that when he believes the doctrine that the priest can forgive his sins, he does not know how far he may go.

Do you consider the keeping an oath a matter of honour, or a matter of conscience?—It is a matter of conscience to a Protestant—to a man that believes there is no power on earth that can supersede the obligation of his oath; but it is a very different matter to a man who subscribes fully to the opinion, that there is a power on earth that can absolve him from his oath, and forgive him any crime that he may have been guilty of.

Do you conceive that all Roman Catholics, who hold the faith of the Roman Catholic church, so as to be sincerely in communion with the see of Rome, hold the doctrine which you have stated; that is, that the Pope may absolve them from their allegiance to their Sovereign?—I do believe that every person that holds with the doctrine promulgated or confirmed by the council of Trent, subscribing fully to Pope Pius the Fourth's creed, must have such an opinion.

Are you acquainted with the memorable declaration of the Gallican clergy in the days of Bossuet?—I have a general knowledge of it.

Are you aware that in that declaration the principle you have stated, as a principle necessarily held by all Roman Catholics, is distinctly rejected?—I am aware that the Gallican church has rejected that principle; but I am also aware that the example of the Gallican church has no weight in comparison with the state of belief in Ireland.

Do you think that Bossuet was a sincere member of the Roman Catholic church?—I must, before I go any further, draw a line; I consider that the Roman Catholic church of Ireland at the present day is very different from the church of France, generally taken.

The question put to you is, do you believe that Bossuet was a sincere Roman Catholic?—I am satisfied that he believed generally in the principles of the Roman Catholic church, but how far he went as to his private opinions I do not know; I suppose he did not go as far as Bellarmine.

Did he not expressly oppose and refute Bellarmine?—I know that they were opposed, but what weight has that? it is only an individual opinion.

Are you aware that the principles inculcated in that declaration were strictly taught in the Sorbonne?—Yes, I am aware that they were.

Was not Doctor Delahogue a doctor of the Sorbonne?—He was.

Do you believe that Doctor Delahogue, at Maynooth, whilst he was publicly teaching the principle of the Sorbonne, was privately undermining it?—I do not mean strictly to charge any person with such conduct, nor I believe can it be inferred from what I said before; though Doctor Delahogue came from the Sorbonne, he started upon new ground in Ireland; for in France they uniformly resisted the encroachments of the Pope, while he is considered God Almighty in Ireland, and the circumstances materially alter every case.

Do you mean to say that the Pope has been styled, "Our Lord God the Pope," by any writer in the Roman Catholic church?—Certainly.

Will you mention the name of any such writer?—I am sure I can produce the authority at my leisure.

[The witness was desired to do so.]

Are you acquainted with Doctor Murray?—I cannot say that I am acquainted with him; I know who he is.

You are acquainted with his character?—Certainly.

Was he not president at Maynooth while you were there?—He was, at the time I was there, for a period.

Do you know that Doctor Murray, and the other Roman Catholic prelates of Ireland, have in the course of the last year subscribed a declaration, in which the principle you are now imputing to all Roman Catholics is most expressly rejected and condemned?—I heard that they have; but I am also aware that they are too closely identified with the Jesuits in Ireland, and though I must allow every man credit for his motives, I am afraid that Doctor Murray, and the rest of the bishops who have subscribed that declaration, are too intimately connected with the Jesuits in Ireland not to go as far as those Jesuits have gone in former days; because, at the time I was at Maynooth, the head of the Clongowes establishment, Doctor Kenney was vice-president, and this induces me to think that there is a close connection between the Jesuits and the Roman Catholic clergy in Ireland.

Was Doctor Kenney vice-president at Maynooth?—He was at that time.

Was he living in the college?—He was acting officially as vice-president there; I was firmly persuaded, when I was there, that that was his office. I understood that he was the head of the Clongowes establishment at the time that he was vice-president at Maynooth.

Is the principle, that it is lawful to break the oaths of allegiance taken by Roman Catholics to the King, taught in any of the catechisms of the Roman Catholic church?—I do not recollect that it is.

Is not the contrary doctrine, that they are bound faithfully to observe their oath without any such qualification, taught?—I am aware that many of the printed documents are perhaps unexceptionable on this score, such as catechisms and matters of that nature, that are publicly avowed by the Roman Catholic church; they set forth those things there; but I am also persuaded that they do consider themselves bound and privileged to counteract that public profession by their private influence, and explain away the inconsistency of it to the people.

Appendix, N^o 40.

Examination of
Rev. T. W. Dixon.
25 October 1826.

Did you ever hear them do so?—At the time that I got a parish first, I was informed by one of my most respectable parishioners, in confidence, that the system of disaffection that prevailed was caused by the priest that preceded me; and by coupling those things together, I came to the conclusion that a man can privately counteract his public instructions.

Did any person, with yourself, ever endeavour to counteract his public instructions at Maynooth?—I know that the expressions of illiberality were very violent; but though I was not particularly appealed to upon such occasions, I made one of the party or aggregate number, walking along, who took a part in the conversations.

The question is, whether any clergyman of the Roman Catholic church at Maynooth, or any professor in that house, ever taught you that it was lawful for you to break the oath of allegiance which you took to the King?—Not officially.

Did he teach it to you in any way, whether officially or otherwise?—I do not know how to account for it, whether it came from them or not, but I certainly heard it and learned it there; not in class, I admit.

The question is, not what was taught in class, but whether such a principle as you have stated, that it is lawful to break the oath of allegiance to the King, was taught to you at any time?—Not by the professors.

By any clergyman of the house?—Not by any clergyman of the house, because there are no clergymen, except the students who are lately ordained, allowed to remain there, but the professors of the house; but as I remarked at an earlier stage of my examination, there are various ways whereby information may be communicated without being directly official.

You were a priest of the Roman Catholic church?—I was.

But you cannot state, although you were a priest of the Roman Catholic church, that you ever heard a dignitary of the Roman Catholic church, or a professor of the college in which you were educated, or any priest, inculcate the doctrine that it was lawful to break the oath of allegiance to the King?—I cannot; and it is now upon recollection that I consider the system was so extremely deep, because I had the impression upon my mind that I could not exactly trace it up to the dignitaries or the officials who were exactly communicating instruction to me, but I had that impression on my mind; I received it when myself and my companions were together; it was early instilled into our minds; and further, you must know that at Maynooth we are not altogether left to the instruction and guidance of the professors; they are not the only people we are subject to; there are some of the students, monitors, who particularly have it in charge to look after the younger students who are sent there, and who take care to give them very good doses of illiberality and hatred to Protestants before they advance much in the course of education. I am at a loss to account for the principle that strengthened with my strength, and grew with my years. I certainly thought, at the time I left Maynooth, that any means whereby I could weaken those heretics who had so unjustly possessed themselves of the church establishment of the country, and reduced to a degraded state that church, which I firmly believed to be the mother and mistress of all churches, and out of whose pale there was no salvation, were legitimate. I considered, if there were any possible means whereby I could effect this, it would be meritorious in the eyes of God; and with regard to the obligations of the oath of allegiance, I considered that the Pope's authority was sufficient, or that the authority of a general council, if conveyed to me, could set aside the obligation of an oath; and I considered that if the Pope conveyed to me, through any authority, an intimation that I might violate that oath, I could do it with impunity; and I do believe that the ignorant Roman Catholics of Ireland go further than that, and believe that, without any delegation, the priest has the power of absolving them from any oath.

Did any of the monitors ever teach you that it was lawful for you to break the oath you had taken of allegiance to His Majesty?—I cannot exactly come to any defined point; but I know that the impression was not confined to myself, but that when we congregated in the hours of recreation in the fields, I found this opinion to be very general; to be almost universal.

The doctrine that it is lawful to break the oath of allegiance taken to the King being distinctly rejected and condemned by Doctor Delahogue; being distinctly rejected and condemned by the Roman Catholic bishops, speaking in public in Ireland; being distinctly rejected and condemned in the oath of allegiance itself, and being palpably contrary to good morals, to common truth, and to common honesty, did it never occur to you, receiving that doctrine or that impression, to speak upon the subject to any Roman Catholic prelate, or to any Roman Catholic authority?—I was aware that those opinions were sanctioned by higher authority than any of those now alluded to; and according to the exercise of my reason, I thought that the example of the bishops, or the authority of an individual, was not to be put in competition with the authority of those councils that declared there was no faith to be kept with heretics; and I considered that as a paramount obligation, and of paramount authority.

Though you were a clergyman of the Roman Catholic church, you never asked any prelate of that church to reconcile to you the extraordinary difference between what you expressly swore, and what it appeared to you the church taught?—I was aware that I was obliged to believe the councils, which enjoined that there was no faith to be kept with heretics, as true and canonical councils, and then of course there is an end of the matter. I was obliged implicitly to submit to the decision of those councils, without having it in my power to withdraw my mind from that influence.

Is it taught at Maynooth that those councils inculcate the principle that faith is not to be kept with heretics, and that it is lawful to break oaths; or is it taught at Maynooth that those councils do no such thing, and that those who attempt to take such a view of them are utterly mistaken?—I considered that that was only a private exposé of what was of superior authority to the opinion of Doctor Delahogue, or even a declaration of the bench of Irish bishops.

Then so far as regards the principle taught at Maynooth, that principle is, that it is not lawful to break an oath, and that it is not lawful to break faith with heretics?—Officially it is so taught, but the reverse is taught, perhaps, in a more effectual way.

You say the reverse is taught, perhaps; do you mean to assert that it is taught?—I mean certainly to assert that I imbibed it there.

You mean to say that you imbibed a notion the very reverse of that which is found in the class-book?—Yes.

Then you set the class-book at nought?—I could account for it being set down in the class-book, in order to propitiate the public opinion, or to conciliate the good opinion of the Protestant Government under which we were deriving our support; and that it was very advisable and very political in Doctor Delahogue to strain every nerve to preserve, in the first instance, the respectability of the councils, and again to reconcile that with the allegiance and submission that was due to the Protestant Government under which we were deriving such support as we were.

Was it ever taught at Maynooth, that according to any council of the church, it was lawful to break faith with heretics?—We were taught that the council of Constance was a true and canonical council, I believe.

You were taught to believe that?—Yes.

Were you acquainted with the decrees of that council?—Yes.

Is it from the council of Constance you collected the notion that it was lawful to break the oath of allegiance that you took?—I know that the council of Constance confirmed the council of Basil, and I know that the council of Trent confirmed both.

The question put to you is, whether you understood that the council of Constance taught that it was lawful to break faith with heretics?—I know that it confirmed the decrees of the other council, and that there was such a connection and chain, that I considered the council of Trent to have certainly confirmed that doctrine; and coupling with it the treatment that John Huss received, and the practical illustration of it in the persecutions of the Romish church, I was firmly persuaded of it.

Were you a parish priest in the Roman Catholic church?—I was.

Were you the absolute priest of the parish?—The absolute priest of the parish.

You conformed before the Bishop of Killala?—I conformed not before the bishop, but I conformed before one of the clergy in his diocese; and then, after it had been notified to him, he took the ordinary steps to admit me to the discharge of the duties of a clergyman.

Did you make any profession of your faith upon the occasion of your conformity?—I read the canons, and subscribed to them, and I disavowed the supremacy of the Pope and those other matters that are objected to: I signed, in a word, the declarations required on the occasion.

Did you read them before you signed them?—I of course did.

Do you recollect the principles they expressed?—That I did not believe that the Pope had any authority in these realms; in a word, the oaths of abjuration and supremacy.

Did you subscribe a paper to this effect, “Whereas I, A. B. of the parish of C. in the diocese of D. have been from a child bred up, and till of late lived in the communion of the Roman church, by which means I long had an inveterate prejudice against the doctrine and worship of the Protestants, notwithstanding that I was grossly ignorant thereof, and in a great measure of the very common Christianity into which I was not suffered, nor had advantages freely to inquire, being kept from the reading of the holy scriptures at large, and used to the service of the church in an unknown tongue; and further possessed with many false and scandalous imputations of several doctrines as held by the Protestants, which I now understand they hold not, and of several practices of theirs, which I perceive they abhor; therefore being now by the grace of God, who hath pleased to open mine eyes, made sensible of the great danger I was in by reason of my ignorance, superstition, false worship, uncharitableness, enmity to the truth, and other evils abounding and cherished in me while in obedience to those false guides of Rome, I am come hither publicly to confess all this my guilt, and as I acknowledge and adore God’s infinite grace and goodness to me, in bringing me out of popish darkness and errors, and the very snares and depths of Satan, so I desire to take unto myself the shame of my own sloth, through which I was not so diligent to inform myself touching the truth as I might have been, and together of my evil and deceitful heart, by which I was unwilling a long time to be better instructed and reformed?”—I do not recollect that that identical form was administered to me—as well as I can recollect, it was merely the oath of abjuration and supremacy; I do not think that that formula now recited formed a part of the forms that were prescribed to me; I certainly disavowed what is contained in it in substance, but not that formula, as well as I can recollect.

Did you state in any way upon the occasion of your being admitted to be a member of the church of England, that you were not “suffered, nor had advantages freely to inquire, being kept from reading the holy scriptures?”—I do not think that was required at the time.

If it were required, would you have felt yourself at liberty to declare it?—Not as a priest; consider that their authorized versions, with the notes accompanying or appended to them,

Appendix, N^o 40.

Examination of
Rev. T. W. Dixon.
25 October 1826.

I was at liberty to read, but I considered that without the authority of the church being appended, I could not read the scriptures.

Do you mean that you would have considered yourself not at liberty to read the Latin vulgate?—The Latin vulgate is the authorized version that they recommend.

Would you consider yourself not at liberty to read that?—I would consider myself at liberty to read the Latin vulgate, but that is the translation, and it is from that translation that the Douay version has been made, but I consider the translation not to be a good one; so far from it, that it certainly endeavours to establish for them the points of difference between them and Protestants; and I am decidedly of opinion, that the Latin vulgate is not the Bible, because it is not correctly translated.

Do you happen to know the opinion of Grotius as to the vulgate, which you say is an incorrect translation?—I do not recollect his opinion.

Will you describe the nature of the discipline that was maintained over the students at the time that you lived at Maynooth?—For the first year the freshmen, as they were called, are not allowed to hold any intercourse with the senior students, except by express permission, and during that time they are subject to the control of the monitor.

Whom do you mean by the senior students?—Those who have been more than a year in the house: during the first year, the monitor is obliged to teach them that they must go to confession every week, and that they are not to speak in hours of silence, and that the infraction of the discipline of the house constitutes such a crime that it is necessary to go to confession to get absolution for it; for that year matters go on very well.

Did you observe whether they found it difficult to conform at first to those regulations about silence?—It is a difficult thing, but the idea of expulsion, and all its concomitant horrors, causes people to keep a vigilant eye over their actions.

Was it at all a subject of complaint among the students, that they were subjected to so strict a discipline in that respect?—Certainly, they disliked it very much, when they were not confined to the public halls. I have known several of them to think that it was very desirable that such a strict discipline should be observed during the course of study, but in addition to that, when they are in their rooms they must be silent, and at certain hours when they meet on the corridor, they are not allowed to speak to one another in passing, without being marked for it, and being brought up for examination and reprimanded.

What are those hours in which silence is enjoined in the corridor?—During what they call the retreat, at the commencement of the year, and at the close of it; they are obliged to devote I think a week to preparation for going to confession, and during that time they are not allowed to speak a word, or to hold any intercourse, and in the hours of study and class, they are not allowed to speak to one another.

Are they allowed to speak at night?—No; from the time that they are dismissed from the hall for the night, they are obliged to go to their rooms in perfect silence.

How many slept in a room when you knew the college?—Sometimes two, sometimes three, and in some instances four; but when they advance in their studies, the last two years, each has a room to himself.

Where two, three or four slept in a room, were they obliged to observe silence?—Strict silence, or else make it a matter of conscience to confess it to the priest.

What would be the consequence of confessing it to the priest?—That he would forgive the sin of it, and enjoin him not to do it again.

Would he forgive it upon any terms?—He would impose a penance.

What kind of penance?—A certain number of prayers, or something to that effect.

Did you ever know of any other penances than prayers being imposed upon confession, when you confessed?—I did not, except a number of prayers and fasting.

Were there any additional fasts prescribed in the shape of penance?—Yes, to fast or abstain from meat, or use but one meal in a day.

Was there any thing remarkable in the time at which these prayers were to be repeated, which were enjoined in the shape of penance?—Generally in the evening or morning, or in the play-hours.

Was there any thing particular in the feelings of the students, with respect to the government of the country, at the time that you resided at Maynooth?—I recollect that there was; the administration of the Duke of Richmond gave particular umbrage to the students at that time.

How did they know any thing about his administration?—It got into the house; the periodicals were prevented from coming in, but still we knew that the Duke of Richmond was very unfavourable to the Roman Catholic claims, and that he was a person who deserved our hatred.

What was the state of feeling in the mind of the students with respect to England and the connection of the British Islands with each other?—Certainly, that if the connection could be dissolved, it would be very desirable, to make Ireland independent.

Are the Commissioners to understand that that was considered to be possible or impossible? Possible, certainly.

Are you certain that that was ever the subject of a distinct conversation at which you were present?—Certainly, when we all went out to walk together, we have talked about that; and it was natural that such conversation should arise, in consequence of several of the students having been actually engaged in the late rebellion, and expelled from Maynooth in consequence of it, so that it was not a novel thing for feelings of this nature to exist, and to gain considerable strength among the students at Maynooth.

Do you mean that those persons who spoke to you in this manner had themselves been engaged in rebellion?—I do not mean that they really had; but I really at the time felt that it would be a noble cause to engage in rebellion, and to rid my country of the chains of a foreign government unjustly imposed.

Although you had taken the oath of allegiance?—Although I had taken the oath of allegiance; such was the impression on my mind, that it was my duty to break the yoke of England.

Was it contemplated that such a rebellion as you describe could by possibility be successful—was that question considered?—Certainly.

Did you ever hear any means discussed by which it could be carried into execution?—By well arranged simultaneous movements, and depriving the troops of their arms—that they could get possession immediately by such means as those.

Did it not occur to them to apprehend that the great power of England would afterwards necessarily recover the country through scenes of great carnage and desolation?—Yes; but it has been sometimes thought that there was a possibility that there could be some auxiliary force obtained that might have a depôt on the other side of the island, where the bays and the harbours are very fine, and that would enable them in the course of time to resist an invasion from England.

On the occasion of the discussions, such as you describe them, were not the two sides of the question maintained; were there not some who were for maintaining the connection?—I cannot say; there were very few among the students that used to take that side.

What part did you take in the discussions?—I certainly was very much disposed to be a hero at the time—my youthful feelings being very strong, I thought it was a praiseworthy thing to engage in such measures, from the impulse I had.

Did you carry that feeling with you during the whole time you were in the house?—During the whole time I was in the house, I did.

Did you ever consider what was to become of the Protestants during the unfortunate scenes that must necessarily ensue from any attempt to dissolve the connection?—Pike them.

Did you ever hear the expression used that you have mentioned?—Not strictly speaking the expression perhaps, but in effect, tantamount to it.

State what were the feelings towards the established church among the students?—That the members of it were heretics, cut off from the possibility of salvation in a future life, unless they repented and became reconciled to the church of Rome.

The question has a reference to the clergy rather than to the laity, to the constituted authorities of the church?—We had more animosity against the protestant clergy; the orangemen, and general run of protestant laymen, we certainly considered as people that fully deserved our animosity and hatred, but the persons in particular who had robbed us of our possessions, we considered ought to be more peculiarly the objects of our indignation.

What do you mean by robbing you of your possessions?—By possessing the church property, which devolved to them subsequently to the Reformation.

Did you ever hear the question discussed as to the right they have to the churches they now occupy?—Yes, that formed a part of our subject betimes. We thought that they were intruders, and had no right whatever, except by the strong arm of power; we did not consider that they had any spiritual character—that they were neither bishops nor priests; we considered them mere laymen; but that at the same time they were in the possession of our properties.

What do you mean by your properties?—The present church property of Ireland, we considered to be the property of the Roman Catholic church.

Did you ever discuss at all what was to become of that property, in the event of the separation you have spoken of?—Of course the church was to be reinstated in the possession of it.

How far did you imbibe all those notions, that you describe yourself as possessing, before you came into the college?—It is possible that I might have imbibed the general disposition to them before I came to the college; but when I came to the college, those arrangements used more fully to be canvassed among the students; and I learned more as to their right to the church possessions after I came there, and that the Protestants were heretics, and already condemned to eternal torments.

Did nobody ever suggest, upon the occasion of those discussions, that those notions were a little at variance with the oaths of allegiance, which all the persons present must have taken?—Possibly; but we thought that those oaths were required of us, in order to save appearances.

Was the dispensing power in the Pope ever discussed upon those occasions?—Certainly, it was fully established that the Pope could dispense with the obligations of the oath; nor were we ignorant that he had actually carried into effect that power, by absolving Queen Elizabeth's subjects in Ireland, and depriving Henry the Eighth of his crown.

At what time were those discussions in the habit of being carried on?—When we went out into the fields for recreation, we generally congregated together into groups, and discussed those matters.

Did none among you take the part of the Protestants, and of the established order of things, upon the occasion of any of those discussions?—Certainly not, except for argument sake.

Do you mean that not a single individual among you seriously took that side?—Certainly not.

Appendix, N° 40.

Examination of
Rev. T. W. Dixon.
25 October 1826.

Or denied the dispensing power?—The dispensing power we all firmly believed.

Although the professor taught the reverse?—Although the professor taught the reverse; because how could the Pope have attempted to have done it, if it was not a matter that was lawful?

Did the history that informed you that the Pope attempted to do it, not also inform you that the Roman Catholic clergy and laity resisted him?—We certainly knew that he was not restrained by the council of Trent.

The question is, whether, when the Pope deposed Queen Elizabeth, the Roman Catholic clergy and laity of England did not sign a declaration rejecting that deposition, and whether, in Callan's History of Irish Remonstrances, he does not give an account of the steps taken by the Roman Catholic clergy and gentry of Ireland to resist it?—We were not disposed to take that view.

Was the frequency of those discussions, and the character of them, known to your superiors?—I do not know.

Must they not necessarily have been known to them, if they had taken place as publicly, as frequently, and as undisguisedly as you state?—I should think so.

Did they not habitually take place in the presence of the monitors?—Yes.

Was it the duty of the monitors to interfere upon those occasions?—I do not know whether they considered it their duty.

Did they, in your hearing, ever interfere in such matters?—No.

Were the monitors in the habit of communicating to the professors what took place upon those occasions?—So I understood.

Did you infer that this discussion took place with the tacit approbation of the heads of the college?—I did not then come to that conclusion, but I do now.

Can you state the names of any of the professors to whom, of necessity, the existence of those discussions must have been known, or of any of the monitors to whom they must have been known?—The dean is the person who is in more immediate collision with the students.

Do you entertain any doubt whatever that the frequency of discussions of that character was known to the dean?—I think, if he chose to attend, he might have known of them.

Does not the dean go out walking with the young men?—He goes with them when they leave the precincts of the college.

Were not those discussions frequently held when you were without the precincts of the college?—The dean walks on one side, or at the head, or the rear of the party.

Could those discussions have taken place in the manner you describe, without their being known to the dean, who was present at the time?—I do not say he was present.

Was not he always present with the young men when they were walking?—When they were walking into the country; but I wish to be understood that these conversations generally took place within the precincts of the college, because they are obliged to walk two by two when they go out of the precincts.

Did you ever know them to take place when you were without the walls of the college?—The man that walked with me, and I, of course, conversed together; the circumstances did not admit of more than two conversing together at those times.

Are the Commissioners to understand that those discussions were between yourself and some other individual?—When walking out into the country, when circumstances did not admit of more than two holding conversation together; but I wish to be understood that those discussions more generally prevailed, when we were walking in groups within the precincts of the college.

At what period of the day?—After breakfast and dinner.

Were the students at that time under the observation or control of any individual, either the dean or the monitors?—Not at that time; they are not immediately under the control of any authority at those hours; but the monitors, being students, used to blend with us, and they could not but know that those discussions took place.

Did the monitors ever take part in such conversation?—I think I have seen them standing by, and sometimes taking a part; they might have considered themselves not bound to report on those circumstances.

Do the Commissioners understand you to go so far as to say, that the frequency of such discussions, and the promulgation of such opinions among the students, was tacitly connived at, if not countenanced by the superiors of the house?—I do not exactly go that length; I say that when, at a more advanced period of my life, I couple all these circumstances together, I may be induced to form that opinion in my own mind, though I should be sorry directly to charge them with such an infraction of duty; I do not mean to be understood as expressing more than my own private opinion, formed from the comparison of ideas, and pronouncing such judgment from my own private conviction.

This is an opinion which you have formed more strongly in latter years than at an earlier period?—Yes; I have, since I left the college, reflected on these matters.

Had you at any time reason to think that any of the professors of Maynooth entertained the opinions you have described, as being prevalent throughout the college, with respect to a separation from England, the destruction of the Protestant church, and the piking of the Protestant laity?—As I stated before, my intercourse with the professors was confined to our class hours.

The Commissioners infer from that, that you have no reason whatever to believe that any one of them did maintain such opinions?—I have no reason from actual knowledge; I merely repeat the subjects of conversation that generally prevailed among us, when we went out a walking; walking; but when I now consider those circumstances, and consider that those monitors reported to them a single whisper, as we stole silently along the corridor at night to our bedrooms, I come to the conclusion, that if they chose, they might have reported those other more serious matters; and now I think that if they gave directions to the monitors to keep a strict look out, and to inform them of any such topics of discourse, they must necessarily have known it.

You say that those conversations were necessarily known to the monitors?—They were necessarily known to the monitors.

Are the Commissioners to understand you to say, that the monitors were in the habit of communicating with the professors upon the transactions which took place during the private hours of recreation among the students?—Provided they had a reference to the regulations of the house.

Was there any regulation of the house whatever with regard to seditious or treasonable discourse?—I do not recollect that there was, or if there was, we never thought about it.

Was the circumstance never adverted to in discussion, that Maynooth was founded and maintained as the voluntary act of the Protestant government?—We admitted that; but we thought it was to keep the Roman Catholics quiet.

Did you associate very generally with the students at Maynooth, or had you any select friends?—I had no very select friends, and unless I had a particular engagement, I perhaps walked with the first I met, whose society I had no particular aversion to; but we generally had those discussions adjourned from time to time, and we went to renew them.

Can you mention any monitor who was ever present at any of those conversations?—I do not think it expedient to mention names.

Are any persons now in office in the college, who were monitors in your time?—I do not recollect any now in the college whom I was acquainted with as monitors.

Are there any persons who were monitors in your time, who are at present in the Roman Catholic church in Ireland?—I really think that I cannot say exactly; it is so long since, and here are so many of the same name, that I do not think I could exactly give such information as would be of any moment on the subject, as to particularizing individuals; I do not know that there is any person now in Maynooth, who filled the office of monitor at that time.

Can you state where any of the persons, who were monitors at the time you are speaking of, could now be found?—I certainly cannot; I have been for some years in England, and I am not locally acquainted with the situation of those people, and I could not exactly say where they may be found; since I returned to Ireland, I lived in a very retired manner.

From what class are the monitors taken?—The monitors have been some time in the house; more than one year; they are taken from different classes.

Are they taken from the Dunboyne class generally?—That was not in being in my time.

Are they permanent, or do they change frequently?—They are generally permanent; sometimes some of them used to consider it laborious and troublesome, and did not choose to be troubled with it; and besides, there is something disagreeable attached to it, and the idea of being a spy causes some of the students to dislike it.

Was Mr. Montague dean in your time?—He was bursar in my time.

Was Mr. Dowley a dean in your time?—No.

Was Dr. Mac Hale, the present Roman Catholic coadjutor bishop in the diocese of Killala, at the college in your time?—He was.

Was he a monitor?—I do not think he was; I am not quite sure.

Who appoints the monitors?—The dean.

How many are there of them at one time?—I do not know; I recollect that a Mr. Fitzpatrick and Mr. Kenny were deans, and there was a Mr. Kenney a vice-president.

Can you mention any persons who were in the college in your time, who could give the Commissioners any information with respect to the matters upon which you have been speaking?—Any body that chooses to give the information may; any body that lived there at the time.

Will you mention the names of any persons who were engaged in the conversations you have spoken of?—That would be a task that I am not prepared for; at this distance of time I am not prepared for particularizing individuals; I have had very little or no intercourse with those people since I left Maynooth; the greater portion of them I would not know if I met them in the streets.

Can you state to the Commissioners any individual, amongst the several with whom you were in the habit of entering into conversation, whom it would be right for the Commissioners to send to upon the subject?—No, I cannot state any person.

Can you mention to the Commissioners the names of any persons with whom you ever held those conversations, or who was present at them?—I really cannot now exactly recollect the particular individuals; it was such a general thing that I did not think it necessary to keep an exact register of the names of the people in my mind, but I merely mention the fact; the Commissioners can ascertain who were there at the time.

Are there any clergymen now in the Roman Catholic ministry, in the county of Mayo, who were at Maynooth at the time that you were there, and with whom you were in the habit of associating?—I was occasionally in the habit of associating with Dr. Mac Hale, and I was in the habit of associating with Mr. Hannan from that diocese.

Can you mention any others?—I think principally those two.

Do you recollect any other clergyman, now in any part of Ireland, with whom you were in the habit of associating?—I was in the habit of associating with a good many, but their names I cannot now exactly bring to my recollection.

Did you ever hear either of the gentlemen you have mentioned hold such language as you have spoken of?—I cannot exactly say that I have, but I know that they must have been by, and must have heard those discussions; it was a matter of public notoriety that those discussions used to take place amongst the students.

Can you mention any ten men that were in the college at the time you were, and in the same class with yourself, to whom reference could be made on the subject?—I do not know that it is expedient; and besides I do not recollect them.

You are not now desired to mention the names of any individuals who have talked with you upon the subject, but the names of gentlemen who were fellow students and class fellows with you at that time, without alluding to any opinions they may have entertained or expressed?—There was a Mr. Hurly a class-fellow of mine, and there was a Mr. Sheehan a class-fellow of mine, and a Mr. Macnamara a class-fellow of mine, and a Mr. O'Shee a class-fellow of mine, and several others whose names I cannot now call to mind.

Did not Mr. Hurly conform to the established church?—Yes, I recollect he did.

Did Mr. Sheehan?—No, none of the rest that I am aware of.

Where is Mr. Hurly now to be heard of?—I do not know where he is in particular.

Were those conversations so public and so notorious that they must necessarily have been known to the individuals you have mentioned?—I do not know as to that; I recollect those to have been class-fellows of mine, and they might have taken a part probably; indeed I think they must have taken a part in those conversations.

Were they so notorious that they must have been known to them?—I think every body who studied there must have known them.

Did you occupy a room by yourself, or were there others in the apartment?—At one time I occupied a room by myself; at other times there were other people living in the room.

Was it generally supposed at Maynooth that Mr. Kenney, whom you have mentioned as the vice-president, was a professed Jesuit?—Certainly we believed him to be a Jesuit, and that he was at the head of that establishment at Clongowes, which was then in active preparation.

Did he wear the Jesuits dress at that time?—No.

In point of fact, did the Jesuit order exist at that time?—We called him a Jesuit.

At the period to which you refer, had the Jesuit order been restored by a bull of the late Pope?—The late Pope, I believe, restored the Jesuits after his return from captivity; I am not confident about dates, but this I am persuaded of, that we called him a Jesuit.

Did you like him the better or the worse for being a Jesuit?—We thought a Jesuit was a very fine thing; a most holy character; and we considered him a very talented, clever man, and had much respect for him as such.

May not the Jesuits have had a physical existence at a time when they had not a papal recognition?—Certainly.

Are the Jesuits generally approved of by the Roman Catholic bishops?—In Ireland they seem to be.

In England are they?—I do not know much about the feelings of the English popish bishops.

From what circumstance do you judge of their being favourites with the Roman Catholic clergy in Ireland?—The circumstance of Mr. Kenney's being vice-president of Maynooth is a proof of it.

Is not the commentary on the scriptures that is selected for the college, Menochius, the production of one of the society?—It is; and one of the premiums that were given to me was the work of a Jesuit.

What was it?—It was the work of a Spaniard, Rodriguez, on Christian Perfection, so that I know that they are held in very great respect and veneration at Maynooth.

How many curacies in the established church have you held since you conformed to it?—I never had a regular one but one; that was the curacy of Balliskerry, in the diocese of Killala.

Who appointed you to that?—Archdeacon Verschoyle.

How came you to give it up?—My life had been so often attempted in that parish that I was obliged to give it up.

Was that the only consideration that induced you to give up that curacy?—Certainly.

Where were you employed afterwards?—I went then to London.

Through whose patronage or acquaintance did you obtain the employment of which you have spoken of there?—The Bishop of London became acquainted with me in the course of time, and he approved of my conduct and character; I brought a very high character, or satisfactory testimonials with me from Ireland.

From whom?—From the Bishop of Killala; he thought that I could obtain a foreign mission at the time, and being so persecuted, I thought if I could obtain a foreign mission, it would be most to my interest; and I went to London with that view, and after remaining there for some time I returned again to Ireland.

How came you to give up your curacy in London?—It was not a regular one; it was only given to me for a time; the rector made other arrangements, and I withdrew.

What is the nearest town to your residence at Belmullet?—Belmullet is now a post town; it is a small post town.

Are

873

Are there no gentry resident at Belmullet?—There is only the commanding officer of the water guard.
 —What is the nearest town to you in the vicinity of which there are any resident gentry?
 —Crossmalina.
 Do you know the Protestant clergyman of Crossmalina?—I do.
 Who is the Protestant clergyman at Crossmalina?—The Rev. Edwin Stock.
 Who is the Protestant curate?—The Rev. Andrew Jackson.
 Do you know Mr. Annesley Knox, who lives near Crossmalina?—I do.
 Do you know Mr. Knox of Castlereagh, who lives near Crossmalina?—I do.

Appendix, N° 41.

The Reverend Thomas William Dixon, sworn, and Examined.
 Thursday, November 23, 1826.

WHEN you were last before the Commissioners you stated that you were priest of the parish of Kilmore Erris?—That was the second parish I had; I had first the parish of Dunfeeny given to me, in the diocese of Killala.

To which parish were you first appointed?—To the parish of Dunfeeny.

Have the goodness to state what appointment you received?—The Roman Catholic bishop of the diocese of Killala gave me that parish exclusively to myself; the issues and profits of the parish to be mine, and also the whole control of it, subject to the bishop, as every other parish priest.

What was the date of that appointment?—I should think it was some time in August 1816.

How long did you hold it?—I held it until the April or May ensuing.

Were you the parish priest?—I was exclusively.

Was there any instrument signed by the bishop collating you to that parish?—No, there was not; he sent me there, and in process of time I suppose I should have signed an instrument if I chose to remain in that parish; but when I had spent nearly a year there, I thought it was advisable to go to another parish, where he wished to superannuate an old clergyman that had the parish, with an understanding that I should have it on his death, if I survived him.

Were you so appointed to the first parish as that the bishop could not have removed you from it at his will and pleasure?—He could, because I had no collation of the parish; but I understood that at any time that I chose to pay the regular fees for taking out the collation, I might have it, and I was to consider myself to all intents and purposes the parish priest of the parish.

Had you any curate or coadjutor to assist you in Dunfeeny?—No, I was equal to the duties myself.

Is your evidence positive and express, that you performed all the duties of a parish priest in Dunfeeny from August 1816 to May 1817?—Decidedly; to either April or May 1817.

Can you state what your annual emoluments were in that parish?—The annual emoluments in Dunfeeny at that time were considerably beyond 200*l.* a year.

Did you retain any connection with Dunfeeny when you were performing the duties in Kilmore Erris?—No, I did not.

You held the parish of Dunfeeny for nearly a year?—I had all the emoluments of a year.

But you performed the duties only for ten months?—No more; the emolumentary duties of the church of Rome occur twice a year principally.

The Commissioners understand you to say that during the ten months you held that parish, you actually received full 200*l.*—Beyond 200*l.* considerably.

What is the size of the parish?—I cannot exactly describe the extent of it; it is very thickly inhabited in one end, and it is extremely extensive.

Is there any large town in it?—No, there are a number of villages.

Can you tell the number of Roman Catholic families in the parish?—I do not exactly know, but I could go very close to the number in my second parish.

What was the number of families in Kilmore Erris?—Something beyond eight hundred.

When you were last before the Commissioners you were asked this question, "Were you a parish priest in the Roman Catholic church?" to which you answered, "I was;" you were then asked, "Were you absolute priest of the parish?" to which you answered, "I was;" to what parish did you then allude?—I alluded to Dunfeeny.

Did you remove direct from Dunfeeny to Kilmore Erris?—I did.

What were the particular circumstances that led to your removal?—I expressed a wish to get Kilmore Erris, having understood that it was intended by the bishop to superannuate the clergyman to whom the parish belonged, and thinking that more advantages were likely to accrue to me from that parish than from the other, I believe I asked to be placed in that situation.

Who was the priest of the parish of Kilmore Erris at that time?—He was a Mr. Everard.

What situation did you hold in that parish?—I discharged all the duties of the parish. I was obliged to give him a certain sum, he taking no share in the duties.

Have the goodness to specify what that sum was?—I really forget whether it was 25*l.* or 30*l.*

23 Nov. 1826.

Was it a written agreement, or only a verbal instruction on his part?—It was a verbal instruction.

Was there any difficulty or misunderstanding as to the nature of that agreement?—Certainly not, that I recollect.

Never at any time?—The only misunderstanding was that the old priest undertook to do some of the duties, celebrated some marriages, and retained some money, which he had no right to withhold from me, and I charged him in my account with it accordingly.

Were you to pay the old parish priest a certain sum, or were you to pay him a certain proportion of the income of the parish?—A certain sum out of the income of the parish, not a proportion, but a certain sum.

Was that sum fixed by the bishop?—It was not; we talked over the matter in the presence of the bishop, and it was agreed, in his presence, that he should get that sum; I cannot exactly charge my mind now whether that sum was 25*l.* or 30*l.*

At the time it was agreed that you should pay him that sum, was there any reference made in conversation or otherwise to the general annual income of the parish priest?—I do not recollect that there was.

Was it at that time considered that the income of the parish priest exceeded 100*l.* a year?—The parish priest was a very irregular man, and I do not know that he could exactly account for what the exact value of the parish was.

Was it at the time understood that the parish was worth more than 100*l.* a year?—I certainly considered it much better than the parish I had before, which was worth more than 200*l.* to me.

The question is, what was the understanding between you and the priest, who was going to give up to you the profits of the parish?—That I should undertake to do all the duties, paying him that sum.

What did he mention the parish as being then worth?—I do not recollect that he mentioned its value.

What do you believe it to have been considered by him, or by the bishop, that the parish was worth?—I cannot state, but I know what it was worth to me, and that I can very clearly show.

Have you any mode by which you could show what the parish was worth to you at the time that you held it?—I have no document upon the subject, but I dare say the general impression of the country is, that it is worth more than that to the gentleman that holds it now.

What parish are you speaking of?—Kilmore Erris.

Is the whole of the parish of Kilmore Erris now held by one person?—It is.

Who is that person?—A Mr. Lyons, I believe.

When you were the assistant of the old parish priest, to whom you have referred, had that parish priest the whole district of the parish which is now held by Mr. Lyons?—No, he had not.

Had he more than one half of it?—I think he had about two-thirds.

Do you mean to say that two-thirds, or whatever proportion of it he had, was worth 300*l.* a year?—Yes, I do mean to state that.

Who was the parish priest that had the remaining part of the parish?—A Mr. Jordan.

Who succeeded you in the management of the parish?—I do not exactly recollect.

Are you quite sure that the portion of the parish, that was under the charge of Mr. Everard, was larger than that which was under the charge of Mr. Jordan?—I was always of that opinion.

Which is the more populous part?—That was more extensive, and also more populous.

Can you describe what may be the outlines or boundaries of that division of the parish that was under the charge of Mr. Everard and yourself?—The parish of Kilmore Erris is a peninsula, and the lower part of the peninsula near Broadhaven, which is considerably wider, was the part under my charge, extending beyond a small village called Bingham's Town, and that was the division of the parish that I had.

Was not the portion of the parish that was under the charge of Mr. Everard the northern portion?—Yes.

Which was the most populous part of the parish, that which you had or the other part?—I thought that the part that I had was the most populous.

What do you consider to be the whole length of the parish from north to south?—I should suppose about twelve Irish miles.

Do you mean that twelve miles is the length of that peninsula?—Yes.

What do you believe to be the breadth of it?—It varies; in some parts it is about two miles, and in other parts considerably more than four.

Do you happen to know whether the division of the parish under the Protestant church is the same as that you were priest of?—No; the division under the Protestant church, called the parish of Kilmore, separated from Kilcommon, comprises both those parishes.

Does it comprise any portion of the land that is not within the peninsula?—I believe it comprises about three acres of the isthmus.

In the Protestant division, does the parish of Kilmore Erris come to the eastward of the isthmus, upon what may be called the terra firma of Ireland?—The Protestant union is Kilmore and Kilcommon, and they belong to one clergyman. Kilcommon joins the parish of Dunfeeny, which I once held.

What is the nearest post town to Dunfeeny parish?—Killala, I should think.

Who

Who is the principal proprietor in the parish of Dunfeeny?—Mr. Knox of Castlereagh, I think, is the principal proprietor.

Does Dunfeeny lie westward of Killala?—It does.

At what distance is it from Killala?—I think it is generally termed six or eight miles.

Does the parish of Dunfeeny principally consist of bog or tillage land?—It has both; there is a great part of it bog, but there is a considerable part of it tillage land.

Will you describe the general state, with respect to cultivation, of the parish of Kilmore Erris—what is its principal produce?—Potatoes and corn.

What species of corn?—Mostly barley.

The barley is used generally for distillation, is it not?—It is.

Have you any means of knowing the usual acreable rent in the parish of Kilmore Erris?—I should think the average of it is about 30 s. an acre; from 1 l. 5 s. to 30 s. an Irish acre; I have paid myself 30 s. an acre.

Major Bingham is the principal proprietor, is he not?—Mr. Carter has the larger estate, but the estate was originally Bingham and Carter.

With regard to the value of the parish or district to which you were assistant, are we to understand that you became the assistant of the then parish priest, upon the understanding that you were to receive the whole emoluments of the parish, paying to him 25 l. or 30 l. a year out of them?—I understood, myself exclusively, so far as the privileges and authority of the parish went, to be the principal priest; that I was to receive no instruction from any person but from the bishop immediately; that the old priest had nothing to do with the administration of the duties of the parish, but that I was to give him this sum for his maintenance, and that he was not to interfere with me; and when he did interfere with me, and took some of the emoluments of the parish, then I made a complaint, and charged that as a set-off against him in his account.

Was there any understanding that he should perform any duties in the parish?—None, but that he should have permission to say mass privately, but not to interfere with me in the public duties of the parish.

Were you called curate, or coadjutor, or priest?—I was always called the priest of the parish, because in fact the other gentleman had no right to interfere with any of the duties, unless I thought proper to permit him.

Did the priest you are speaking of resign his parish to the bishop?—I do not know, but he submitted to this arrangement.

Could the bishop take from him his right, as parish priest, without his assent, or without a canonical cause?—I rather think what that bishop did—ab actu et posse valet constitutio, is an old maxim; he did deprive a parish priest of his parish, to which he had been collated, and in the discharge of the duties of which he had been for some time engaged, in order to give it to another, and a long and troublesome tissue of differences arose between them in consequence of it.

Are we to understand that you undertook the duties of that parish in consequence of the parish priest not being able, through ill health, or age, to perform them?—I think he was not equal to the duties of the parish, and the bishop told me that that man was not equal to the duties of the parish, and that on my giving him a certain stipulated sum, such as had been agreed upon, I should have the full jurisdiction and emoluments of the parish, and that in the event of my surviving him, I should then be put into the full possession of it, according to the technical mode of proceeding.

Has not the priest of a parish, supposing him to be prevented by age or infirmity from performing the duties of his parish himself, a right to appoint a curate?—I do not know; it is probable that that may be the mode in some places, but it is not the mode pursued amongst those I knew; the bishop invariably interferes; and I know in the case I have before alluded to, the bishop suspended the priest for alleged disobedience, because he would not resign his parish to him when he demanded it; he wished to give that parish to Dr. Mac Hale, who is now the assistant bishop in that diocese.

Did you understand that the old priest (Mr. Everard) consented to the arrangement that was made?—Certainly.

Is it not customary for a portion of the income of the priest to be appropriated to the support of the bishop?—Yes, a part of the fees on marriages, and some other monies.

Was that contribution regularly made by you during the time you were coadjutor priest of Kilmore Erris?—I did settle my account with the bishop when we met, but a short time had elapsed, immediately before my conforming to the established church, during which we did not meet, and the man that undertook the duties of the parish after me received the monies that were due to me, so that I never closed my account; the parish owed me a good deal of money at the time I became a Protestant clergyman.

What portion of the income was it your duty, according to the custom of the church, to contribute to the bishop?—I think it was two guineas as parish priest, as well as I recollect, and I recollect there was something to be allowed for a sack of oats for the feeding of the bishop's horse; there was also for the visitation dinner a contribution of a guinea or something to that effect; and for every marriage there was half a guinea, and according to the degrees of consanguinity or affinity that it was necessary should be dispensed with, there was always a settled sum which the bishop himself charged.

Do you mean that half a guinea was contributed to the bishop for each marriage?—Yes.

What might be the amount of the marriage fee?—Under some circumstances, a guinea; under others, a guinea and a half; sometimes a guinea and a crown.

Appendix, N^o 41.

Examination of
Rev. T. W. Dixon.
23 Nov. 1826.

What might be the lowest marriage fee that was taken?—A guinea.

What was the highest sum you ever received upon the occasion of a marriage?—A guinea and a crown, I think, but I have known others to charge a guinea and a half.

What length of time were you at Kilmore Erris?—A year; it might be a few days more or less.

Have the goodness to state, as accurately as you can, what was the sum total paid by you to the bishop during the year you were there?—I could not state that exactly now.

Have the goodness to state it as nearly as you can?—I think I might have paid him about 16*l.* as well as I can recollect.

Is it likely to be more or less, if there is error on either side?—I think there is very little error on either side.

Do you feel pretty confident that it was about 16*l.*?—I think it was about that sum; and besides, I think I paid something more than 8*l.* for an entertainment that was given.

In what way does that connect itself with the sum of money that was due as a matter of custom for the fees of the parish?—It does not connect itself with that, but as parish priest, and as receiving the emoluments of the parish, it was my duty when he came into the parish to entertain him; he did not come to my house, but he stopped at a public house on the isthmus, and the expenses, I think, were about 8*l.*

Is it customary for the priest of the parish to entertain the bishop when he comes into the parish?—It is.

You did not bring forward that 8*l.* as a matter of account with him, to quit yourself of a portion of the money due on account of the fees you received?—Certainly not.

Did the bishop make any claim upon you for any further sum of money than that which you paid him?—I do not recollect that he did.

Was it ever suggested to you, on the part of the bishop, that there might still be money due to him over and above that sum?—Certainly it was not.

Do you yourself believe that if the portion which the bishop was by custom entitled to had fully been rendered, it would have come to a larger sum than 16*l.*?—I do believe that the portion that was due from me, he received from me; but I before stated that the other priest was in the habit of picking up all the marriages he could get, and there was something due to the bishop from that priest, in consequence of his interfering with me; I complained of his conduct on several occasions, and I got no redress; but I dare say there was due from the parish to the bishop some few guineas more than I paid him, but not from me. I believe that I paid him all that was due from myself, but with respect to those other marriages, that the other priest had performed, I do not know whether the bishop was paid for them.

You say that you paid the bishop when you happened to meet him; is it usual for the bishop to receive his money in that way?—When we were in the habit of going to his house, we then arranged our accounts with him. I think it was in his house that I paid the last sum that I paid him.

Are you positive that the arrangement between you and the bishop and the priest was not that the priest should have a third part of the income of the parish?—As well as I can recollect, it was as I have stated.

Are you positive as to that fact?—I think I am positive on the fact.

That there was no understanding that the priest was to receive any particular portion of the profits of the parish?—Only that stated sum.

And that stated sum was from 25*l.* to 30*l.*?—I think it was; I am not sure.

Was it, or was it not, understood that that was a third part of the income of the parish?—Certainly not; he might have so represented it to the bishop on former occasions, because I understood that he was a bad manager, and was always in debt to the bishop; but I knew the parish, and I knew that it was more valuable than that, and that was the consideration that induced me to leave my former parish, and come to it.

Do you believe, that if the priest thought that the parish was worth 300*l.* a year, or if the bishop thought that the parish was worth 300*l.* a year, that the whole income of the parish should have been given up to you, reserving to the original priest of the parish only 25*l.* or 30*l.* a year?—I do not know how the bishop should act under those circumstances.

The question is as to your belief upon the subject?—The duty of the parish was very severe, and I managed it with advantage to myself; I do not know what it was worth to another; I can state what it was worth to myself; I had no expensive habits.

The question is, not what your habits were; but the question is, whether you believe that if your predecessor understood, and the bishop understood, that the parish was worth 300*l.* a year, the bishop and he would have made an arrangement with you by which you were to receive the whole emoluments of the parish, the actual priest of the parish receiving only 25*l.* or 30*l.* a year?—It is very likely that it was not worth so much to him, and it is very likely he did not conceive it was worth so much. I am firmly of opinion that it never was worth to him near so large a sum, because he was a very extravagant and irregular man in his mode of proceeding; and he generally had the emoluments of the parish collected in such a slovenly way that the expenditure sometimes outstripped the income; but I was more regular in my mode of proceeding, and I made the parish more valuable to me than my predecessor did.

What were your receipts during the year that you were in Kilmore Erris?—They were in or about 300*l.*

Are

Are the Commissioners to understand that the whole of your receipts were about 300*l*.? —Yes.

Out of that 300*l*. were you to pay to the priest whatever he was to receive, and also to account to the bishop for what he was entitled to in respect of marriages?—I took no account of the bishop's charge. I consider that an extra thing. I set down in the account the bishop's charge as it came in, charging myself with it. I considered 300*l*. a year as the clear amount.

Do you mean to say that you had 300*l*. a year over and above what you had to pay to the bishop, and over and above what you had to pay to the priest?—No; I include what I had to pay to the priest in the value of the parish; but I do not include what the bishop had to get.

Is there any register of marriages kept in the parish?—No.

What were the general heads of emolument that you had in the parish?—I got at Christmas 1*s*. 3*d*. I think, and at Easter 1*s*. 3*d*. from each head of a family; I got from the young people for their confessions on those occasions, more or less; from the females I got a hank of yarn, and from the young men five pence, I think.

What was the value of the hank of yarn?—I suppose, about four pence.

How many confessions do you suppose you heard in the year?—I contrived to hear the confessions of the whole parish, with some trifling exceptions.

What was the amount of the population of the parish that attended confession?—Perhaps seven hundred and fifty in the course of the year.

Did that number of seven hundred and fifty come to you twice, or only once in a year?—Twice.

Do you mean that seven hundred and fifty individuals, or that seven hundred and fifty families came to confession?—Seven hundred and fifty families.

How many young people do you suppose there might be in each of those families?—That is a matter that varies; sometimes there were three or four.

Can you mention any other heads of emolument that you had?—A guinea or 1*l*. 5*s*. for marriages.

How many marriages do you think you had within that year?—I think I had about thirty-three.

What did you get for each baptism?—3*s*. 4*d*.

Did any portion of that go to the bishop?—None.

How many baptisms had you in that year?—I cannot exactly ascertain that, for I had no register; but I think it may be readily calculated in the parish.

How many should you suppose there were?—I should suppose that I had at least more than one third of the numerical ratio of families; that out of the eight hundred families, perhaps every third house furnished a baptism.

Do you mean that you had in the year upwards of two hundred baptisms?—I am sure I had about two hundred and fifty.

How much did you receive for each marriage?—£.1 5*s*.

Was that your own portion of the fee?—There was half a guinea deducted for the bishop.

Had you any other sources of income than those you have enumerated?—Yes, for anointing the people there is a charge of a shilling; it was thirteen pence then.

How many cases of extreme unction may you have had in the year?—They are very frequent, because on any sickness occurring, the priest is called. I dare say I have been called five hundred times to discharge that duty within the year.

That is nearly once to every family in the parish? Sometimes five times to a family; they are subject to fever along that coast; the fever raged tremendously that year in that parish, and I have been frequently in the habit of attending and anointing five people in the same family.

Is it the habit of the Roman Catholic clergy in general to take a fee for anointing from poor people?—Invariably in that part of the country.

Did all the persons whom you attended to anoint pay you 1*s*. 1*d*.?—If they were not wretchedly poor.

Are there any of those seven hundred and fifty families you have spoken of that you would consider as wretchedly poor?—Not of the seven hundred and fifty, but of the eight hundred I consider there are.

Is there any other head of emolument?—Funerals; masses for the dead.

Do you mean to say that the Roman Catholic clergyman is paid for attending a funeral?—He is paid for saying mass; he is paid for every person who dies a legacy of half a guinea, in order to pray him out of purgatory; he charges half a guinea for every person that dies, the surviving relations of whom must pay it.

Are the Commissioners to understand that for every Roman Catholic who dies in the parish, whether he is young or old, the priest receives half a guinea?—With the exception of infants; for all those who attain those years when actual sin may be imputed to them, the priest charges the surviving relatives half a guinea.

Whether they make any call upon him to say mass or not?—Certainly.

From both rich and poor?—The charge is equal; but sometimes the poor cannot pay, and in that case the priest gets as much as he can.

Have you ever received more than half a guinea for saying mass?—I often received a guinea; the charge of half a guinea is not for saying mass, but it is a legacy chargeable upon upon the surviving relatives, in order that the priest might use his private influence to have the soul of the dead person taken out of purgatory.

Are we to understand that it is a practice, and an established principle in the diocese of Killala, that the surviving relatives of a deceased person must pay the priest half a guinea for using his private influence to get the soul of the deceased out of purgatory?—Yes.

Will you define what you mean by private influence?—When he is saying masses, that he would give the intention of his mass to be applied to that purpose, as works of supererogation are supposed to be applied in the Romish church.

What do you mean by the intention of his mass?—The priest offers up his mass with a particular intention, and in those cases the priest may say mass for the benefit of the soul of this person who it is supposed is detained in purgatory; and such is the merit of the mass, that it would have the effect of releasing the soul of that person from purgatory, as priests teach.

Is he always supposed to have that intention?—It is supposed that the priest always applies the mass to some particular intention, when he does not do it for a public intention, or when he is not particularly engaged to say mass.

Will you describe what you mean by public intention and private intention?—The priest says mass on Sunday publicly for the benefit of the people assembled; he offers up that propitiatory sacrifice, as it is called, for the purpose of releasing the souls of those persons from the bondage of sin; and on ordinary days, on week days, he says mass privately, when he has not this public obligation, and then he applies the merits of the mass on those days to this particular or individual obligation.

Is the mass considered effectual, if the intention of the priest does not accompany the act?—No.

If the priest should go through the ceremony of the mass without having any intention, private or public, what is the consequence?—The consequence is, that the people have been committing idolatry, and adoring a bit of bread, instead of Almighty God.

Do you mean that it is the doctrine of the Catholic church, that if the priest goes through the ceremony of the mass without having any intention, it is no mass?—If he goes through it without having the intention of consecrating the wafer, it is no mass.

How many of those masses, for which you were entitled to charge half a guinea, did you say in that year?—They are not masses; but on every death, the surviving relatives of the deceased person are obliged to pay for that person half a guinea.

How many persons died within the year, in consequence of whose death you received that half guinea?—I cannot exactly say; there were some died that I never was paid for.

How many half guineas do you suppose you received within the year on that account?—I dare say I received fifty.

Is that the most probable number you can mention?—I should think so; because several died that I never got any thing from; some strangers, and the relatives of others so wretchedly poor that they could not pay any thing.

Was not the year 1817 a year of fever?—It was a year of fever.

Were there any contributions of corn or of other valuable matters in kind made to you?—Yes; I got from some, ten sheaves, from others, twenty sheaves of barley.

Was that in lieu of pecuniary contribution, or in addition to it?—In addition.

Was there any particular name by which those contributions were known?—Nothing but collection; it is a usual thing; every priest gets it.

On what occasion are those offerings of corn given?—In the harvest; before the harvest is taken in, or about that time, the priest generally gets twenty sheaves from every family; sometimes they take ten and sometimes twenty.

Is there any name by which that contribution is known?—It is called the collection of corn.

What might be the value of the corn you received in the year in which you were at Kilmore Erris?—I am sure I had that year 50*l.* worth; when I say 50*l.* worth, I am sure that is under it.

The Commissioners understand you to say, that there was some disagreement between Mr. Everard and yourself as to the money payments that passed between you?—Yes.

And that that objection arose on your part from the circumstance of his having taken marriage fees to which he was not entitled?—Marriage and baptismal fees; in short, all the money he could get, he took possession of, and would not account to me for it.

You do not therefore include that in the 300*l.*?—No; but then I charged him with this set off against his demand for his salary, and so far I included it in the 300*l.*

How did you ascertain what fees he had received?—By my activity; I made inquiry, and discovered it.

What deduction did you make from the salary you were to pay to him on that account?—I deducted from him the full amount of the sums he had received; 3*s.* 4*d.* for baptisms, and the remaining sum after the bishop's half guinea of the marriage money.

State, as nearly as you can, what you think the amount of the deductions you made in your payment to him might have been?—I am sure he had received, in this kind of way, very nearly 15*l.*

Was that chiefly for baptismal fees?—Both baptismal and matrimonial.

Can you tell how many marriages he had received for? I cannot exactly tell; but I dare say he had received for about ten marriages.

In

In addition to those which you received?—In addition to those which I had; there happened to be a good many marriages in that year.

You stated that you received during that year for about thirty marriages?—About thirty or thirty-three.

Do you recollect whether there was any memorandum in writing, or any statement in writing, of the terms upon which you were to be admitted to the receipt of the income of that parish?—I do not recollect that there was any; and I do not think there was any memorandum of that nature.

Was there any paper in writing given by Dr. Waldron, setting forth what the conditions were upon which you were to be admitted to receive the emoluments of the parish?—I cannot recollect any.

Can you take upon yourself to say that there was not any?—Such is the impression upon my mind at present, that I would.

Will you take upon yourself distinctly to state, that the conditions which Dr. Waldron gave to you in writing, upon his authorizing you to undertake the duties of this parish, were not, that you should have one third of the emoluments for your own use?—Decidedly not; I can take upon myself to say that such an arrangement as that never passed.

And that Mr. Everard should have one third for his use, and that one third should be placed at the disposal of the bishop, to be applied by him as he thought proper?—I do not recollect that.

Will you take upon yourself to say that there was no such paper?—As well as I can charge my memory, I believe there was no such paper; but now I recollect that in the original talking about the arrangement of this parish, there was something said about that to which I would not agree.

Was that before or after you came to the parish?—Before I came to the parish.

Was it distinctly agreed between yourself, Dr. Waldron, and the priest, that you should pay a fixed sum of 25*l.* or 30*l.* a year to the priest, before you got the power of the parish?—I was sent in by the bishop in the first instance, and he asked me if I would consent to pay a sum to that amount, and I consented to it; and when I arranged the matter with the priest in the country, he said that of course he should do whatever the bishop required, though I believe that it was partly against the will of the priest that there was any person sent into the parish.

Did you pay Dr. Waldron the fees he was entitled to receive from you?—Those he was entitled to receive from me I certainly think I did.

Do you think it possible that you could forget the circumstance, supposing you did not pay them?—Perhaps there might be 1*l.* or something of that sort, on the balancing of an account between us.

Did you pay him any fees?—I did.

What is the usual time of the year for paying the fees to the bishop?—At Easter principally; but at other periods, when a priest has any business which leads him to the neighbourhood of the bishop's house, or to see the bishop; if he owes him any thing, he then pays him; I saw him some time before I left the communion of the church of Rome, and I paid him some money that I owed him.

Were any complaints made of you to the Roman Catholic bishop of the diocese while you were a clergymen in the church of Rome?—I am sure I do not know; lately there might have been perhaps.

Did he ever communicate to you that any complaint had been made to him respecting you?—Yes, he communicated to me that a Roman Catholic gentleman, who dined at my table on a fast-day, mentioned to him that I ate meat on a fast-day.

Did he communicate to you any other complaint?—Nothing, except about eating meat on a fast-day.

Was any complaint made by the priest of the parish against you for not having paid him any thing that he was entitled to?—None, that I am aware of; but it is likely that he might have complained, because there was a difference of opinion between us about the payment of the money.

Did you ever ask Dr. Waldron, the Roman Catholic bishop, to fix a day when any charges that had been preferred against you might be investigated?—I do not recollect that I did; but I desired him to fix a day when I could bring my account before him. I recollect that the old gentleman was more in my debt than I was in his.

Were there any complaints made to the bishop against you, which were communicated to you by the bishop, in consequence of which you desired that a day might be fixed for having them investigated?—I recollect that he told me that this gentleman was much scandalised at my eating meat at my own table on a fast-day; I said I certainly did eat meat, that I could get nothing else; besides, I was rather in a delicate state of health at the time, after recovering from a severe fever; but that I was aware of the correctness and propriety of my life and habits; and I was sure that any charge that could be made against me I should be able to refute.

Did he communicate to you any other complaint that had been made against you?—Certainly, not any thing, except eating meat on fast-days.

Did any inquiry take place?—No; I acknowledged the circumstance to him in his own house.

Then you never requested him to appoint a day for having an inquiry into your conduct?—Except upon that occasion; I was rather warm, and I said that I was conscious of having supported a very high character, and if he thought eating meat was a very great crime,

Appendix, N^o 41.

Examination of crime, I acknowledged that I had been guilty of it; but I was sure that he could hear nothing else to my disadvantage, either as to my moral character, or as to my general deportment as a gentleman and a clergyman.

Were there any suits or proceedings instituted against you of any kind while you were a Roman Catholic clergyman, or since that time?—Certainly not; I have had civil suits for the recovery of debt, and matters of that nature, but no other suit.

How long before you actually conformed, did you mention your intention of conforming, either to the Bishop of Killala, or to Archdeacon Verschoyle?—I had not seen Archdeacon Verschoyle till after I conformed; but I mentioned it to the Bishop of Killala about a fortnight prior to my actual conforming.

Can you recollect the date of your actual conformity?—It was on the 19th April 1818.

Did you conform in the cathedral of Killala?—No, in the parish church of Cross-molina.

Where had you slept the night before?—I slept at the lodgings of an officer, an acquaintance of mine.

In what place?—In the parish of Cross-molina.

Where was your own house at that time?—In Kilmore Erris.

How long before your conformity was it that you had left Kilmore Erris?—About a fortnight or thereabouts previously.

Where had you passed that fortnight?—I passed it in the neighbourhood of Cross-molina.

In whose house?—I dined occasionally with Colonel Jackson; I dined also with Major Orme.

Where had you usually slept during that time?—I slept occasionally at Colonel Jackson's; but I chiefly slept at the officer's I have mentioned, with whom I was acquainted.

Was it known by those persons that you were about to conform to the established church?—I only mentioned it to the officer.

Did Colonel Jackson know it?—I believe he did, but not from me.

When had the Roman Catholic bishop of the diocese first reason to suppose that it was likely that you would conform?—I believe a fortnight before I did conform; I made no secret of my intention.

Where were you when you made no secret of it?—In Cross-molina.

Was it known in your parish that you were about to conform?—It was only known to individuals.

Who was in the charge of the parochial duties of that parish during that fortnight that you passed at Cross-molina?—I do not know, unless the old gentleman undertook the duties.

Where was the bishop at that time?—He was in Ballina: there was a meeting of the priests, or a conference, when the holy oils are consecrated and distributed to the priests. It was my intention for some time before this period to conform, and to apply to the Bishop of Killala when I should come to his neighbourhood. I had been invited some time before that, by this officer with whom I was acquainted, to stay some time at his house; and instead of going on to Ballina with the other priests, I went to Killala, and spoke to the Bishop of Killala, and told him of my intentions. His lordship said to me that he wished me to act seriously, and to consider well before I should take so important a step, and he asked me if I could produce any respectable testimonials to him. I had provided myself with respectable testimonials for some time before that, from the parish in which I lived, and from the gentlemen of the neighbourhood; and I produced those testimonials to his lordship, which he considered satisfactory: then he told me to go home, and to consider the matter for eight days, and if I returned to him in the same frame of mind, after considering all the circumstances, that he could not object to me; but at the same time, that he could hold out to me no hope of preferment: I retired, and during that week I lived in the manner I have now described.

If you had gone on to Ballina, did you expect to be called upon to answer to any particular charges?—Certainly not; I had no apprehension whatever on my mind; but I do believe that it was suspected that I intended to leave the communion of the church of Rome.

Are we to understand that you went as far as Cross-molina with some other priests?—Yes, in company with some priests.

As if going on to Ballina?—Yes.

Was there any particular reason which induced you at that particular time, having gone as far as to Cross-molina with the other priests, there to stop, instead of going on to Ballina with them?—There was no particular reason, except the invitation before alluded to. It was my serious intention, for more than half a year before that time, to take the step I have taken. I mentioned that intention to a gentleman in the country, with whom I was on habits of intimacy; a captain in the East India Company's service.

Having got as far as Cross-molina on the way to Ballina, there you stopped?—I happened accidentally to meet the other priests on the road; I intended to stop at Cross-molina when I left home, for the reasons before stated.

Then it had not been settled or fixed by Doctor Waldron, previously, that any investigation into your conduct was to take place at that time; at least, that had not been communicated to you?—Certainly not; it was not communicated to me—when I saw him some time before that, when he mentioned that a gentleman had told him that I had eaten meat, I said that I had done so, and I considered I was justified in doing so from the state of health health I was in, having nothing else so suited to my state of health: he said, so far I was justifiable; but that it was very indiscreet and improper in me to eat meat before laymen, and before some Protestants who were dining with me; and he said, that should I be guilty of the same crime again, he would consider it his duty to suspend me.

You are certain he did not mention any other subject matter of complaint against you?—None.

How long before you went to Cross-molina was your interview with the bishop?—About six weeks.

Was it during Lent?—I think it was before Lent; it was at Christmas that this circumstance occurred which had been mentioned to the bishop; it was about the days of Christmas that I dined on roast beef on a Friday.

When you were examined upon a former day, you were asked whether the Pope had been styled "our Lord God the Pope," by any writer in the Catholic church; to which you replied, that he had; and you were asked to mention the name of any such writer; you stated, you could at your leisure; and you were requested to do so: have you now prepared a statement upon that subject?—I have (the witness delivered in the following statement). Baldo, or Baldus: "Papa est Deus in terris." Bald. in L. ult. C. de Sent. rescind. Abad: "Quod Papa facit; facit ut Deus, non ut homo." Abad. in Cap. licet de elect. Fagano: "that the Pope holds on earth, not the place of a mere man, but that of a true God." Gratian: "Papa canonicè electus est Deus in terris."—Gratian, c. 1, dist. 93. And Bellarmine says: "Should the Pope enjoin the practice of vice, and prevent the observance of virtue, the church is bound to believe that vice is virtue and virtue vice, under pain of mortal sin." Bellarmine de Rom. Pont. lib. 4, cap. 5.

This statement first contains a quotation from Baldo: will you have the goodness to state who Baldo was?—I understand him to be an Italian divine, who wrote upon the subject there referred to.

What work of his do you quote from?—It is in his work "De Sententiis Rescindendis," in the last book of his work, which is rather a large one.

What is the title of his book?—It is on the infallibility of the Pope.

Are you in possession of the work?—I have not it here; it was in London that I made these extracts for other purposes, last winter. I was engaged in other studies then, and I made these extracts, but I have not the book in my possession.

Is the work in Italian or in Latin?—It is in Latin.

Can you state to the Commissioners whether the term Deus is there used in the way in which it is used as applicable to Almighty God, or in the way in which it is sometimes used in scripture as applicable to kings and potentates?—I should think it is used as applicable to Almighty God.

You have also quoted a passage from Bellarmine; are we to understand that Bellarmine states, as a distinct proposition, according to the words you cite, that should the Pope enjoin the practice of vice, and prevent the observance of virtue, the church is bound to believe that vice is virtue and virtue vice, under pain of mortal sin?—Decidedly.

You are quite positive that Bellarmine does not put that in the way of argument to show the false consequences of a writer that he was answering?—I understand him to put it as I have stated it there.

Have you read Bellarmine's work yourself?—I have.

Did you extract that quotation from Bellarmine?—I translated it and extracted it for my own notes, for a work I was engaged in at the time I before stated. I have not looked at Bellarmine since last winter.

Are we to understand you as stating to us, that you have not here given a part of a passage that would bear a different construction if the whole context was given, but that you have given a substantive proposition laid down by Bellarmine?—According to my honest interpretation, I have.

WILL you read to the Commissioners, from the volume of the works of Bellarmine now put into your hands, the whole of the chapter from which you profess to have taken the extract referred to in your last examination?—The chapter is as follows:

CAPUT V.

De Decretis morum.

"Tertia propositio hæc esse potest. Non solum in decretis fidei errare non potest summus Pontifex, sed neque in præceptis morum, quæ toti ecclesiæ præscribuntur, et quæ in rebus necessariis ad salutem, vel in iis quæ per se bona, vel mala sunt, versantur.

"Dicimus primum, non posse errare Pontificem in iis præceptis, quæ toti ecclesiæ præscribuntur, quia ut supra diximus, in præceptis, et judiciis particularibus, non est absurdum Pontificem errare.

Appendix, N^o 42.Examination of
Rev. T. W. Dixon.
2 Nov. 1826.

“ Addimus secundo, quæ in rebus necessariis ad salutem, vel per se bonis, aut malis versantur, quia non est erroneum dicere, Pontificem in aliis legibus posse errare, nimirum superfluum legem condendo, vel minus discretam, &c.

Secundo, quia tunc necessariò erraret etiam circa fidem. Nam fides Catholica docet omnem virtutem esse bonam, omne vitium esse malum: si autem Papa erraret præcipiendo vitia, vel prohibendo virtutes, teneretur ecclesia credere vitia esse bona, et virtutes malas, nisi vellet contra conscientiam peccare. Tenetur enim in rebus dubiis Ecclesia acquiescere judicio Summi Pontificis, et facere quod ille præcipit, non facere quod ille prohibet; ac ne forte contra conscientiam agat, tenetur credere bonum esse quod ille præcipit: malum quod ille prohibet.”

Fifth Chapter.

On Decrees regarding Morals.

“ This may be the third proposition: the chief Pontiff (or Pope) is infallible, not only in decrees of faith, but also in moral precepts, which are enjoined on the whole church, and which regard matters essential to salvation, or those things which in themselves are good or bad.

“ We say in the first place, that the Pope cannot err in those precepts which are enjoined on the whole church, because as we have said above, it is not absurd that the Pope should err in particular precepts and judgments.

“ We add, secondly, in matters necessary to salvation, or in themselves good or bad, because it is not erroneous to say that the Pope can err in other laws; for example, by framing a superfluous or ill digested law, &c.

“ But to elucidate the whole matter by examples, it is impossible that the Pope could err in enjoining the practice of any particular vice, such as usury, or in preventing the observance of a virtue, such as restitution, because these are good or bad in themselves; nor is it possible that he could err in enjoining any thing contrary to salvation, as circumcision or the Sabbath, or in preventing the observance of any thing necessary to salvation, as baptism or the eucharist; but should he order any thing that is not essentially good or bad, nor contrary to salvation, but still is useless, or enjoined under a heavy penalty, it is not absurd to say that it is possible, though it is not the privilege of subjects to judge of this matter, but simply to obey.

“ Now to the proof of the proposition: And first, that the Pope cannot err in moral precepts necessary to salvation; because then the whole church would be grievously injured, and might err in essentials, which is contrary to the promise of our Lord. John 16, “When the Spirit of truth shall come, he will teach you all truth;” which is understood (at least) of truth necessary to salvation.

“ Secondly, because God would then be wanting to, or negligent of his church in essentials, since he enjoined on her to obey the Pope, and still permitted the Pope to err in essentials; but indeed if God be not wanting to any matter in essentials, how much less to his church.

“ But that the Pontiff cannot err in morals, in themselves good or bad, is proved; for then the church could not be called holy, as it is called in the Apostles Creed, as she is chiefly called holy on account of her holy profession, as we have elsewhere shown, because truly she holds out a holy law and profession, which teaches nothing false, which enjoins nothing bad.

“ Secondly, because the church would then necessarily err, even regarding faith; for the Catholic faith teaches all virtues to be good, all vices to be bad; but if the Pope should err in enjoining the practice of vice, or preventing the observance of virtue, still the church is bound to believe vice to be virtue, and virtue vice, unless she would wish to sin against conscience; conscience; for the church is bound in matters of doubt to acquiesce in the judgment of the Chief Pontiff, and to observe whatever he enjoins, to avoid doing whatever he prohibits; and under pain of mortal sin she is bound to believe that whatever he enjoins is virtue, whatever he prohibits is vice."

In the extract which you delivered in, as an extract from Bellarmine, the Commissioners find it thus stated: "Should the Pope enjoin the practice of vice, and prevent the observance of virtue, the church is bound to believe that vice is virtue and virtue vice, under pain of mortal sin." The Commissioners asked you whether they were to understand that Bellarmine stated it as a distinct proposition, according to the words you cited, that should the Pope enjoin the practice of vice, and prevent the observance of virtue, the church is bound to believe that vice is virtue and virtue vice, under pain of mortal sin. You answered, "Decidedly." You were asked whether Bellarmine did not put that in the way of argument, to show the false consequence of a position he was answering. You said you understood him to put it as you had stated. As you referred to the chapter you have now read as that from which the extract was taken, you are now requested to point out in that chapter where it is laid down as a distinct proposition, that "Should the Pope enjoin the practice of vice, and prevent the observance of virtue, the church is bound to believe that vice is virtue and virtue vice, under pain of mortal sin?"—He begins this chapter by laying down this proposition: "That the Pope is not only infallible in decrees of faith, but also in moral precepts which are enjoined on the whole church, and which regard either those matters in themselves, good or evil, or matters necessary for salvation." Bellarmine then goes to prove this principle, by stating that the church is bound to obey the Pope, and that if the Pope could err in enjoining those principles with regard to vice or virtue, then the church must err; and he lays it down then as a strong principle, that such is the obedience that the church owes to the dictamen of the Pope in this instance, that should the Pope even err in enjoining the practice of vice, and preventing the observance of virtue, that still the church would be bound to obey him; because if the Pope could err, then in the possibility of his erring the church could not be holy—he lays it down as a firm principle, that it is better, even under those circumstances, strictly to acquiesce in the judgment of the Pontiff, and to do what he enjoins them to do. I certainly do not see that it is at all stated for the sake of argument; it is a proposition clearly laid down, that with regard to the decrees of faith, and also in the simple precepts of morals, the Pope is infallible, and that being infallible, the church is bound to believe him; and that in consequence of his infallibility they are not to doubt, but immediately to believe him and to obey him, even should he enjoin the practice of what may be called relative vice, and prevent the observance of virtue on this principle; that is certainly as clearly deducible from Bellarmine as any thing I have ever been able to read; there is not a shadow of doubt on that subject.

Does not Bellarmine, instead of laying it down as a distinct proposition that "should the Pope enjoin the practice of vice, and prevent the observance of virtue, the church is bound to believe that vice is virtue and virtue vice under pain of mortal sin," distinctly state that proposition as a false proposition, which would be the monstrous consequence of holding that the Pope was not infallible?—Certainly it comes to that; it is a necessary consequence of his infallibility. Bellarmine lays down that the Pope is infallible, and then he says, "What wretched consequences would follow if the Pope were not infallible, because he might teach you virtue for vice, and you would be bound to believe him."

Is not that putting it in the way of argument?—No, it is virtually deducing it as a necessary consequence; he says, You are obliged to obey the Pope when he enjoins the observance of any particular rite, and should that which he enjoins even be vice, you are obliged to obey him, because he is infallible, and if you divest him of that infallibility it is possible that you may go wrong, because if he should enjoin the practice of vice, you are obliged to obey him. That I think is as clear as can be; it is certainly evident that he lays it down as a proposition to prove the infallibility of the Pope.

Does not Bellarmine in that passage state in substance this: the Pope cannot err so as to enjoin the practice of vice or prohibit the practice of virtue?—That is a part of the context; he says he cannot enjoin the practice of vice, or prevent the observance of virtue, but if he should, the church must obey him.

Will you point out the passage which states that?—The passage begins thus, "Quod autem non posset Pontifex errare in moribus per se bonis vel malis probatur," &c.

Will you translate that passage?—"That the Pontiff cannot err in morals, either good or bad in themselves, is proved; for then the church could not truly be said to be holy, as it is called in the creed; for it is chiefly called holy, on account of its holy profession, as we have shown elsewhere, because it professes a holy law and profession, which, unless it teaches falsely, enjoins nothing bad. Secondly, because he would then necessarily err even regarding faith, for the Catholic faith teaches that all virtue is good and all vice is bad; but if the Pope should err in enjoining the practice of vice, or prohibiting the observance of virtue, the church would be bound to believe that vice was virtue and virtue vice, unless they wish to sin against their conscience, for the church is bound in doubtful matters to acquiesce in the judgment of the Pope, and to do whatever he enjoins, and not to do what he prohibits, lest perhaps it should act contrary to conscience," or in other words, commit sin, "it is bound to believe that that is good, whatever he enjoins, and that is bad, whatever he prohibits."

Is not the sentence from which you took the passage you originally cited to the Commissioners in these words, "Si autem Papa erraret præcipiendo vitia, vel prohibendo virtutes, teneretur teneretur ecclesia credere vitia esse bona, et virtutes malas, nisi vellet contra conscientiam peccare?"—That is the paragraph.

Why did you omit the words "Si autem Papa erraret;" why did you say, "Should the Pope enjoin the practice of vice," &c. instead of saying, "If the Pope should err by enjoining the practice of vice," &c.?—I do not think it is a material omission by any means. At the time I gave in that paper I certainly must confess that I did not refer as fully to the authorities as I have done since, and I have inserted those words in a paper which I have brought with me to day, which is more full and explanatory.

You were asked upon a former occasion whether the quotation you gave to the Commissioners was a substantive proposition laid down by Bellarmine; will you now state that it is a substantive proposition faithfully given as an entire sentence?—I do believe that it is a substantive proposition; for if you translate the last sentence in the chapter, you will find that that is the substance of it, and I did give it as a substantial proposition laid down by Bellarmine.

You were asked whether it was not part of a sentence, (the Commissioner who was then examining you having a general recollection of the work of Bellarmine, and believing it to be part of a sentence,) and you took upon yourself to say that it was not part of a sentence?—That it was the substance. I believe the Commissioners will find that I only said it was a substantial proposition laid down, and so I honestly interpreted it in reading Bellarmine.

The last question put to you upon the former day was this, "Are the Commissioners to understand you as stating that you have not here given a part of a passage that would bear a different construction if the whole context was given, but that you have given a substantive proposition laid down by Bellarmine?" Your answer was, "According to my honest interpretation I have"—And I say the same now; it is a general corollary taken from his proposition, and not a garbled extract by any means.

Were you on the former occasion giving a quotation from the works of Bellarmine, or were you giving what you conceived to be the substance?—I was giving what I conceived to be the substance of the proposition he laid down. I could not charge my memory with the exact quotation, but I had an impression that he stated that principle, and I have referred more fully since that day to the authority, which I have stated in the paper I have brought with me.

Having now Bellarmine's book before you, will you describe what chapter it is about which you are speaking?—The 5th chapter, "De Decretis Morum," in the 4th book of Bellarmine's work De Romano Pontifice.

The original text of that chapter is inserted in a previous part of the minutes; will you add a translation of it at your leisure, and take care that it be as literal as possible?—I will.

You have stated that you intended to give the quotation which you handed in on a former day merely as a substantial statement of what was in Bellarmine; is not the quotation itself marked by inverted commas, and did you not state on the former day that you translated it and extracted it yourself for your own notes?—I said that I extracted it for my own notes in a very short manner, but that I could not be exact in making the quotation without referring to the original, which I have done since.

Do you mean to say that you stated on the former occasion that you could not be exact without referring to your notes?—That I could not be exact as to the words.

Will you look at your evidence on the former day.—[The evidence given by the witness on the 23d November being handed to him.]—Do you not now perceive that when you were answering on the former day, you made no such qualification as you have now mentioned; that is, that you were not certain as to the words?—It certainly may not be inferred from my evidence; I did not say that I was particularly exact.

Did you not give in the paper upon that day as an extract taken by you from Bellarmine, and did you not mark it by inverted commas?—It was an extract, and a true extract.

Do you mean now to say that it was a true extract?—I do certainly.

Will you have the goodness to look at a work intitled, "Catholic Communion," which appears to have been written by a minister of the church of England, in the year 1704, and to read, from page 15 of this work, the part marked question 2d, and the subsequent paragraph, which relates to the subject now under consideration?—"Whether those in communion with the church of Rome are bound to believe virtue to be wicked, and vice to be good, if it shall please his Holiness to say so? This is nowhere declared in the councils of Florence or Trent; it has no place in any profession of their faith; it is not taught in their catechisms; it is nowhere proposed as a term of communion. But the full account of this is, that it is an expression of Bellarmine, (De Rom. Pont. l. 4, c. 5,) who carries the Pope's infallibility so high that he says, 'tis impossible for the Pope so to err as to declare virtue to be wicked, and vice to be good: and to prove this ab inconvenienti, he thus argues; if this infallibility be not granted in the Pope, then it would be attended with this fatal consequence, that if he should declare virtue to be bad, and vice to be good, all would be bound to believe it; having first supposed it impossible he should ever make such a declaration. In the same manner as if any one, to prove that the scripture cannot err, in commanding vice or forbidding virtue, should say, we be bound to believe virtue to be evil, and vice to be good, because we are bound to believe that to be evil which the scripture forbids, and that good which it commands. In which manner of arguing, ab inconvenienti, there is no absurdity, it having been before established as a certain truth, that it is impossible it should so err."

Do you agree with that writer in his exposition of the passage in question?—I agree with him, that Bellarmine wishes to establish the Pope's infallibility by his arguments.

Did you ever see that work before that has been now put into your hands?—Never.

Who is the author of it?—I do not know.

Will you look at the titlepage, and state, if you can, who the author was?—It seems to be a book without any authority annexed to it; it is printed in the year 1704, and re-printed in 1801.

Does the writer of that book appear to you to have taken any notice whatever of the last sentence in the chapter of Bellarmine to which you have referred?—I think he does not take any notice of that last sentence; because Bellarmine lays it down positively, that the church is bound to acquiesce absolutely in the judgment of the Pope.

Have you any other reason for thinking that he has not noticed the whole of the chapter, than because you do not agree with him in the interpretation of it?—I think he does not take notice of it.

Did you take any notice of it when you made the extract which you first handed in to the Commissioners?—It was this I had principally in view.

Does not he notice the whole of the passage which you formerly gave to the Commissioners?—He seems generally to notice the chapter.

Does he not notice and quote the whole of the passage which you quoted on the former day?—I think not.

Will you look at the passage again, and state the part he has left out?—I think he does not state the whole, because he argues negatively; he says it would be impossible for the Pope to err—then he argues from that principle; but Bellarmine positively says, that the church is bound to acquiesce in the judgment of the Pontiff in matters of doubt, and to do whatever he enjoins, and not to do whatever he prohibits. I think that sentiment is a strong corollary drawn by Bellarmine to establish the proposition that the Pope is infallible.

The passage which you gave to the Commissioners as a faithful extract from Bellarmine, copied by yourself, which you stated was laid down by him as a substantive proposition, is, "should the Pope enjoin the practice of vice, and prevent the observance of virtue, the church is bound to believe that vice is virtue, and virtue vice, under pain of mortal sin." Does not the writer, whose work is before you, notice the whole of that proposition in the part to which your attention has been called?—I think he does not.

Does he not state the question to be this, "Whether those in communion with the church of Rome are bound to believe virtue to be wicked and vice to be good, if it shall please his Holiness to say so?"—He puts that as the question.

Is not that the proposition stated in the extract you have given?—It is; but he does not come to the same conclusion that Bellarmine does.

Does not the writer of that pamphlet, in the passage you have read, seem to understand Bellarmine as placing the authority of the Pope exactly on the same level as that of Scripture?—Certainly; he seems to intimate that Bellarmine places the authority of the Pope on the same level as that of scripture; but I think he does not go the whole length that Bellarmine does; because Bellarmine says, that the church is bound to believe the Pope, should he prohibit the practice of virtue and enjoin the practice of vice.

Will you look at page 17, question 3, and see whether the writer there does not notice Bellarmine's proposition, that the church is bound to obey the Pope?—The passage in page 17 is as follows:—"Question 3. Whether the Pope be such an universal infallible guide, that the whole church depends in an arbitrary manner upon his orders and decisions, so as to be paramount and superior to general councils?—So high as this Bellarmine seems to carry the papal supremacy, and there is no being in communion with him but on these terms. But as to the Roman church, which is the subject of my inquiry, there is no assent required to any such doctrine: there is no such doctrine declared, either in the council of Florence or Trent; it is not contained in the profession of faith, which is offered to all beneficed persons, as a test of their being orthodox in the belief of that church. It is not in their public catechism, composed for instructing the people in the faith of their church. The assent to such doctrine is neither imposed or demanded of any that are admitted into that communion; and this seems enough to conclude it to be no matter of faith but only opinion, in which every one is left with the liberty of judging for himself, and consequently accordingly to our first rule, this question ought not to be insisted on. But, however, to give some further evidence of its being no more than an opinion, I will add, that I find the council of Pisa held by many as general, showed itself in fact not to be of Bellarmine's judgment. Whilst it first deposed Benedict XIII. and Gregory XII. and afterwards elected Alexander V. into their place, which council was by the same Alexander twice confirmed. Secondly, that the councils of Constance and Basil have expressly in terms declared the supreme power of the church militant under Christ, over all the faithful, even over the Pope himself, to be in general councils, as to defining matters of faith, abolishing schisms and reforming the church, both in the head and members, and that all persons whatever, and amongst others the very Pope himself, is bound to obey, and be subject to their decrees.—Conc. Const. Sess. 4 and 5. Conc. Basil. Sess. 3. Thirdly, that it has been a practice to appeal from the bulls of divers popes to a future general council. The university of Paris has thus appealed four several times. The Emperor Charles V. made a like appeal; and several others are recorded by Richerius—Hist. Cons. Constant, p. 259. Edit. Colon. in 4to. Fourthly, That Lannoin has alleged the testimonies of thirty-five popes, for the superiority of councils over the Pope—P. 1, Ep. ad Hieron. Sambævium. Fifthly, That in the decree of the council of Florence, the exercise of the papal power, whatever it be, is limited and tied to the observation of oecumenical councils, and the sacred canons, and consequently subjected to them. Quem admodum et in gestis oecumenicorum conciliorum, et in sacris canonibus continetur; which are the words of the said decree. Upon all which it seems plain, that the arbitrary power of the Pope, in his decisions and government of the church, is not a matter of faith in that church; but that, as it is maintained by Bellarmine, so the contrary is as positively asserted by others of his church, and consequently that it is only a polemical question, in which every one has the liberty of judging for himself, and therefore, by our first rule, not to be made an obstruction to communion. And were the negative part so temerarious and false as Bellarmine censures it, yet since he is censured as severely by others for this his censure—Veron. Rul. of Faith, c. 4.—since neither side is any where imposed by that church, still, according to our second rule, this question ought not to be insisted on; because whichever side is in an error, yet the communion of the church is so open, that it may be joined with, without professing or giving any assent to such error.”

On a former day you were asked whether the Pope had been styled “Our Lord God the Pope,” by any writer in the catholic church? to which you replied, that he had; you were asked to mention the name of any such writer, and you stated that you could at your leisure; and you were requested to do so; are you now prepared with a final statement upon that subject?—I am; I will now read to the Commissioners the statement I have prepared:—“Pope Innocent the Third, in the first book of his decretals on the subject, de Translatione Episcoporum, lays down as an indisputable point that the Pope holds on earth the place of God Almighty, or in other words, that he is a god; (he says,) That the Pope in dissolving those bonds which (it is presumed from the subject) should subsist between bishops and their churches in the case of translation, acts not in the capacity of a man but in that of a god.—“Qui non puri hominis sed veri Dei Vicem Gerit in Terris.”—Divi Innocentii Tertii Papæ Constitutionum decretalium liber primus—de translatione Episcoporum, fol. 615.

The same doctrine, with regard to the divinity of the Pope, is also taught by Cornelius Mussus, bishop of Bitonto:—“A quo Roma quærenda sunt Divina consilia, nisi ab illis, quibus mysteriorum Dei dispensatio credita est? Quem ergo pro Deo habemus in his quæ Dei sunt quicquid ipse dixerit, tamquam Deum audire debemus.”

“O Rome, to whom shall we apply for Divine counsels, unless to those persons to whose trust the dispensation of the divine mysteries has been committed? We are then to hear him, whatever he shall say, who is to us as a God in those things that concern God (as powerful) as God himself.” Ad Romanos absolutissima Commentaria Reverendissimi. D. Cornelii Mussi Episcopi. Bitontini Caput. Quartum Decimum, fol. 606.

This principle is also established by another authority of great celebrity in the Romish church, Philip Decius, a distinguished commentator on the Canon Law, who says, in a work intitled Philippi Decii Mediolanensis Juris Consulti præclarissimi Commentaria in Jus Pontificum—Papa si quid facit id Deus facere censetur:—Which may be thus translated:—All the acts of the Pope must be considered as the acts of God. And again:—“Quod factum à Papa reputatur factum à Deo, quia ipse non puri hominis sed vicem Dei gerit in terris.”—“What is done by the Pope is considered as done by God, because he (the Pope) bears on earth the rank, not of a sinless man, but of a God.” And in another place, at the 21st section or sentence in the same page, he says, “Papa omnia potest quæ potest Deus.”—“The Pope can do all things that God can do.”—Philippi Decii Super Decretalibus Secunda Lectura de Constitutionibus, page 6.

When you originally left the diocese of Killala, did you take any recommendatory letter from the bishop?—I did; I got a recommendatory letter, which is registered in the archives of the diocese of Killala; I believe as high a testimonial as any man could procure.

Did you continue curate, officiating as such in the diocese, till you went to London?—I did.

Did any thing occur to prevent your acting as a curate, prior to your resigning your curacy?—I was persecuted by night repeatedly, and there were some shots fired at me, I firmly believe by malignant papists, even into my house; my life was endangered to such a degree, that with the advice of my friends, I thought it imprudent to stay any longer in such a place.

Did any thing else occur to interrupt the performance of your duties?—Certainly not; for not only have I received the highest possible testimonials from the Bishop of Killala, but I have been since in habits of friendly correspondence with him by letter; and I believe I can produce as respectable testimonials of character and acquaintance with people high in the church as any clergyman in my humble rank.

Did you not mention that you were acquainted with some gentlemen residing in the neighbourhood of Belmullet, on a former day?—In the neighbourhood of Crossmolina.

Did you not mention the name of Major Bingham?—There is a Major Bingham living in the neighbourhood of Belmullet, with whom I have had some difference of opinion: there is Mr. Annesley Knox, of Rappa Castle, with whom I have been on intimate terms; that gentleman is now at Gresham’s hotel in Sackville-street: the Archbishop of Dublin has known me for some years.

Is there any thing you would wish to add to the evidence you have given?—There is nothing.

The Rev. Matthias Crowley having been sworn, was Examined.

Tuesday, 7th November 1826.

Appendix, N° 43.

Examination of
Rev. M. Crowley.
7 November 1826.

YOU are a clergyman of the established church?—Yes.

What situation do you hold in the church?—I am curate of Great Connell, in the diocese of Kildare, and vicar of Jerpoint, in the diocese of Ossory.

Where were you ordained?—In the college of Maynooth, in the diocese of Dublin.

By whom were you ordained?—By Dr. Troy, in the Roman Catholic church.

Were you educated at Maynooth college?—Partly.

What length of time were you there?—I was about seven years in Maynooth as student and as teacher.

When did you go to Maynooth as student?—I went first to Maynooth about the year 1797.

Into what class were you admitted?—Into the class of divinity.

About what age were you when you were admitted?—I think I was between nineteen and twenty.

Where did you receive your previous education?—In Cork.

How many years were you in the divinity class?—I studied two years divinity in Carlow, and two in Maynooth.

Were you at Carlow between the period of your leaving Cork and going to Maynooth?—The first time I went to the college of Maynooth I was expelled from it, and I returned to Cork.

The Commissioners understand you to say that you went to Maynooth as a student in 1797?—Yes.

Was that your first admission there?—It was.

How long did you continue there?—About half a year.

For what reason were you expelled?—For non-attendance at prayer one day, and going out of the college. I was not properly a student at the time; I was what they call an extern: I was lodging out of the college; and I went to the neighbouring town of Killocock without leave, and when I returned in the evening I was too late for prayers; that was, as far as I could learn, the cause of my expulsion. I think it right to add, that I returned to college in a state of intoxication, and was very idle and refractory for a considerable time before.

Had the college been long established then?—I believe about two or three years.

What number of young men were there in the divinity class at that time?—I should think about fifty or sixty.

When you say you were expelled, do you mean that there was a solemn sentence of expulsion passed upon you, or that you were advised to go away?—There was a solemn sentence passed on me.

Publicly announced in the hall?—Publicly announced in the hall.

Was the cause publicly assigned?—I was not present; but I always understood it was being absent from prayer, and going from the college without leave.

Was any communication made to you upon the subject, or was any inquiry made why you were absent?—No inquiry whatever.

Did you afterwards return to the college?—After some years. I remained in Cork about one year, or a year and a half; and then I went to Carlow college, where I remained for two years; and from Carlow I went to Maynooth again.

In what year?—I think about the beginning of 1802.

Did you return to the divinity class?—I did; I studied two years divinity at Carlow, which were allowed to me in the course of Maynooth; and then I entered on the third year's divinity.

The class of Dunboyne students had not then been established?—No.

When you had gone through the divinity class did you leave the college?—No, I was appointed to the situation of lecturer in dogmatic theology.

How long did you hold that situation?—Four years.

Did Dr. Delahogue succeed you?—No; I studied under Dr. Delahogue, and I was lecturer under him afterwards; I repeated the lectures that he gave; there was no written treatise of theology at that time.

Dr. Delahogue was professor of sacred Scripture and Hebrew, was not he?—He might have had that title, but he was professor of dogmatic theology all my time.

Are you acquainted with the tract book from which the professor of dogmatic theology lectures at Maynooth?—I never read it, but I believe it contains in substance the same doctrine as I was taught.

Did you teach what are called the Cisalpine or the Transalpine doctrine?—The French doctrine was that of my professor, Dr. Delahogue; but I do not remember that he introduced any of the peculiar tenets of that doctrine into his course of divinity.

Have you any recollection upon the subject one way or the other?—For instance, with respect to the Pope's infallibility, I do not think he taught anything about it in my time.

What did you teach upon the subject?—I do not think I taught anything on it;

Appendix, N° 43.

Examination of
Rev. M. Crowley.
7 November 1826.

I followed the book that he gave, and he gave nothing upon that question that I can remember.

Did you teach that it was not an article of faith in the Roman Catholic church, but an open doctrine upon which Roman Catholics were at liberty to hold what opinion they chose?—There was nothing on either one side or the other taught upon it in my time.

Were the doctrines respecting allegiance to the King, and obedience to the Government, taught by you, the same as are laid down in Dr. Delahogue's treatise?—I do not think he taught any thing on the subject before he published his treatise; there was nothing in his written lectures on that subject that I can remember during my time in the college; I have not read his printed treatise.

Did you teach that the power of the Pope was confined to spiritual things, and that he had no power in temporal matters?—I forget whether that question was discussed in our course of divinity while I was there.

What was your own belief at that time upon that subject?—My belief was that his power was confined to spirituals.

What did you believe at that time with respect to oaths; did you believe that the Pope had the power to absolve you from an oath of allegiance taken to the Crown?—I did not. I took the oath of allegiance when I returned to the college of Maynooth the second time; and I declared, when I took that oath, that I did not believe that any power upon earth had any power to absolve me from it.

Did you so believe at that time?—I did.

Was that the prevailing opinion at that time in the college, so far as you were acquainted with it?—I believe it was.

Were the lectures you then delivered composed by yourself?—No, Dr. Delahogue's; he explained his lectures first for the class, and I made the class repeat the same; I gave them practice in what he taught.

You were in fact a junior lecturer in divinity?—I was.

In the lectures that you gave, did you explain any portion of the scriptures?—I went a third time to Maynooth, and then I was appointed professor of scripture.

When you were a student at Maynooth, were the scriptures of either the Old or New Testament read by the students?—Only occasionally; that class was neglected in a great degree at that time; and all the time that I was there, except the last few months, I spent in college.

Do you remember whether you were in possession of a bible during the time you were a student at Maynooth?—I was not during the whole time I was there, except the last year, when I got a Latin bible as a premium.

Were many of the students possessed of bibles?—No; some of them had a New Testament. There were professors regularly appointed for all the other classes; but for the class of scripture, during all the time I was in the college, except the last few months, there was no regular professor; we had occasionally lectures from the president once a week, and at another time from Mr. Montague.

Can you recollect whether the students were discouraged at all from studying the scriptures, either the Old or New Testament?—Not in any way, but they had no regular professor; and the time was not spent at that study as it was at the other classes.

If you had wished to purchase a bible, and to read it, would you have been discouraged from doing so?—No.

Then although it was not required, and although you were in no way encouraged to do so, yet you were in no way discouraged from doing so?—I cannot say that I was discouraged; but the time of the students of divinity is so filled up with the classes of dogmatic theology and moral theology, that they had not time to study the Scriptures.

The Commissioners understand you to say, that during the latter part of the time you were there, you were yourself a lecturer in scripture?—I was.

Will you describe the course you pursued in delivering those lectures?—I read several commentators on the Gospel of St. Matthew, and then I wrote down an explanation, or a short commentary on the different chapters: and I delivered those lectures in the class twice a week.

Did you read the chapters themselves to the young men, and explain them?—They had the chapter before them in the Testament, and I gave my explanation, and asked them to explain such a part.

Did your explanation comprehend the whole Gospel of St. Matthew, or was it confined to particular chapters?—I began at the first chapter, and went regularly on as long as I continued, which was about three months.

Did the whole divinity class attend your lectures?—They did.

What was the cause of your quitting Maynooth the third time?—To conform to the established church.

At what time did you begin to entertain opinions unfavourable to a belief in the Roman Catholic religion?—About two years before I conformed, I believe.

In what year were you ordained?—I do not exactly remember the year.

Were you in orders when you lectured as the deputy-professor to Dr. Delahogue?—I was.

Were you fully in priest's orders?—I was at that time.

Had you ever any parochial duty as priest?—I had; I spent two years in Cork as one of the curates of Dr. Moylan, the titular bishop; that was after I left the college the second time.

What

What was the amount of your salary and emoluments during the time you were lecturer in sacred scripture, after you returned to Maynooth the last time?—I believe it was about 70*l.* or 80*l.* a year.

During the whole of the time of your last residence at Maynooth, the Commissioners understand you to say you had doubts as to the truth of the Roman Catholic doctrines?—As to some particular points; I cannot say that I examined every question till after I left them; I spent a short time afterwards in examining the different points, one after the other.

Did you reside in the college of Maynooth when you were last there?—I did.

And lived at the professors table?—Yes.

Might you have continued in the situation of lecturer in the sacred scripture, if you had wished it?—I gave up that office in compliance with the wishes of the president at the time, who prevailed upon me to undertake the office of dean; I was never appointed to that office by the trustees, but I undertook it; I was in that office when I left the college.

What was the reason that the trustees did not appoint you?—They had not time; I did not remain till the sitting of the trustees; I was only a few months in the office of dean.

Might you have continued in that office if you had wished it?—I think I might.

You were not removed from it in any way?—No; the president did all he possibly could to prevail upon me to remain.

Who was the president at that time?—Doctor Everard.

Did he know that your reason for quitting the college was your wish to conform to the Establishment?—He did not.

When you quitted the college, had you made up your mind to do so?—I had; I applied to Mr. Ashe, the parish clergyman, upon the subject.

Without communicating to Dr. Everard?—Yes; I did not communicate to him.

What steps did you take to be admitted into the established church?—I got a letter from Mr. Ashe, the clergyman of Maynooth, to the Rev. Mr. O'Connor, of Castlenock, and I met Mr. O'Connor at Mr. Watson's; he introduced me to a Mr. Ogleby, and Mr. Ogleby to Mr. Matthias, with whom I lived a fortnight or three weeks; and from his place I went to the Bishop of Kildare's.

Had you any preferment promised you?—Not the least.

What was the first situation you held in the established church?—As curate.

What emolument did you derive from your curacy?—£.75 a year.

That was about the same as you had at Maynooth?—I was better off at Maynooth, for I had my diet and lodging in addition.

Have you ever been married?—Yes; I have been married about thirteen years.

How many years is it since you quitted Maynooth?—In the year 1811 or 1810.

Had you at that time any personal acquaintance with the person you afterwards married? Not the least.

In the instruction given at Maynooth, is there any thing taught which tends to shake the students in their allegiance to the established authorities in this country?—Not the least in my time, nor have I heard that it was changed in that respect since; I do not believe it is.

Were the students much in the habit of discussing political subjects amongst themselves?

—The last time I was in the college I did not much mix with the students.

At any time when you were there?—In the year 1798 they discussed them very much; and many of them were rebellious, and expelled in consequence.

After that time can you say whether the students were much in the habit of discussing political subjects?—I do not think they were.

Were they in the habit of expressing opinions with respect to the established church, and the properties possessed by it?—I do not think they were in my time; I have no recollection of it.

Do you think an opinion was entertained amongst all the students that it was a settled object, on the part of all Roman Catholics, to expel, if possible, the present possessors of the church property from their places, and to establish themselves in their stead?—No.

It has been stated to the Commissioners, by a person examined before them, that when he left Maynooth, namely, in the year 1814, it was the practice of the students, when they were congregated in the times of recreation in the fields, to express opinions such as those which he thus describes himself to have entertained:—"I certainly thought at the time I left Maynooth, that any means whereby I could weaken those heretics, who had so unjustly possessed themselves of the church establishment of the country, and reduced to a degraded state that church which I firmly believed to be the mother and mistress of all churches, and out of whose pale there was no salvation, were legitimate; I considered, if there were any possible means whereby I could effect this, it would be meritorious in the eyes of God. And with regard to the obligations of the oath of allegiance, I considered that the Pope's authority was sufficient; or that the authority of a general council, if conveyed to me, could set aside the obligation of an oath; and I considered that if the Pope conveyed to me, through any authority, an intimation that I might violate that oath, I could do it with impunity; and I do believe that the ignorant Roman Catholics of Ireland go further than that, and believe that without any delegation, the priest has the power of absolving them from any oath." Do you believe that such opinions as those were publicly expressed, or generally held at Maynooth when you were there by the students?—I believe they were not.

Could they have been so held, and could such conversations have been frequent, without your knowing of them?—They might, when I was a lecturer; I did not associate with the students.

The question points to the time when you were a student?—At first when I went there politics ran very high, and the conversation very often turned on the rebellion, and becoming members of the United Irish Society; but as to any thing more than that, or any thing looking beyond that, I do not remember any thing else.

Was it the practice, during the time that you were at Maynooth, either as a student or as a professor, that the young men should be limited in their acquaintance to one or two, or a small set; or were they allowed to choose their acquaintance and friends from the body at large?—I think they were allowed in my time to choose their acquaintance amongst the body at large.

Do you speak of both the time when you were a student, and the time when you were a professor?—Yes.

You are not aware of any limitation or restriction in that respect?—I do not recollect any.

Was the circulation of political pamphlets prohibited in the college when you were there?—It was; at least some time, I remember.

Were the students in the habit of getting political pamphlets into the college?—Some were, I believe at times; I cannot speak for all the time I was in college; but I heard it mentioned that pamphlets were prohibited.

Were newspapers prohibited?—I do not recollect that they were.

What check was there upon the introduction of improper books into the college, during the latter period of your residence there?—Only the general prohibition of introducing improper books that I can remember.

Who was to judge whether they were proper or improper books?—The dean was the principal person to inquire into all those things.

Used there not to be a dinner on St. Patrick's day and on Christmas day, which was attended with more than ordinary festivities?—Yes.

Were the students allowed wine on those days?—They were.

Were any toasts drunk upon those occasions of any particular nature?—I remember one toast being given by one person, who was one of the mess which I was in; I do not immediately remember the words, but I know the toast was a rebellious one.

Are you speaking at present of a period so far back as the year 1798?—No.

To what period do you now refer?—It was in the second time I was there; about the year 1801 or 1802.

Was that toast given to your own individual mess, or generally in the hall?—Only in the mess I was in.

Consisting of how many?—Consisting of eight persons.

Was it publicly known in the college?—I never heard a word about it since; I disapproved of the toast, and I believe I spoke of it to one or two of the boys, but I heard nothing more of it.

That was during the time you were a student?—Yes.

Was the toast applauded by those who heard it?—I do not think it was.

Was it drunk with any cordiality by those to whom it was given?—The person who gave the toast, gave it with cordiality.

Was it received with cordiality?—I do not think it was.

Do you recollect any of the professors publishing any books whilst you were in the college?—Mr. Usher published an English grammar after the first time I went to college; and a spelling-book, chiefly for the use of the students; he used also to make money of it by selling it. Paul O'Brien published an Irish grammar.

Were any statutes read regularly in the college during the time you were there?—Every year, I think they were read on one day in the year.

Were the professors bound by any oath to perform their duty as professors?—I do not think they ever were.

Was there a library in the latter time you were there?—Yes, I was librarian for some years.

What limit was there to the use of the library by the students in your time?—They were allowed to go to the library one or two days in a week, at particular hours.

Was that liberty given to all or only to the advanced class?—Only to the advanced class.

Is there any alteration that you think would be an improvement to the college?—I would give fair play to the study of mathematics and of the scriptures, because the study of the mathematics prepares the mind for the study of disputed subjects, and to understand the merits or demerits of the proofs that are given afterwards. When the class of divinity consisted sometimes of one hundred, and other classes of fifty or sixty, or seventy, there were perhaps only ten or twelve, or fourteen in the class of mathematics; I have often thought that was a defect; the year's course of mathematics is the one that goes before the course of divinity, and then when they enter on the course of divinity, that the scriptures should be far less attended to than compilations made by the professors themselves, with a few texts of scripture in them, and that all the time of the students in the two classes of divinity should be taken up with those compilations, so as not to allow them time to read the scriptures, or to compare the texts of scripture they receive in the compilation with the context;—that all their time should be occupied in that manner, I think is not giving religion fair play.

You

You state that when you were first admitted as a curate into the established church, you got about 75*l.* a year; what is the largest income you have ever derived from your situation in the established church?—The largest income I have ever received is what I am receiving at present; I am now receiving all together about 300*l.* a year.

Was there any sentence of suspension or of censure ever issued against you in the Roman Catholic church?—Never that I ever heard of.

The Reverend John Cousins sworn, and Examined.
Tuesday, 14th November 1826.

THE Commissioners understand you were educated at the college of Maynooth?—I was. When did you enter the college?—In October, in the year 1799, about a year and a half after the rebellion.

At that time, about what number of students were in it?—Two hundred was the regulated establishment; I cannot say whether the number was completely full, but it was nearly.

From what diocese were you recommended?—From Ferns, in the county of Wexford.

Into what class were you admitted?—I entered in the first class of humanity, and spent a year there.

Did you go regularly through the house?—I spent six years there, but passed over the class of rhetoric.

How happened it that you passed over that class?—There were very few that read in the class of rhetoric, except such as entered so young that they would not be of age to be ordained at the time they had finished their studies. In general, the young men on entering college commenced at once the first year's philosophy; the usual course was five years.

You are now a member of the church of England?—I am.

Did you continue the whole of the time uninterruptedly in the college, or did you absent yourself at any time?—I continued the whole time, six academical years.

When did you receive your ordination?—I received priest's orders my last year at Maynooth, and deacon's orders the year before, sub-deacon's orders the year before that; all from Dr. Troy.

Upon your leaving Maynooth, where did you go?—To Wexford.

Did you officiate as a priest there?—I continued for some months at my father's, by the directions of Dr. Ryan, who was then the assistant titular bishop of Ferns, and intended me for his own curate, whenever the first vacancy occurred.

Had you ever a parish of your own?—Never.

When did you conform to the established church?—In September 1811.

Will you describe generally what circumstances led to your taking that step?—I had been three years and a half curate of Dr. Ryan, and he had a great regard for me; I spent a great part of my time with him, and we used to talk freely on religious subjects. Dr. Ryan was not favourable to the monastic institutions; there is a jealousy between them and the secular clergy, and from the conversations I had with him upon those subjects, I considered the practices introduced among the laity by the monastic institutions as abuses, and as such I preached against them, thinking that what was condemned in private should not be upheld in public. This gave offence to some of the old Roman Catholics in Enniscorthy, who complained to him of me; he reprimanded me for it, saying that I was too hasty, and ought not to bring forward things of that kind in such a way. This set me on inquiring, and and having a near relative, who was a Protestant of the established church, he procured for me Burnet on the Thirty-nine Articles. I had been reading Dupin's Ecclesiastical History at the same time, and those circumstances led me to a determination of resigning my curacy. I wrote to Dr. Ryan to that purpose, and left Enniscorthy, although at that time I had not made up my mind as to what religious society I would join. My brother and a friend followed me to Dublin, where I had retired from Enniscorthy, and prevailed on me to return to Wexford to my father's house; I remained there upwards of two years, a professing member of the church of Rome, though refusing to act as her public minister or teacher, even when a curacy was offered to me by the Roman Catholic vicar general, at the request of Dr. Ryan. Several circumstances occurred during that period, and particularly a pamphlet that I had published in favour of the Veto, and addressed to Lord Grenville, which convinced me that I was only losing my time there, doing no good to myself or any body else; and that it was quite impossible for me to think of being serviceable amongst the Roman Catholics. I therefore determined fully to quit them; and having come to Dublin, presented myself to the present lord bishop of Kildare, who directed me to receive the sacrament in one of the chapels of Christ Church.

Then, at the time that you quitted Maynooth, you had no intention of abandoning the Roman Catholic religion?—No.

How long did you continue an officiating clergyman?—For three years and a half under Dr. Ryan, and never under any other person.

During that time were you ever subject to any suspension or interdict?—Never, most certainly.

Did you assign any reasons to Dr. Ryan for resigning your curacy?—I did; but do not at this moment recollect what particular reasons I assigned, except that I was generally dissatisfied with the doctrines of the church of Rome, and should decline having any thing more to do with the official duties of a clergyman, and teacher of that church. I have in my possession an official discharge from Dr. Ryan, obtained after I had left him, and declaring that I might be received by any other bishop, and was not subject to any canonical impediment whatever.

How old were you when you were admitted into the college of Maynooth?—I was eighteen I believe.

Did you receive your previous education in the county of Wexford?—In the town of Wexford.

In what seminary?—At a school kept by two friars, who were afterwards in succession titular bishops of Newfoundland.

Were there many boys at that seminary?—I think between twenty and thirty.

Are you at all acquainted with the system of instruction in any foreign Roman Catholic university?—No, I cannot say that I am.

Have you any means of judging whether the system of instruction at Maynooth differs from it materially, or whether it is either better or worse than that pursued in the foreign universities?—I have no means of forming any comparison between them, except this; I have met clergymen who were educated in the Spanish universities, and had obtained degrees there, but they did not appear to be well educated men; the only foreign universities that I have met with well educated Roman Catholic clergymen from, were the Propaganda at Rome, and the Sorbonne at Paris.

Was the system of education at Maynooth efficient, speaking of it generally?—I think it was in my time efficient.

Were the students well treated?—They were generally well treated; once they complained of bad bread, and of partiality in the classes, they even refused to attend class for some days, and wrote to the bishops, the trustees, who assembled some time after, and expelled two or three who were considered to be ringleaders in that business. I think however, that the bishops saw that there were abuses, and we heard no more of them afterwards.

Do you know whether the doctrines taught in Maynooth with regard to the infallibility of the Pope are the same as those taught in the university in France?—I fancy they are; the Maynooth treatise by Dr. Delahogue teaches that it is not contrary to faith, nor can any person be charged with error for saying that the pope is not infallible, even though he should pronounce ex cathedrâ as they call it; and I always understood that the doctors of the Sorbonne where Dr. Delahogue graduated, were obliged to take an oath that they would not teach the infallibility of the pope, before they could be admitted to a doctor's degree.

Does the doctrine taught at Maynooth, which you say is the same as that taught in France, differ from that which you believe to be taught in Rome?—I have conversed with those who were educated in the Propaganda, and they said that there was very little talk about it there, even less than at any other place, but I believe that the Italian universities do teach the infallibility of the Pope. There is a doctrine also taught in the Maynooth treatise, that the Pope is the centre of communion for all christian societies, that is, they never can break with him nor from him. Now although the doctrine of the Pope's infallibility is in some degree set aside in the Maynooth treatise, and the other doctrines taught there pretty nearly those of the Gallican church upon that subject, still as long as the Pope is regarded as the centre of union round which all other christian churches must rally, the doctrine of his infallibility follows of course, as it appears to me, because if the church can never break from him, he must be infallible, or the church may err in adhering to him, and this would arraign the infallibility of the church itself, as maintained by all Roman Catholics, but the doctrine of the Pope's infallibility itself, in the broad meaning of the word, is stated in the way which I have described in the Maynooth treatise.

Is not the doctrine of the Roman Catholic church, with respect to the Pope, or rather the See of Rome, being the centre of unity, this, that you are not to declare yourself in a state of separation from the Pope or the See of Rome, but that you may differ from the Pope with respect to a point on which he speaks, and that if his decision should be against you, an appeal will lie to a general council?—It is not lawful in any case to break communion with the Pope. A case occurred in Buonaparte's time in France which I think will illustrate the subject before us; he had entered into a concordat with the Pope, and by this concordat, he was to nominate the bishops of France, and the Pope to grant institution; but they afterwards disagreed, and when Buonaparte did nominate the bishops, the Pope refused them institution, so that when he was expelled from France, there were twenty-seven sees vacant, and governed by vicars capitular. Now those vicars capitular did not maintain communion with the Pope, for he opposed them, and I have seen in a late document on the power of the Pope, that during Buonaparte's time, he did make an effort to create a schism in France, and to have vicars apostolic for the churches of France, instead of vicars capitular; the one is appointed by the Pope, the other by the chapter of the diocese; the Pope did not succeed, but I rather think that what is called church communion was not maintained between the twenty-seven vicars capitular in Buonaparte's time and the See of Rome, because the Pope did oppose them.

Are you aware of what took place in France upon the celebrated declaration of the French clergy which was prepared by Bossuet?—I have seen it, but have not a distinct remembrance of it now.

Are you aware that at that time the clergy of France distinctly differed from the Pope, and yet all of them maintained spiritual communion with the See of Rome?—Yes; they may differ from him on speculative doctrines, and yet maintain spiritual communion with him; but this case, with regard to the vicars capitular, was quite a different thing; in the church of Rome, the Pope is the source of ecclesiastical power; it emanates from him, he is conceived to be the head.

Is not this the doctrine of the Roman Catholic church, that the Pope is the person who is to grant institution, in order thereby to mark the communion of a bishop with the Roman Catholic church, but that he is bound to grant institution where there is no canonical cause against it, in pursuance of the settled rules or laws of any existing church which has settled rules or laws?—With regard to his being bound, the Italians all deny that he is bound; the French may think that he is, but here was a case in point. With respect to the observation that the granting of investiture is a mark of communion between two churches, the granting of investiture is an acknowledgment on the part of the Pope, that he to whom it is granted is a fit person to fill the See; the granting of investiture is something like what in the early ages of the church were called Letters of Communion, by which one bishop approved of the doctrine of another, and acknowledged him as a christian brother. Now in the case before us, with regard to the vicars capitular, no letters of communion were granted to them, and no investiture was conferred upon them by the Pope, and therefore they were not recognised by him as christian brothers. This circumstance shows the extreme difficulty, if not impossibility of restraining the absolute power of the See of Rome, without breaking from it.

Do you conceive, that for the appointment of a vicar capitular, any communication with the Pope is necessary?—No; but the Pope questioned the powers of the chapters to appoint them by his attempt to create a schism, and name his own vicars; he did not recognise the vicars capitular, and when he attempted to appoint vicars apostolic for the vacant Sees, there was one of the canons in Paris, and only one that supported the Pope's views for a vicar apostolic, instead of a vicar capitular.

Did you take the oath of allegiance during the time you were at Maynooth?—I did.

Did you entertain any doubt at all that that oath under all circumstances was binding upon you?—None whatever; the oath was administered by Mr. Ryan, of Killcock, brother to the titular bishop, whose curate I was.

Did you entertain the opinion that any ecclesiastical superior had power to absolve you from the obligation of that oath?—It is very likely that the subject did not enter my mind at all, for I took the oath shortly after I entered the college. Doctor Flood, the president, said that the penal laws could be enforced against all the Roman Catholic clergy who did not take the oath of allegiance, and under these circumstances he brought Mr. Ryan to administer it: but with regard to oaths and things of that kind, if we look into the theological opinions and doctrines taught in the schools, I think it is not an easy matter to know when an oath is considered to be of obligation, and when it may be done away with. I recollect a practical case upon that subject some years ago: it was Doctor Lanigan, the titular bishop of Ossory: he had made a promise to Major Brien to support the veto, and afterwards withdrew his promise, and said that nine conditions were necessary to make a promise binding, which he enumerated; and in this he followed the views which the casuists of the church of Rome generally set forth to show when a promise should be kept and when it should not. The doctrine with regard to promises applies pretty much with regard to oaths.

Were you ever taught at Maynooth, or did you ever understand that it was taught there, that the oath of allegiance taken to the King was an oath which any ecclesiastical authority could dispense with?—I do not recollect that the question was ever discussed; and as far as my memory serves me, I would almost venture to say that the question in that kind of way never came before us.

Have you any reason to believe that the students generally entertained the opinion that the oath of allegiance was not binding?—I do not think that there was any thing of the kind either entertained or discussed.

The Commissioners understand you to say that in general the doctrines taught with regard to oaths were such as are found in the books?—Such as are found in the books. The book that was read at Maynooth in my time on moral theology was Antoine.

With regard to the oath of allegiance there was no particular allusion to it?—No.

And in your own opinion you thought it was binding upon you?—I did; but at the same time, if my confessor had advised me the contrary, I would have felt myself at ease upon the subject.

You entered Maynooth shortly after the rebellion?—Nearly a year and a half after the rebellion.

At a time when political feelings ran very high?—Very high; and the young men in the college were very much on their guard at the time.

Did your political opinions undergo any change during the time you were at Maynooth, or were they pretty much in the same state when you left as when you entered Maynooth?—Just the same. I was as disaffected going out as coming in. I was a schoolboy in the rebellion of 1798, but would have been fighting with the rebels had I not been confined by my mother.

Were the opinions that prevailed in Maynooth on political subjects pretty much the same at that time as those which prevailed in the Roman Catholic body out of Maynooth?—Nearly the same. The great body of the students, so far as I may judge from those that I conversed with, for we generally kept to our classes, and those of the same class associated together, used to talk of the rebellion of 1798, and dwell with pleasure on the bravery with which the rebels fought; we used to regret the failure of former rebellions in Ireland, and also converse about the possibility of Ireland existing as an independent country, whether she could supply herself with coal, salt, and other things which were brought from England, and those conversations were frequent; but I must observe that there were some in the house, particularly from the north of Ireland, not many certainly, but there were some that showed a very loyal feeling; there was one, an intimate friend of my own—he and I agreed upon every thing but upon that; he was from the county of Cavan.

Was there any thing in the course of instruction at Maynooth which in one way or the other appeared to you to influence the political opinions of the students?—No, I think not; and I rather believe that the system pursued by the Roman Catholic bishops at that time was to keep the clergy as much as possible from politics, and leave the people to act as they pleased in those matters; that is the impression on my mind, and has been so for some time: my reason for drawing that conclusion is, I recollect before the rebellion of 1798 to have heard conversations from those who were the agents of the United Irishmen, and wished to swear in others, and when some Roman Catholics whom I knew from conscientious motives said, “We can have nothing to do with this oath, because we shall be obliged to confess it to the priest, and will not be admitted to the sacrament,” the answer was, that it was not matter of confession at all, and the names of priests were mentioned as authorities for this opinion, that priests should not interfere in politics; those things I recollect distinctly. There is a prayer-book called True Piety, published by Doctor Coppinger, the titular bishop of Cloyne, and I think there is a passage in it that bears me out in the opinion I have formed with regard to the unwillingness of the Roman Catholic priests and bishops to interfere in the politics of their followers; I will read the passage with the permission of the Commissioners—speaking of priests, it says “that clergymen are only men like others, that as such they are liable to error; that they might possibly pervert their authority to bad purposes: all this is certainly true: but though they be of themselves liable to error, and capable of abusing their authority, we have nothing to fear by giving ourselves up to their guidance as long as they preach only the doctrine of the church, and confine their authority to spiritual matters, for which alone it was given. If indeed any clergyman should happen to prove such a traitor to his trust as to deliver a doctrine different from that of the church, (a matter which would immediately spread an alarm,) or if he should be imprudent enough to enforce his authority, which is spiritual, in matters that are merely temporal, every one knows that in the former case he ought, and in the latter he may, be disobeyed.” So I rather think that the system of the Roman Catholic bishops was, that the clergy should keep aloof as much as possible from politics, and let the people take their own way.

You saw nothing in Maynooth that led you to doubt the truth of that opinion?—I do not recollect any thing.

Was the circulation of political tracts on either side encouraged at Maynooth?—They were not allowed to read even newspapers, and no political tracts of any kind were admitted into the house.

Is this prayer-book called “True Piety” in general use amongst Roman Catholics?—In the south of Ireland I believe it is, but I do not know whether it is elsewhere.

You say that you went into Maynooth shortly after the rebellion of 1798; was there not a considerable disturbance that occurred during the time you were there?—Yes, Emmett’s rebellion in 1803.

Did that excite very lively feelings in Maynooth?—No; there were two or three in the house that said they had a previous knowledge of it a few days or perhaps a week before it broke out, and accounted for their knowledge of it thus: that they had seen green uniforms making for the rebel leaders by the tailors of the college; and that they were bound to secrecy at the same time. But the intended rebellion was not generally known in the house till about twelve o’clock of the day on which it broke out; it was Saturday, and the workmen at the college left their work at twelve o’clock. The general feeling then was, that the fact should be communicated to Mr. Ashe, the rector of Maynooth, and a magistrate; and I recollect hearing it said that the president had communicated it to him.

Can you state what was the character of the feeling excited by the intelligence of a rebellion having broken out?—In general the students did not know what the object was, and the feeling that prevailed in the house was, that we might be taken out and forced into the ranks; but there was nothing of system in the house in my time.

Was there any sympathy of feeling with the rebels?—Yes, there certainly was; the whole population of Maynooth rose up; and when the students found that the rebels did not molest the college, and allowed them to pass and repass in security, they became more favourable to the rebels.

What do you mean by “more favourable”?—They seemed to wish that they might succeed; but at first there was only a feeling of apprehension that we might be all forced out into the ranks.

Was not Emmett’s insurrection quelled the very night in which it took place?—The marauding parties remained about Maynooth for four or five days, eating and drinking at the farmers houses, and there was no military party sent to scatter them; they remained for nearly a week in that way.

Are the Commissioners to collect from a former answer you have given, that you consider the population of Maynooth as having partaken in that insurrection, and formed a part of Emmett’s body?—They rose on the same night, and I fancy to co-operate with them, for the mail coach was attacked the next morning in the street passing through Maynooth.

Do you think that any marked change had taken place in the political feelings at Maynooth, between the time of your entering the college and the time of your quitting it?—

I think

I think it was pretty much the same; Emmett's rebellion being put down, and the great rebellion of 1798 being also crushed before I entered. Doctor Flood had adopted measures before the rebellion of 1798 similar to those that were adopted by the lord chancellor in Trinity College; but besides that the French professors in Maynooth were emigrants, and the others, with the exception of two or three, were emigrants from France also; those were men of anti-republican principles, or were considered as such by the students at the time, and those circumstances tended to keep down any tendency to rebellion.

What proportion of the professors were French at that time?—The two professors of philosophy, and one of theology, were Frenchmen, Abbè Darrè, Abbè Delor, and Abbè Delahogue; the others were Irishmen, and had been not only educated in France, but spent a great part of their lives there, some of them twenty, thirty, or forty years, so that they were almost naturalized Frenchmen.

Are the Commissioners to understand that the prevailing feeling of the professors was a feeling adverse to the republican principles of the day?—I think so; and that checked the leaning of the students in that way, who all looked upon the French professors, and Doctor Flood the president, as opposed to those things.

Do you think that the greater part of the students that come to Maynooth are of an age to have formed political opinions before they come there?—They may be of an age to do so, but the greater part of them come from the retired parts of the country, and have very little knowledge upon those subjects; that was the case in my time; but I fancy if the matter was explained to them, they would have been republicans; but they did not see or understand the thing; the great majority of those that did were inclined to republican principles.

With respect to those who came in without understanding those subjects, in what way were their principles affected by continuing in the college under the circumstances you mention?—I cannot well answer that; but I think that they entered into the views of others by conversing with them.

Were any persons expelled during the time you were there for having taken the oath of United Irishmen?—No.

Were there not a number expelled shortly before you entered on that account?—It was before the rebellion of 1798 that they were expelled.

On the 11th of May 1798, it appears by the minute-book, that a number were expelled?—It may have been; it was before my time, and I do not know exactly the date; I heard it spoken of when I was there.

Did you hear what number had been expelled?—I dare say I did, but I do not recollect.

Were there any persons that were considered as belonging to the order of Jesuits amongst the teachers or professors, or superiors, at Maynooth, during the time you were there?—Not in my time.

Was there any connection between the institution during the time you were there and that order?—Clongowes was not founded for many years after I left Maynooth.

Are the Commissioners to infer from your answer, that there is any connection between Clongowes and Maynooth that you know of?—I know of no connection; but I recollect, when I was a boy, hearing that the Jesuits in Ireland had 50,000*l.* vested in the hands of a Mr. Beattie, who was a parish priest in Dublin, and a Mr. Mulcahil, both reputed Jesuits; and this property afterwards passed into the hands of Mr. Kenney, who purchased and established Clongowes out of this fund: but I have thought from circumstances that occurred in Maynooth college in my time, that the Roman Catholic bishops in Ireland have patronized the Jesuits, and probably did wish that a Jesuit college should be established in the neighbourhood to control Maynooth; for when I left college, the students coming out were looked upon with a very jealous eye by the old priests of foreign education. In the first place, all the priests that had been educated in Spain, in Portugal, and in Italy, looked upon the Maynooth students as imbibing the principles of the Gallican church; this was a cause of jealousy, and they endeavoured to cry down their influence; while the feeling of the people seemed to be, that the priests of foreign education were better educated, and were to be more looked up to, because they had travelled. There were other circumstances too which would lead me to conclude, that both the philosophy taught at Maynooth and the theology were regarded with a very jealous eye. There was a professor, Doctor Ferris, very much esteemed and respected by the students as a pious man, and some circumstances connected with his lectures would lead me to conclude that he had a leaning to Jansenism.

You stated that you believed the Roman Catholic bishops in Ireland wished to patronize the Jesuits, will you state your reasons for that opinion?—The Jesuits and Jansenists are two opposite parties; the Jesuits opposed the Jansenists in France, and crushed them there. Maynooth was probably suspected for a leaning to Jansenism in my time, and upon that ground I would conclude that the Roman Catholic bishops might have patronized the Jesuits, and got up the establishment at Clongowes for the purpose of checking that disposition. I was going to mention a circumstance with respect to Mr. Ferris; a question was put to him in class on the merits of saints, and his observation was, that the merits of saints, compared with the merits of Christ, was no more than a drop of water compared with the ocean; he could not have gone further, consistent with the Roman Catholic doctrine, in crying down the merits of saints; and I understand that this is one of the doctrines of the Jansenists. There was also a feeling of regret in the college that the schools of Port Royal, in France, had been put down, and the Jansenist institutions destroyed; the students were also partial to a clergyman charged with Jansenism, Doctor Lanigan. These circumstances have often led me to conclude, that the Roman Catholic bishops in Ireland at that time suspected that there was at Maynooth a leaning to Jansenism, and probably wished to counteract it.

Did you ever hear any thing said by any of the Roman Catholic bishops in Ireland that tended to confirm that conjecture?—I have heard a Roman Catholic bishop say, that the French church went to the very verge of heresy; he had been educated at Salamanca; and I have heard a Maynooth priest charged with Jansenism by a Franciscan friar.

Have you ever known any act done by any Roman Catholic bishop in Ireland which tended to confirm the conjecture you have expressed upon this subject?—Since I left Maynooth college, the lectures which Doctor Delahogue gave have been published by order of the trustees. In my time they were taken in manuscript from the professor's dictation, and it has often occurred to me that the bishops wished to know more distinctly what was taught in the house; for shortly after I left Maynooth, several of the students, some in orders, and some not in orders, manifested principles favourable to the reformation, and many of them joined the established church; and I fancy that those circumstances, together with the jealousy which was previously existing against the Maynooth students, might have produced that resolution on the part of the trustees, that Doctor Delahogue should publish his lectures.

Was there, during the time you were at Maynooth, a society instituted, called the Sodality of the Sacred Heart?—There was no such thing at Maynooth; there was in the county of Wexford, but the Roman Catholic bishop, Doctor Ryan, opposed it.

Are you at all acquainted with its principles?—Nothing more than having seen the book; I recollect the principle upon which Doctor Ryan opposed it was, he considered that to worship or adore any limb or member of the body of Christ was idolatry, because any limb or member of the body was human, although the body of Christ altogether, as united to his divinity, constituted a divine person.

Had you ever any reason to believe that that society was directly or indirectly, or in any manner connected with the Jesuits?—Never; I know nothing of that.

When you were a student at Maynooth, were the doctrines and the works of Jansenius condemned by the teachers?—Yes, they were condemned. On that subject I beg to explain; there were five propositions said to be extracted from the book of Jansenius, and these were condemned; but they who were called Jansenists, while they condemned those five propositions, said that they were not contained in the book, and therefore read the book, though they condemned the propositions.

Was it not taught at Maynooth, that the propositions, being condemned by the church, were not to be received, and that the authority of the church was sufficient to show the sense of the author and his intention in those propositions?—As well as I recollect, that is the doctrine of Doctor Delahogue upon the subject; that the Pope was competent to declare that those doctrines were contained in the book, but I do not think that Doctor Delahogue ever leaned to Jansenism.

Did you mean, in a former answer which you gave, to state that in the Italian universities the infallibility of the Pope was taught as an article of faith?—I fancy it was received as such in the Italian universities, but in what shape or form it was taught, I cannot exactly say; the opinion was certainly entertained and defended by the Italian universities.

You have stated somewhat as to the general feeling that prevailed among the students, at the period which has been referred to, with respect to republicanism, will you state what it was with respect to the Protestants?—As far as I recollect, the feeling of the house at that time was more liberal towards Protestants than since; and I think that so many students from Maynooth having joined the established church, has made the others conclude that they were called upon to show more zeal against Protestantism on that account.

You say that so many of the students have joined the established church; can you form any estimate of what the number may be?—Not exactly, but I know that there were a great many; two or three years after I left Maynooth I heard of ten or fifteen at one time, some in orders, and some not; those who were not in orders betook themselves to secular employments, and those that were, continued in the ministry. The Rev. Mr. Crowley, one of those, was a lecturer in theology, as was also Mr. Sinnott, who though he quitted them, remains still unattached to any church; he is in the county of Wexford.

Can you recollect the general tone of feeling of the students with respect to the established church as a body?—The general wish of course was to make converts from the established church; but as for the idea of attacking the establishment, or destroying it by force, I have stated that I rather think the general system was to keep the clergy as much aloof as possible from politics, so that they might not interfere, but leave it to the laity to act as they pleased.

The question was as to the feeling of the students with respect to the dignitaries of the established church?—I do not recollect any thing particular, either of hostile or of favourable feeling, but there was a very general wish to see Ireland independent of England.

What income did you give up by your conformity to the establishment?—It was not 100*l.* a year; but if I had remained, I should have had a very good chance of being a bishop.

What makes you think so?—The titular bishop, Dr. Ryan, was particularly kind and attentive to me; I was his favourite, and he seemed to wish to train me according to his own views; besides, my standing in the diocese, and my proficiency in Maynooth College, would have entitled me to succeed Dr. Ryan more than the clergyman who at present fills his place.

What

What is the greatest income you have ever had in the established church?—At one time I had a curacy in the county of Cavan, which, together with a chaplaincy, was worth better than 100*l.* a year; and also a non-cure in the diocese of Limerick, which varied from 100*l.* to 150*l.* per annum.

What have you at present in the established church?—My parish is set for 180*l.* Irish; that is something better than 160*l.* of the present currency, and five acres of glebe.

Are you a curate at present?—No, a church has been built on my non-cure.

Did you experience any unpleasantness on the part of your own family, when you quitted the communion of the Roman Catholic church?—At first they were exceedingly violent against me; however after some years, my own family, and those with whom I was most intimate, became more reconciled to me, and have shown themselves friendly; but the great body of my acquaintance have withdrawn from me completely, particularly the priests.

Must it not have cost you a considerable effort to encounter so much unpleasantness?—I have mentioned already, that for upwards of two years after I resigned my curacy, I lived with my friends, and wished to reconcile them to the change in my principles; I knew that it would give them great pain; but seeing that there was no possible chance of succeeding, I took the decisive step, although I suffered much, for I parted with friends who loved me exceedingly; and I had no encouragement, either from the established church, or any other quarter.

You have mentioned a Mr. Sinnott as having been a professor at Maynooth; what was he professor of?—He was a lecturer in theology; the professors got lecturers to assist them, and he was one of them; Mr. Crowly was the other.

Did Mr. Crowly's conformity take place while you were in the house, or afterwards?—A long time after; he was appointed in my time, and lectured in my class.

Examination of
Mr. E. Molony.
23 Nov. 1826.

[It is necessary to state, that the examination of this witness stands in a peculiar situation. Like all the other evidence, it was corrected by the witness in the month of December 1826, but the corrected copy was mislaid, after it had come to the possession of the Commissioners; and on the Commissioners applying to the witness a second time, in May 1827, he represented himself as unable, through illness, to correct it again within the time required. What follows is exactly what appears on the original notes of the shorthand writer, without any correction, save the omission of a few questions and answers relating to the character of absent individuals.]

Mr. Edmund Molony sworn, and Examined.

23d November 1826.

OF what part of Ireland are you a native?—I am from the county of Mayo, a little beyond the town of Ballina.

Were you recommended by the Roman Catholic bishop of that district to be admitted into the college of Maynooth?—Yes, I was strongly recommended.

When did you enter the college?—I left it next February three years, and I had been there three years and a half; I entered in about the year 1819.

Into what class were you admitted?—I was admitted into the first class of humanity.

Did you go through the humanity class?—No, I read one half year's divinity; that is, half an academical year.

What induced you to quit Maynooth so early?—The Rev. Dr. Waldron, the titular bishop of Killala, gave permission to the superiors of the college to deprive me of the place in the college; and, as far as I had reason to conjecture, they solicited his authority to permit them to deprive me of the place in the college.

Was that for any assigned reason?—I cannot well tell what particular reason they had; however, in my interview with the president, when leaving it, he told me the superiors of the college did not think me called to the priesthood, and that therefore they had recommended to my bishop to withdraw me.

They assigned no more distinct cause than that?—They assigned no more distinct cause; I recollect the words were, that my superiors did not think me called to the priesthood, and they had recommended to my bishop to withdraw me from the college.

Was it not natural for you to inquire what reason they had for that opinion?—I told him that I conceived that I was called to the priesthood; "Oh!" said the president, "you told one of your companions that you would not become a priest; had we any idea that you had any intention of becoming a priest, we would not recommend your bishop to withdraw you."

That was in February 1824?—I believe it was.

Did you continue at the college uninterruptedly after your first entering, or were you absent for any time?—I had continued uninterruptedly in the college.

Did you go home at vacations?—No.

Are your parents and relations resident in the county of Mayo?—Yes; one of my parents is dead, and as to my mother, I do not know whether she be dead or alive; I have not had any intercourse with my friends since I left the college, and my mother being in an infirm state of health, I cannot well say whether she is living or dead at present.

Appendix, N^o 45.

Examination of
Mr. E. Molony.
23 Nov. 1825.

Were all your relations Roman Catholics?—They were.

When did you yourself cease to be a Roman Catholic?—In principle, I ceased to be a Roman Catholic twelve months before I left the college, and I had resolved on leaving the college with another young man, who is now out of the college; we both determined on leaving it, and made arrangements for leaving it, and coming to Dublin to read our recantation in Dublin; however the other young man left the college before me, although I agreed with him to leave it at the same time, but I did not find it very convenient to leave the college at the time, and he left it at the time with the intention.

Do you apprehend that it was known at Maynooth to your fellow students, or to your superiors, that you had an intention of conforming to the reformed religion?—Indeed I have some reasons to think it was, for I was in the habit frequently of speaking of the church of Rome to my companions, and of controverting the doctrines of the church of Rome with them, and one of my companions told the president that I would not become a priest; and the president of the college made that a ground, as far as I can conjecture, of removing me from the college; and besides, I had written some articles against the Roman Catholic religion when in the college, a long time before I left it; I had written a little pamphlet of about fourteen or fifteen pages, and I communicated it to a young man who has been since ordained a priest; and I told him that I was resolved to expose the errors, as far as I saw them, of the church of Rome, and to give a particular account of the discipline of the college; and said I, “there is no more favourable opportunity of letting the public know the system of the college than by sending it to Sir Harcourt Lees, and I am determined,” said I, “to send it to him, and he will give it publicity;” and likewise I have another reason for imagining that they did suspect me; for when leaving it, I had an interview with the present titular bishop of Killala, Dr. Mac Hale, and he said to me, “I hope you are grounded in your religious principles, and that you will retain them, though you are leaving this college.”

Was he one of the professors of the college at the time?—Yes, he was, and I suspected from that, that he had some idea of it.

His expression of that hope, that you would retain your religious principles, you think was founded on a doubt whether you would do so?—I should think so; he likewise said to me, “You have not gone to communion for a long time, for half a year or more; and though this is a matter which should be left between the confessor and the penitent, and which of course you may reconcile to your own conscience with your confessor, still it appeared odd and strange in the eyes of your superiors; and this,” said he, “they considered unfavourable in you.”

Were you at any time under censure for improper behaviour in the college?—Never.

Were you in good health during the time you were in the college?—No, I was not; I was in an infirm state of health for a considerable time.

So as to be unable to attend the college duties?—Yes, I was.

Were you confined to your room?—Not precisely to my room; I went to the infirmary of the college, and I was there for some days; indeed I should think for some weeks; I was very infirm at the time, and could not well attend the studies.

For what length of time were you in an infirm state of health before your quitting Maynooth?—I was unwell at intervals for the two last years I was in the college; I got lumps in my throat, and I was about a month or two in the infirmary, as far as I can recollect; and again, I got a pain in my ear, I believe, about twelve months after, and I scarcely could hear any thing at all; and that detained me, I think, about three or four weeks in the infirmary of the college.

What medical person attended you when you were in the college?—Dr. Kelly of Maynooth.

How long were you in the infirmary altogether?—I think in all, it was about three months that I was in the infirmary during my time in the college.

Were there other students in the infirmary at the same time with yourself?—Yes, a good many.

Did you mix with them at the time?—Yes.

Have you attached yourself to any particular denomination of Protestants since you left the college?—Yes, I have in a measure identified myself with the seceding body as a communicant among them; however, the rules of the institution in which I am at present, forbid me to identify myself with them; in my labours hereafter, if God spare me to labour, I am to labour as a missionary under the Irish Evangelical Society, in the independent form, if I do not meet with a congregation that will adopt any other form, which I may choose myself; as to my own principles, and as a member of a church, I call myself a seceder; but in my labours under the Irish Evangelical Society, I look upon myself not so, in so far as that I cannot labour as a minister among the seceders, unless I have their permission to leave them, and obtain a congregation that will be inclined to the religion and manner of government of the seceders, and then I may be independent of the Irish Evangelical Society, and be a seceding minister: but in case that does not happen, I must labour under the Irish Evangelical Society in the independent form, or any other form in fact.

Are you a member of the established church?—No.

Are you a Roman Catholic?—No.

Or a Presbyterian?—Yes, I am a seceding Presbyterian.

What do you mean when you speak of the independent form?—I entered the institution where I am now, as a member of the seceding body, but when I go there I am supposed not not to be in any particular way restrained by that body to which I belong as a member, but I am to labour under the Irish Evangelical Society.

Is the Irish Evangelical Society a body of seceders, or a body of independents, or a body of any other, and what description of Christians?—The Irish Evangelical Society, is a society which I believe has been instituted in London, and the governors of it belong to several distinct bodies themselves; there are some of the church of England, I think there are others of the seceding church, there are some Calvinistic Methodists, and there are some Independents.

Is the society held in Manor-street in this city?—It is.

Are you at present lodged in any house?—I am lodged in the academy established by them for the sake of sending missionaries throughout Ireland.

How long have you been in that academy?—I think I entered last October two years.

Is that academy in Dublin?—It is.

Can you inform the Commissioners whether there is any difference in point of doctrine between the independents and the seceders, as far as you have any reason to know?—Except in church discipline I think they are agreed; I am not aware of any doctrinal points on which they differ.

Do you conceive that those persons whom you have called Calvinistic Methodists differ in point of doctrine from the independents and seceders, or merely in church discipline?—I believe they differ only in church discipline.

Has any body taken any pains to inform you upon subjects of religious doctrine in that academy in Manor-street?—Not any particular pains—I merely went there to learn the doctrines of the Bible, as far as I did myself conceive, and was enabled to understand those doctrines, and to listen to the lectures delivered in the academy; I was at liberty to think as I chose.

What lectures are delivered in the academy?—There are theological lectures.

How often are they delivered?—Generally once in the week.

What other lectures are there?—In the classical department chronological lectures are delivered.

At whose expense are you maintained there?—I am maintained in part at the expense of the London Society.

Do you conceive that it is the intention of the persons who maintain you there, that you should be an Independent minister, or what other destination do they propose for you?—I am left at liberty to choose whether to continue to be an Independent minister, or a seceding minister.

Have you as yet made any choice in your own mind?—I have made a choice so far that I am a private member of the seceding church.

You used the expression that if you were spared to labour under this society, you should, become a missionary under it?—With that understanding I entered the society.

If you become a missionary, what will be the nature of your mission?—I am not to establish any particular system of church government while I am under them, unless a congregation chooses me as their pastor, and unless that congregation wished that I should become independent of the Irish Evangelical Society; if so, then they will support me themselves, and whatever system of church discipline I, in union with them, would wish to establish, we are at liberty to establish.

Would it be a mission for the sake of making converts that you would be sent upon?—For preaching the gospel.

To what class of persons?—To any that would wish to hear the gospel.

Should you select as the persons to whom you would preach, those that differ from you, or those that agree with you?—To preach the gospel to all that would hear me at any convenient place.

Would it be at one fixed place, or should you go from place to place?—It may be both.

Would you go in search of a congregation or should you expect a congregation to come in search of you?—Either might be the case; I might be sent to a place where there was a congregation already established, or I might be sent to a place where there was no congregation established, and there attempt to establish a congregation.

Having established that congregation, would you abide by it, or would you move to another place from time to time?—I am entirely directed in that respect by the Irish Evangelical Society.

In point of fact have they not sent several persons of the description you allude to, and established them as Independent ministers in different parts of Ireland?—They sent them forth, but they have not been obliged to be Independent ministers.

Is that the same sort of destination that you consider the society would choose to send you upon, if the choice were to rest with them?—Yes it is, but with this difference, that I might be sent to a place where there was a congregation already established, with a view to increase that congregation, and to preach among them, or I might be sent to a place where there was no congregation at all already established, as has been the case with another person who left our academy not long since.

Do not you think that the plain object of this society is to multiply the number of Independent congregations in Ireland, not however coercing individuals to be Independents, if they do not like it?—The professed object of the society is not to multiply congregations of Independents, or of any other particular denomination; an individual admitted there is not admitted as a member of any particular congregation, but he is a person who comes forward, relinquishing any obligation to his own body, and going to preach the gospel throughout Ireland.

Appendix, N° 45.

Examination of
Mr. E. Molony.
23 Nov. 1826.

Is not that the very definition of an Independent?—I could not say that it is—there are some whose form is independent and who in principle are not Independents.

The commissioners understand you to state that there is only one course of lectures in the academy?—There is one course for all.

Have you any episcopalian students among you?—I could not take upon myself to say that there are any.

Does your lecturer on theology ever talk about the rights of episcopacy?—Certainly, the lectures do not countenance that, although at the same time, I would wish to be understood distinctly to say, that the professed object of the society is not to interfere with any individual's denomination, whatever it may be; a person entering the institution may be a private member of any denomination, but he enters the institution with the object in view of preaching the gospel under the auspices of the Irish Evangelical Society.

You stated that when you were at Maynooth you drew up a small tract which had relation to the discipline of the college—what matters connected with the discipline of the college did you treat of?—The course of studies and the mutual relation between the superiors of the college and the students.

Was there any thing in the course of the studies at Maynooth which you thought capable of improvement, or liable to objection?—I cannot well say whether at that time I did conceive that the studies of the house could be improved, if I except the more particular study of scripture in the college.

Will you explain what you mean by that?—I mean that the study of the scriptures in the college was rather confined.

Are you speaking of that as an opinion that you entertain now, or that you entertained then?—Both now and then; I was of opinion then, and I have been since, that the study of the scriptures is a study comparatively neglected in the college, and which might be enlarged.

Will you state what course of study of the scriptures was pursued by you and the students in the same class with you?—When I entered the college I attended the scripture class twice a week for the two first years, reading the five books of Moses; I think that was all that we had read, during the two first years; then there was an interruption of the scripture class; in my third year I belonged to a class which as far as I recollect did not attend to it, and then I commenced it again in my fourth year, when I was bound to attend a scripture class twice a week, when the professor called on any individual whom he chose in the class to account for any portion of scripture that was appointed for that day.

Was it to the New Testament that your attention was directed?—Yes, it was to the New Testament at that time.

What portion of the New Testament did you go through in those lectures?—I think during the time I was in, that I only went through the first of Corinthians during the half year.

You went through no portion of any one of the gospels?—No.

When you left Maynooth had you read any one of the gospels?—Yes I had; I had read the gospel of John.

What opportunities had you of reading it?—I had an opportunity in the college.

In class?—Not in class, the class business extended no further than what the professor appointed to be read, and all that had been read while I was in the college, during my time in the class of theology, was I think only the first of Corinthians, as far as I can recollect.

How long were you attending in the class?—Full half a year.

If you had not been unwell during part of the time, should you have had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with a larger portion of the New Testament?—I might, if I chose myself to read it, as I did read a part of the New Testament there, the gospel of John.

Did your illness prevent your attending any of the lectures on the New Testament that were delivered to the other students of the class?—Yes, while I was unwell.

Have you any reason to know what portion of the New Testament they went through during that time?—Yes.

What portion was it?—It was only that portion of the first of Corinthians which as far as I can recollect, was the portion that was read while I was there.

Had you a Bible of your own when you were at Maynooth?—I had a Latin Bible.

Had you any English Bible?—No, I, as an individual, had not, but I had recourse to an English Bible.

Was there any difficulty in your obtaining one to read, if you wished to do so?—No there was not any extraordinary difficulty.

Were many of the students possessed of Bibles?—I think in general no more than about six or eight or ten, as far as I can recollect.

Do you mean in your class?—I think I scarcely saw more than about eight or ten Bibles or twelve at furthest—I think I have never seen more than that in the hall of theology on the days when we were waiting for the professor to give his lecture.

Do you mean that there were not above ten or twelve Bibles, or that there were not above ten or twelve New Testaments?—I mean, taking both together.

Were there any New Testaments in the hands of those who had not Bibles?—I cannot say.

When you say that there were ten or twelve Bibles, do you mean that that includes the whole number of copies, either of the New or Old Testament, in the possession of all the students of your class?—Yes.

Do you mean that there were not above ten or twelve Bibles, containing either the Old or or the New Testament, or do you mean that there were not above ten or twelve Bibles containing both the Old and New Testament?—I do not know whether there were any Testaments at all in the house.

Will you state what portion of the New Testament you had read in Maynooth including both public and private study?—I read the Gospel of St. John before I went to the college at all, and I read a portion of the Gospel of Luke, and I read the Epistle to the Romans and the Lamentations of Jeremiah; I think those I had read in private, but in public I had read none but the first of Corinthians.

With regard to the studies at Maynooth, has any other matter suggested itself to your mind as a matter in which any improvement or alteration for the better could be made?—I think the indiscriminate permission and free access to any book that a person chose would be much required.

If persons are to be educated as Roman Catholics, would not you think it right to keep out of the hands of young students books that very much vilify the Roman Catholic religion, and atheistical books, and immoral books?—Immoral books ought certainly.

Would you not say the same with regard to atheistical books?—I think on the principles of Roman Catholics they ought to be read, inasmuch as the objections of atheists are met in the theological department, and therefore it would be necessary for them, in studying theology, to know those objections which they should be inclined to combat.

Is not the library open without limitation to the members of the class of divinity, and are not books of all descriptions pro and contra on controversy to be found there?—I cannot say—I am not conversant with the books in the library, but I think that any book whatsoever may be found there, if I except the atheistical books which are enclosed, and to which there is no access, but however I am inclined to think that were any student seen reading some of those books, he would be censured for it.

What age were you when you entered the college?—I think eighteen or nineteen.

Are the students who enter the college of Maynooth usually as old as that?—Yes, they are usually as old as that.

Had you yourself formed any political opinions before you entered into the college at Maynooth?—Not before I entered the college—I do not recollect that I formed any particular opinions.

Did you imbibe any particular opinions?—I think I did, I may say I did, at least I had strong impressions on my mind regarding political matters when there; I cannot take upon myself to say that before that, I had any forcible opinions whatsoever upon politics, but I had some impressions when there.

Will you describe in what way those impressions were made upon you—was it by conversation with the students, or by instruction from the professors?—Not by any systematic instruction, but it was in consequence of intercourse with the students and sympathising with the Roman Catholics as a body, feeling sorrowful that they were in a degraded state, and I know that my feelings were very strong on that subject when in the college.

Were your feelings upon that subject, which you describe as being very strong when in the college, much the same as those which were entertained by the other students?—Yes, I can say they were the same.

Is there a pervading feeling and impression throughout the college on political subjects?—I may confidently say there is.

Do you think that that feeling is the same, or that it differs either in character or degree from that which pervades the Roman Catholic body in general?—I think that it is the same as that which pervades the Roman Catholics as a body throughout Ireland.

Do you think it is greater in degree?—I think it seems to be more acute there.

To what do you attribute that?—I cannot well say, if not to the want of emancipation.

To what reason do you attribute it being more acute in Maynooth than throughout the whole mass of the Roman Catholic population of Ireland?—I think because in Maynooth they are much more acquainted with the history of Ireland and England, and other matters, than the populace of Ireland generally are, and that they feel more acutely, inasmuch as they are higher in their station in life than the populace of Ireland.

Was there any pains taken by the superiors to instil those opinions in any way into them?—I could not say that there is any pains taken; I never knew them to inculcate those principles; but one thing I may mention as a fact which occurred, which may perhaps illustrate better than I can otherwise do, the sentiments of the superiors. I cannot take upon myself distinctly to tell the sentiments of the superiors of the college, but were I to form a conjecture, I think they are of the same character; I recollect that it came to the turn of a student in the college to deliver a discourse, as is usual with the students in theology, in rotation, and in his discourse, he exhorted them very strongly to oppose the establishment of schools in Ireland, and he made use of very intemperate language against, as far as I recollect, the government of the country. I could not take upon myself to state the words, but the impression left on my mind, and upon the minds of all the rest, was that there was injustice and want of impartiality in the government of the country. I think he exhorted the students to make a determined resistance to the establishment of these schools, and hoped that they would use all possible means for their suppression, and he spoke in such a manner as I recollect made the students afterwards in their private intercourse, one with the other, say, that that was truly an unconstitutional discourse, and it seems as if the same impression had been made upon the minds of the superiors, for in the evening of that day the dean of the college adverted to the circumstance, and when all the students were assembled in the hall to attend a few moments meditation before supper, he said he begged leave to advert to the discourse of that day, which he said was rather intemperate, and was too strong; however, he was inclined to applaud his zeal, which he said was entitled not only to the approbation of the superiors, but of all the students, but that still more caution was necessary, inasmuch as there are many persons inimical, as he said, to the interests of the establishment, who if they heard the circumstance, would endeavour to make it a reason why the Roman Catholics, as a body, would be injured, and he adverted to a circumstance which showed the necessity of caution, and the circumstance was that the institution at Belfast, he knew, had been deprived of a yearly endowment, I think he mentioned of 1,500*l.* a year, in consequence of some unfortunate language on the part of some of the members connected with it, and on that account he said it would be proper that more measured language should be made use of by any students, at the same time that he looked upon the student as highly entitled to approbation for his zeal.

Who was that superior?—The dean of the college.

Were you present at the time?—I was present.

What was the objection urged against the establishment of those schools?—The objection urged against them, I think, was that they considered it an intrusion on the Roman Catholics as a body that schools should be established, and they considered that the establishment of them was improper and unconstitutional.

Did he speak of what are generally called Bible schools?—Yes.

Was the objection taken to the schools that they were calculated to sap the foundations of the Roman Catholic religion, or were they objected to upon the ground of disseminating education generally?—I think the reason was, because he considered that it was for the sake of proselytising the Roman Catholic children.

Do you recollect in what year the occurrence took place that you have just mentioned?—I cannot recollect; I think it was in my second or third year.

How many superiors of the college were present upon the occasion of the discourse?—I cannot well tell.

What was the ordinary habit of the college in that respect?—The ordinary habit was the attendance of both the deans and the vice-president, and very frequently the professors; but at least one or two of the deans would be there, and the vice-president of the college. I think there were three there that day, and other professors too, but I cannot take upon myself to say what number were there, or whether there were any of the acting superiors absent; but I think there were three or four present.

Was the vice-president one?—So far as I recollect, he was.

Are the Commissioners to understand that the dean censured the sentiments expressed by the student, or only his want of caution in expressing them?—He appeared to me to express an objection for want of caution.

Can you state what the sentiments were that were uttered without proper caution?—It was an opposition to the establishment of schools in the country, and he called on the students to active exertions to put down those schools, and requested that they would look upon themselves as persons called upon to guard the Roman Catholics of the kingdom against the contagion, as he called it, of error, and therefore he said they should be looked upon as the guardians of the Roman Catholics, and should look upon themselves as bound to use all possible means for the suppression of those schools.

What want of caution was there in saying that?—I could not give an account of any particular sentence he made use of different from those, but I know that he spoke in a manner against, I think, the constitution of the country, against the government; he spoke of unfairness or something of that description; I could not take upon myself to give a tangible form to the sentiment, but I know it involved something reproachful to the government of the country.

Were the grievances of Ireland ever the subject of conversation among the students during their hours of recreation?—Yes, they have been very much so.

Can you state what was the tone of feeling with respect to them upon such occasions?—The tone of feeling has been that the government is an unjust one, that does not admit them to a participation in the privileges of this kingdom.

Have you heard the connection of the British islands with each other discussed upon any such occasions, in reference to its being advantageous or detrimental to Ireland?—Yes, I have heard them say that the union of both kingdoms has been highly disadvantageous, and I recollect that they expressed their regret that it did take place.

Have you heard any talk as to the practicability of dissolving it?—I cannot well say that I have heard any thing particular regarding an attempt to dissolve it, however I know that some of the students expressed a wish and a hope that they would see Ireland liberated and set free in spite of the English power, and I heard some students, at least one, express himself, that he hoped that Irishmen yet might be the means of liberating this kingdom, and that the United States of America might perhaps be the very means, through the instrumentality of Irishmen going there, who indicate by their going there, that their country is in a state of slavery, and he expressed a wish that the United States of America would liberate Ireland.

Did you ever hear the subject of the separation of the British islands brought into discussion upon those occasions?—Not into any particular discussion; I heard it very often brought forward as a subject of regret, that the union of England and Ireland had taken place, and that it has destroyed this kingdom.

Do you mean the Act of Union that took place?—The union of Parliaments.

Did

Did you ever hear any opinions expressed with regard to the established church?—Yes, I did.

Will you state generally what they are?—That it has been a very tyrannical and intolerant church; unjust in depriving the Roman Catholics, as a body, of monasteries, and of their properties, and so on.

Did you ever hear the question of the resumption of those properties discussed?—I heard no formal discussion regarding them, but I know the feeling was a wish that matters would come about, that they would be again restored.

You speak of monasteries?—Yes, monasteries and churches, and those buildings which they said were taken from their ancestors; they hoped that matters would soon come about that they would be again restored.

What do you mean by matters soon coming about?—They expected that the Roman Catholics as a body would become free to all the privileges of the state, before any length of time.

How was that to induce the restoration of monasteries or churches, and other matters you have spoken of?—They hoped that matters would yet take place, so that it would come about. I could not say whether they looked upon it as a matter that would come about by a restitution, as they considered a restitution in that respect would be only just on the part of the English church, or whether it would come about by violence.

Did you ever hear the subject of violence discussed?—I cannot take upon myself to say that when they expected that matters would come about, whether they considered that it might be the effect of violence, or whether it might be the effect of what they considered a just restitution on the part of England.

Do you state those opinions as being prevalent among the students?—I can take upon myself to say that that was the feeling.

Did you ever hear those opinions at all touched upon by the professors or superiors in the house?—No.

When individual students have maintained the opinions you have expressed, were there any other individual students who used to maintain the contrary opinions?—Not one maintained the contrary.

What were your own opinions upon the subject?—My own opinions at the time were exactly the same as I describe now to have been the sentiments of all the students.

You took the oath of allegiance?—I did.

Did you consider the entertainment of those opinions entirely compatible with that engagement?—I considered that those sentiments were not compatible with the oath of allegiance which I had taken.

How did you endeavour to reconcile them?—I conceived that permission to take that oath of allegiance by no means interfered with my entertaining those sentiments, inasmuch as I was under the impression that it was a matter of right that the Roman Catholics as a body would obtain those privileges, and I considered the oath of allegiance by no means binding, further than the church would determine that I should be bound by this oath.

You have spoken of a permission to take the oath of allegiance; whose permission do you refer to?—The permission of the professors of the college; for there was a student in the college who refused to take the oath, who forfeited his place in the college sooner than take the oath; he considered that it was by no means consistent with his belief of the Roman Catholic doctrines, and he went home and returned again by the recommendation of his bishop, who had told him that it was consistent with his belief of the Roman Catholic principles to take the oath of allegiance.

Did it end in his taking it?—I believe he did take it afterwards, after spending some time at home.

Are the Commissioners to understand that you did not consider it inconsistent with the oath of allegiance to wish for Catholic emancipation?—I did not think it inconsistent.

Did you consider that there was any thing which you swore in that oath, when you swore to obey the King, and so forth, that was improper?—As a Roman Catholic I thought it was repugnant to my feelings to take the oath.

What was the part of the oath that was repugnant to your feelings?—The swearing allegiance; inasmuch as I was unwilling to be bound to the English government at the time, and I know it was likewise the feeling of others in the college at the time; I know that it was a matter of inquiry afterwards with them how it was possible that it was consistent with their principles as Roman Catholics to take such an oath, and I heard some of them say, that they did not know what the oath was; I heard others say, that they did not take it at all, because they did not lay their hand on the book, or express the words according to the form delivered.

You took the oath yourself, did you not?—I did.

Did you consider yourself bound by the oath or not?—I conceived myself bound by the oath, but in fact I was not well acquainted with the articles of the oath at the time.

You state that you were unwilling to bind yourself to allegiance to the British government?—Yes.

But when you took the oath, did you not consider that you had bound yourself to allegiance to the British government?—When I took the oath I conceived that I bound myself, but I conceived that that oath might be dispensed with by the dispensing power.

Do you recollect the oath that you took?—I recollect some parts of it.

Do you recollect that it contained a distinct clause, in which you declare, before God, that you do not believe that you can be absolved from the obligation of that engagement by any dispensing power?—I do; and that formed a subject of controversy among the students; it made them doubt whether the Pope could absolve them, and whether he had the dispensing power.

You declared in the oath solemnly before God, that you did not believe that the Pope had the dispensing power; did you make that declaration, believing at the time that he had the dispensing power?—Yes, I did; I believed that the Pope had the dispensing power; and that was a matter which I found it afterwards impossible to reconcile, and which the other students found it likewise impossible to reconcile.

Did you think the oath binding upon you till you should be absolved from it by the Pope?—Yes, I was persuaded it was binding upon me, unless absolved by the Pope, and I believed that the Pope had a dispensing power, and I found it difficult to know how I could swear that. I was not aware of that clause, or what the articles of allegiance were, before I took them; it struck all the students with astonishment how they could believe in the Pope's dispensing power, and yet take that oath.

Did you think that the Pope could dispense with the declaration, as well as the oath?—I certainly believed that the Pope could dispense with it; and I recollect that when the matter was controverted and spoken of by the students, the historical fact of the case of king John was brought forward as a matter, which some used as an argument, to prove that the Pope could dispense even with allegiance, and they wanted to know how they could possibly take that clause in the oath which said, that they did not believe the Pope to have the dispensing power; it came upon the students suddenly; when they came to the court-house they did not know what the articles of the oath were; however, they took the articles of the oath, and I as an individual took the oath at the time, listening to the declarations, and I thought it very strange.

Had you any copy of the oath in the college, or did you hear it for the first time when it was read in court?—I heard it for the first time there.

When you heard it for the first time in court, were you not aware that it was an oath sanctioned by the college?—Yes, I was aware that it was an oath sanctioned by the college.

Did you believe that the college would sanction you in solemnly declaring before God, that you did not believe that the Pope could dispense from that oath, if in point of fact it was the doctrine of the college that he could dispense from that oath?—The college took no particular pains to inform me what the articles of the oath were, nor did they advert at all to the fact of the Pope's dispensing power in this oath; but all the students were brought out of the college to the court-house to take the oath, and I as an individual went and took the oath; but I did believe the Pope to have the dispensing power, and I found it impossible to reconcile the oath with that.

Did you ever state your difficulty upon that subject to any Roman Catholic clergyman?—No, I did not, as far as I can recollect.

Did you believe that the Pope had the power, or that any authority had the power to allow you to take a false oath?—I certainly did not believe that I could take a false oath; my conscience could not find itself enabled to reconcile the fact of taking a false oath with the dispensing power; but I did believe the dispensing power in the Pope, and I knew it was wrong to take a false oath.

Did you take this oath at the time you came into the college?—Yes.

Did you come into the college with the belief that the Pope had the dispensing power?—I did.

Where did you learn that doctrine?—In fact from my youth up I learned that the Pope could dispense, or that even a priest could dispense.

Have you ever learned the catechism in the Roman Catholic church?—Yes.

Is any such principle taught in the Roman Catholic church, as that the Pope can dispense with the oath of allegiance taken to the King?—I do not recollect that it is formally taught.

Is not the contrary distinctly taught?—I think the contrary is certainly distinctly taught, but at the same time I did believe, not only in the Pope's, but in the priest's dispensing power from an oath.

From an oath of allegiance taken to the King?—In fact I believed a dispensing power, a power of forgiveness in the priest of whatever sin I might commit; and I believed the Pope to have a dispensing power.

What do you mean by a dispensing power?—That he could rescue me from an obligation under which I might at any time have laid myself.

To any body?—Certainly, I think so; I laboured under that impression.

Is not this one of the principles of the Roman Catholic religion, and distinctly and expressly laid down in a common-prayer book in use amongst Roman Catholics: "If a general council, much less a papal consistory, should presume to depose a king, and to absolve his subjects from their allegiance, no Catholic could be bound to submit to such a decree?"—That is in the book, but that has, on the other hand, been conceived to meet with a contradiction in the fact of the Pope dispensing king John's subjects.

Appendix, N° 46.

Mr. Edmund Molony, called in, and further Examined.

Friday, 24th November 1826.

AS the oath of allegiance which you took as a Roman Catholic, and to which a preceding part of your evidence referred, contained a declaration in these words, "I do solemnly, in the presence of God, and of his only Son Jesus Christ my Redeemer, profess, testify and declare, that I do make this declaration, and every part thereof, in the plain and ordinary sense of the words of this oath, without any evasion, equivocation or mental reservation whatever, and without any dispensation already granted by the Pope, or any authority of the See of Rome, or any person whatever, and without thinking that I am or can be acquitted before God or man, or absolved of this declaration, or any part thereof, although the Pope or any other person or persons, or authority whatsoever shall dispense with or annul the same, or declare that it was null and void from the beginning;" and as you have told the Commissioners that at the time when you made that solemn declaration, and called Almighty God and his only Son Jesus Christ, your Redeemer, to witness your sincerity, that you did hold the belief which you so abjured, will you now state to the Commissioners, whether as a Roman Catholic, you considered yourself at liberty to abjure upon oath, what you believed to be part of the doctrine of the Roman Catholic church, in the expectation that the Pope might absolve you from that oath?—I took the oath, and at the same time I did believe that the Pope could dispense me from it; but I did not take that oath with the hope, or with the wish, that at any time he would dispense me.

Did you consider it lawful for you to swear that you did not believe that the Pope could dispense with the obligation of that oath, although you did believe it at the time?—I certainly could not reconcile that; and, upon that subject I may state, in justice to myself, that it became a subject of after-talk among the students of the college, and some of them said, in a jesting kind of way, after having returned from the court-house, "no person now can absolve you from that oath, you are bound by it, and the Pope himself could not absolve you in this case;" others said "surely we are bound by that oath." However, another came forward, and said, "then, by taking that oath, we say that we do not believe in the Pope's power of dispensing, and how is it possible? has not the Pope the power to dispense?" And then there arose a controversy, and some of them, I recollect, did say, that they were bound by the oath, and that no power could dispense with it; and when the objection was made, that the Pope according to that oath had no power of dispensing, and how was it possible that they could take the oath in consistency with the belief that he could dispense, they said, that that as a particular oath was binding, but still, in taking the oath, they supposed that it excluded a belief of the Pope's power of dispensing, and they really could not easily reconcile it; and some adverted to the fact of the Pope's dispensing with the oath of allegiance taken by the subjects of king John, and said, that the Pope either acted wrong in doing that, or else the Pope could give a dispensation; and some did say, that some of the Popes were tyrannical, and another, I recollect, did say that the times did require it.

Did you believe at the time that the Pope could dispense with the performance of a moral obligation?—I believed at the time, that whatever obligation I bound myself over to, the Pope could certainly dispense with that, in the same way that if I at any time would violate any obligation which I had in any wise contracted, I believed that the priest could get me forgiveness for that. I believed, likewise, that the Pope could dispense from the obligation; and I went on the general historical fact of the Pope giving a dispensation to the subjects of king John, and finding that that had not met with the disapprobation of the Roman Catholics in general, because there were only a few who said that it was wrong, and there were others who said the circumstances of the times required it.

Did you then understand that only a few Roman Catholics denied that the Pope had a right to depose king John?—I believe that the Roman Catholics in general do believe that the Pope could dispense, and as an individual, at that time, I did believe that the Pope could dispense with the obligation which I might contract; for the Pope has frequently dispensed with vows taken by clergymen, and by persons living in monasteries and so on, and I believe that they conceive a vow to be as binding as an oath. My impression is, that they conceive the violation of a vow even greater than that of an oath—I cannot vouch for that as an absolute fact, but I know that impression was on my mind, and still remains on my mind.

Is it not a clear and settled principle laid down in the Roman Catholic books, that the Pope cannot dispense with any oath or obligation to the prejudice of a third person?—It certainly is laid down.

Is not a distinction taken between an oath or a vow taken to the church, and which relates to the church only; and an oath or a vow made or taken to perform a duty to the King, or to perform any contract with a third person?—I do not recollect that that difference is distinctly stated in the catechism.

Is it stated in any of the class books of Maynooth?—I do not recollect. I did not read that part of theology in Maynooth, so far as I recollect.

Examination of
Mr. E. Molony.

Appendix, N° 46.

Examination of
Mr. E. Molony.

24 November 1826.

Is it not laid down in the Roman Catholic catechisms and prayers books, that "If a general Council, much less a Papal Consistory, should presume to depose a king, and to absolve his subjects from their allegiance, no Catholic would be bound to submit to such a decree?"—I think, I recollect that I read that in some of the Roman Catholic books.

Is not this also laid down, "the subjects of the King of England lawfully may, without the least breach of any Catholic principle, renounce upon oath, the teaching or practising the doctrine of deposing kings excommunicated for heresy by any authority whatsoever, as repugnant to the fundamental laws of the nation, as injurious to sovereign power, and as destructive of peace and good government?"—I do not recollect to have read that clause.

Never, while you were a Roman Catholic?—I do not recollect it at present.

Do you recollect any such principle being taught in the Roman Catholic catechisms?—Yes, I think so.

Is it not also taught, that Catholics do not believe that the Pope has any direct or indirect authority over the temporal power or jurisdiction of princes, and that hence, if the Pope should pretend to absolve or dispense with His Majesty's subjects from their allegiance, on account of heresy or schism, such dispensation would be vain and null, and all Catholic subjects, notwithstanding such dispensation or absolution, would be still bound in conscience to defend their king and country at the hazard of their lives and fortunes, as far as Protestants would be bound even against the Pope himself, should he invade the nation?—I do not recollect to have read that in a Catholic book, in that distinct form; but I think it is a controverted point with them, whether the Pope has authority over the temporal power of princes. I have received that impression that it is so, and I believe that some of the cardinals even undertook to prove that the Pope has, and that it is a matter of controversy.

Do you know that the Roman Catholics, by the oath of allegiance which you yourself took, and which is taken in general by the Roman Catholics of Ireland, declare this; "I further declare, that it is no article of my faith, and I do renounce, reject, and abjure the opinion, that princes excommunicated by the Pope and Council, or by any authority of the See of Rome, or by any authority whatsoever, may be deposed or murdered by their subjects, or by any person whatsoever;" are you not aware that that oath is taken by the whole body of the Roman Catholics of these countries?—I cannot take upon myself to say that I have read that; that is the doctrine of the church; but I think it is a doctrine taught in the church. I think they do believe that they are not at liberty to murder a person who is excommunicated.

What is their belief as to their right to depose the King, if the Pope were to excommunicate him—you observe, that it is distinctly sworn, that it is unlawful to depose a king who might be excommunicated by the Pope—do you believe that the Roman Catholics hold the opinion which is abjured in that oath?—No; I believe they hold the opinion according to the declaration.

Did you hold that opinion when you took the oath?—Yes; I held the opinion undoubtedly at the time. I took the oath that I did not look upon it as lawful to murder a king that would be excommunicated.

You observe that the oath is not merely that it is not lawful to murder; the oath is, that it is not lawful to murder or depose?—I held the opinion certainly, that a prince excommunicated by the Pope, should not be deposed by his subjects, or any person whatsoever.

The same oath declares as follows; "I do promise, that I will not hold, maintain or abet any such opinion;" referring to the opinion last mentioned, or any other opinion contrary to what is expressed in this declaration, "and I do declare, that I do not believe that the Pope of Rome or any other foreign prince, prelate, state or potentate, hath, or ought to have, any temporal or civil jurisdiction, power, superiority or pre-eminence within this realm." Did you hold the opinion so expressed in that oath?—Perhaps it is necessary to say, that when I was taking this oath, I was hurried out along with the other students without knowing what I was going to take; but I thought that when I was going to take the oath, I was doing what was consistent with me as a Roman Catholic, and in taking the oath, it was read over so very speedily, that I could not positively say that I knew, and in fact I did not know, by what articles I was bound; among the other students at the time it was a matter of inquiry what the oath was, and some said they did not know what the oath was at all.

You say it was read in a hurried manner, by whom was it read?—It was read over I think by the clerk, and I had not an opportunity of knowing what it was; when I went out, I had an implicit faith that what I was doing was consistent with my belief, and that likewise I was sincerely binding myself to whatever I was going to do at the time, and I was convinced that I was under an obligation to abide by it; but I did not dwell upon the articles so that I could say what I was bound by, after I left the court house.

Do you believe that the Roman Catholics hold that the Pope has, or ought to have, any temporal or civil jurisdiction, power, superiority or pre-eminence, directly or indirectly within this realm?—I certainly could not take upon myself to give a direct answer to that, for I do not understand distinctly what is meant by temporal or civil jurisdiction, directly or indirectly; I cannot say exactly what kind of authority it may embrace, and therefore I am not fully able to give an answer to that.

Do you believe that any Roman Catholic, who is an honest man, would swear, that he did not believe that the Pope has civil or temporal jurisdiction, thinking at the time that he he had?—No honest Roman Catholic would do it; of course, if he were honest, he would not do it.

Do you think that any Roman Catholic who is an honest man could swear, that he did not believe that the Pope could dispense with his oath, if at the same time he thought he could dispense with it?—I certainly think it would not be honesty. In reality, I know it is not consistent with real truth in itself to swear it; but I know that for myself, as an individual, I swore to that oath, that the Pope could not dispense with me, and at the same time, I found myself under an embarrassment, and others likewise found themselves under a similar embarrassment, to know how far we could take that oath consistently with the Pope's power of dispensing, because either we should believe that the Pope had no power of dispensing at all, or else we could not take that oath in justice. I found myself unable to reconcile it, and I attended to the discussion of others upon the subject, who said that they could not see how it could be the case.

The declaration of the oath is not that the Pope has no power of dispensing in any case, but the declaration of the oath is, that he has no power of dispensing with that particular oath. Do you believe that Roman Catholics who make that declaration, do believe that he could dispense with that oath?—I think in strict truth it could not be sworn to; but really I think a Roman Catholic would swear it, and perhaps not see the inconsistency of it, if they were told as we, the students of the Roman Catholic college at the time were told, that they could take it consistently with their belief. I think they would take it, and it is in the same manner that I myself took that oath. I certainly found it impossible to see how far I could take it consistently, and at the same time I believed, that the Professors of the Roman Catholic college would not bring me forward, or any others, to take that oath, unless we could take it in truth; but still I could not get over the difficulty. I could not take upon myself to say, that that oath was inconsistent with my principles, as a Roman Catholic. In truth, it was inconsistent; but as a Roman Catholic, I certainly conceived that I could take it, when ordered to take it, and when told that it was in direct consistency with the principles of the church; at the same time I held the belief, when taking that oath, that the Pope had the general power of dispensing; I was not fully aware of the extent of his power, but I was persuaded that in any thing in which he would dispense with me, he had that power of dispensing, and I did not know whether he would extend it to that oath.

Did you understand that according to the doctrine of the Roman Catholic church, the Pope has an unlimited power of dispensing with any oath or any obligation which a man may take or contract?—I believed that whatever the Pope would dispense in, I could be absolved in that, whatever it would be.

Supposing you borrowed a sum of money from a man, and you took an oath to pay him, did you believe that the Pope could dispense with that oath?—I did not see how he could do it; I believed that I was under a moral obligation of standing to that engagement, but if the Pope had given me a dispensation, I would have believed that he had the power to give it.

Are you aware that the Roman Catholics of these countries formerly subjected themselves to the whole weight of the old penal laws, some of which amounted to the punishment of death, and that they now submit to various civil disabilities, rather than take what is called the oath of supremacy?—Yes, I was always under the impression that they had done so.

If the Roman Catholics believe that they may with safety abjure any particular doctrine of their church, or reject any power of the Pope, trusting to him for a dispensation, how is it, according to your view of the case, that they have submitted to those penalties and disabilities rather than take a false oath?—I cannot tell why they did not; in that case I should think they would look upon it as a renunciation of their religion, and that by doing that, they would look upon their religious character as completely destroyed; I could not say what would make them refuse to take the oath, except that; but I do not charge them with willingly taking a wrong oath—I would not wish to be understood to say that they would go and take an oath with a view to violate it.

If they would abjure any one principle of their religion upon oath, might they not as well abjure any other?—I do not say that they abjure any principle of their religion.

If a Roman Catholic would not abjure the spiritual power of the Pope, because that would be abjuring his religion, does it not follow, that if the temporal power of the Pope was an article of his religion, a Roman Catholic could not abjure that without abjuring his religion?—I did not say that the temporal power of the Pope was an article of their religion, but I merely say that I believe it is a controverted question among the Roman Catholic divines, whether the Pope has a temporal power over princes or not. I have been always under the impression that some divines have defended it, and that even to satisfaction.

Is it not taught at Maynooth, that the Pope has no civil or temporal power within this realm?—The manner of their allegiance to the King was not defined by the professors at any period while I was there, that I recollect.

Do you mean that the professors at Maynooth did not teach any thing upon the question, whether the Pope has a right to interfere directly or indirectly in civil or temporal matters within this realm?—I do not recollect that they said any thing to the students, that would enable me to say whether they taught so or not, but when we went to take the oath of allegiance, it was told us that we were to take the oath of allegiance, and as far as I recollect, it was remarked that we could take it in consistency with our creed as Roman Catholics, but I cannot take upon myself to say, that they at any time expressly told us that the Pope has no temporal jurisdiction.

How long were you at Maynooth?—Three years and a-half.

Appendix, N^o 46.Examination of
Mr. E. Molony,
24 November 1826.

Did you never during that period, hear whether it was or was not a principle taught at Maynooth, that the Pope had not any right to interfere in matters of a civil or temporal nature, directly or indirectly, within this realm?—I really could not say whether it was taught there or not.

In what class were you at the time that you left the house?—I was in the theology class.

Were you supplied with the "Tractatus de Ecclesia," as a member of that class?—I only spent one half year in that class, and the course of theology, that year, did not take in that subject.

Do you know the book called the "Tractatus de Ecclesiâ"?—I did not read any portion of the Tractatus de Ecclesiâ; I only read a part of the Tractatus de Religione, and some casuistic theology, the Tractatus de Restitutione.

Who was the lecturer in dogmatic theology when you were at Maynooth?—Dr. M^r Hale.

Did you ever attend his lectures?—Yes.

For how long a time?—From the commencement of the academical year in September, till Christmas.

Did he not lecture from a work called the Tractatus de Ecclesiâ?—I do not think he did at that period.

Did you ever hear of such a work?—Yes, I know it is read in the college; I do not recollect that it was read in the class while I was in it.

Is not every member of that class required to be in possession of a copy of that work?—They are, if they remain till the period at which those tracts are wanted; but when I entered, persons provided their own tracts, and they supplied themselves with the tracts, either altogether or according as they required them; and afterwards, before I left the house, it was made a rule that they should lay down so much money on entrance, and be furnished with the class books while in the college, I believe, in order to prevent persons from being without those tracts when leaving the college; I understood that was the intent of it, but I did not come under that rule, so that I was not furnished with those tracts at the time.

Did you ever see the Tract de Ecclesiâ before, a copy of which is now shown to you?—I have seen a tract similar to this.

Is not that book in common use in the college?—Yes, it is read, when the time for reading it comes round; it was not read while I was there.

You never heard that Doctor Delahogue in that tract distinctly discusses the question, whether the Pope has any power of a civil or temporal nature within this realm?—I do not recollect whether I heard it or not.

Will you have the goodness to look at page 246 of the Tractatus de Ecclesiâ, and read and translate to the Commissioners the propositions there laid down?—"Christus Petro et ejus successoribus," &c. (reads the passage) "Christ gave no power, direct or indirect to Peter and his successors, or to the church, over the temporalities of Kings, wherefore they never can be deposed by the authority of the keys, even indirectly, or their subjects be dispensed or absolved from the fidelity and obedience due to them."

Did you never know before, that that position was taught at Maynooth?—Certainly, I cannot take upon myself to say that it has been taught, and I could not say that the contrary has not been taught. It did not come in the course of theology which I was reading, that that matter was discussed, so that I cannot know whether it is taught or not. I know that tract is read in the college, but I did not hear that question discussed by the students at class with their professor, so as to know what is the opinion of the professors on it. I am willing to think that they do of course teach that according to the tract, but I cannot swear whether they do or not.

Did you not enter into the College of Maynooth about the year 1820?—I believe so.

Did any circumstances occur which made it necessary for you, before the period when you finally left the college, to withdraw from it, upon the understanding that you were not to return?—The superiors of the college wrote to my bishop, and I cannot tell the substance of what they had written, but my bishop then did withdraw me from the college and give the place to another; I did not know any thing about it at the time, till the very day it occurred, and the president and some of the professors called me up to the President's room, and told me that my bishop had sent another student to the college in my place.

Are you speaking now of the time when you finally withdrew from the college?—Yes.

Did you not withdraw from it at a previous period?—I never left the college till I left it finally.

From the time you originally entered?—Yes; I went to the college a year before I went as a student, to be examined. I was at that time under some nervous feelings, and I did remove home, as an invalid, but I had not been examined or received as a student at the time; I went home till a subsequent year, and then I entered the college.

Did not the college refuse to receive you, when it was proposed that you should return after you had first withdrawn?—I did return afterwards at Easter, and I was two or three days in the college, and was waiting for an examination, and I did not know why the examination had been postponed, and then one of the professors told me, that I was to return home till Midsummer, and that they were to consult further about it, and he told me, at the same time, "You will return here again afterwards I have no doubt, and if you like, I will have you introduced to the President." I told him I had no objection, and so he introduced me to the President, or to some of the professors, and then the President I think spoke in friendly terms to me. I do not recollect what he said to me, or whether he said anything at all regarding my entrance into the college afterwards, but I went home then till after the vacation, and returned again to the college.

Can you state whether in the mean time any communication or correspondence took place place with respect to your admission, between your bishop and the college?—I heard something of it, although I cannot detail the particulars.

You have stated, that before you left the college, you had become sensible that there were errors in the Roman Catholic religion?—Yes, long before.

Had you therefore made up your mind to withdraw from that religion?—I had certainly.

Do you recollect, after you left the college, applying for an introduction to Dr. England, in America, that you might go there and become a priest?—I did even before I left it.

Did you not make that application after you left the college?—Yes, to get a certificate.

Did you apply for that certificate to enable you to become a priest in the Roman Catholic church, being determined at the same time to abandon that church?—Certainly not; I did not sue for it in order to become a priest in the Roman Catholic religion, but when leaving the college I had a conversation with the President. It is always customary for a person leaving the college to get a certificate of his morals while in college, and therefore I found it necessary to go to the President, and I had a conversation with him, and he said to me "Take courage, there is nothing against you, except that your superiors do not deem you called to the priesthood, and" said he, "a person may be very well fitted for any other situation in life, and yet at the same time not be fit for the priesthood; now," said he, "there is nothing to unfit you for any other situation whatever, but your superiors do not think you fit to be a priest." I told him I had nothing in view but to become a priest at the time.

You told him that during this conversation?—Yes; said he, "had I known that that was your intention, I would be sorry that we recommended to your bishop to withdraw you, but I do not think you are called to the priesthood." I told him I was determined on it, "and what do you intend doing" said he; I told him I intended going out to America, and he then gave me a recommendation to Dr. England. It may be necessary for me to specify the reason why I sought for this certificate. I was young at the time of leaving the college; I was resolved to come to Dublin and to forsake the errors of the church of Rome, and I thought a recommendation would be necessary for me, and I was fearful that if I did not say I was to become a priest, the President might refuse the recommendation, and in order to that, I got the recommendation from the President, because I thought that any body of Christians to whom I might introduce myself would perhaps disbelieve me in anything I might say regarding Maynooth College, and might suppose that I had been disgracefully expelled from the college, and that I had done something scandalous, and that perhaps they would not believe that I had left it on any grounds except dishonourable ones, and I therefore thought it necessary to get this testimonial. I know that in what I did, there was a want of proper and full decision, but at the same time I did get it, in order to have a testimonial of good conduct from the President.

Did you think you were acting as an honest man in going to the President, and inducing him to give you that testimonial?—No, I acted wrongly in doing so; I certainly did not act with proper honesty in the case.

Did not the President give you a letter to Dr. England?—He did.

Did he not in that letter state, that provided you underwent a probation of seven years, it might then be proper to admit you to the Roman Catholic priesthood, but not otherwise?—I believe not.

What did you do with the letter which he gave you?—I tore it up after showing it to some persons in Dublin, and they told me to keep that letter; they said it might be of use to me hereafter, if my character was called in question; but I was rather careless of it, and I really tore the letter up.

Will you recollect and state, whether Dr. Crotty did not in that letter distinctly state, that you might be admitted to the Roman Catholic priesthood, but that it would not be right to do so, unless you underwent a probation of seven years?—I do not recollect that seven years was mentioned at all.

Did he give you any letter to Dr. England in which he stated that?—As far as I recollect, this was the substance of the letter: he said that I, who came from such a diocese, namely, Killala, had been removed from the college, as my superiors did not deem me called to the priesthood, and that they recommended to my bishop to withdraw me. "But," said he, "notwithstanding this" I think I recollect the words, "it seems he is determined to be a priest, and he wishes to be recommended to you;" and then he mentioned how long a time I spent in the college, and, said he, "you may after some time deem him not unworthy of the priesthood." I think those were the words.

Did he not say distinctly seven years?—I believe not; it was out of carelessness that I tore up the recommendation contrary to advice. I did not imagine that it would be necessary at any future period, and he likewise said in concluding the letter, "in the mean time you may avail yourself of his services in your academy."

Did you think it justifiable in you, at the time, to hold out to the President the expectation of your intending to go to America, when you really entertained a different intention? No, I am convinced I acted wrongly.

Did you feel at the time that you were acting wrongly?—I was convinced that there was a want of full decision in the case, but having an intention of leaving the college twelve months before I left it, and having written something regarding the college, and shewn it to a student at the college, by his persuasion I had remained in the college for the twelve months before that.

The Commissioners wish to be informed distinctly, whether at the time you had that conversation with the President, your own mind was fully made up as to whether you would go out to America, or not?—My mind was fully made up not to go.

Appendix, N° 46.

Examination of
Mr. E. Molony,
24 November 1826.

Where did you intend to go?—I intended coming to Dublin; I intended recanting from the errors of the church of Rome long before I left the college.

The question is not as to a time long before that, but as to the precise time when you had that conversation with the President?—At that precise time I must say that it was in order to obtain a recommendation that would shew, that the reasons why I left the college were not dishonourable ones—I thought that without a particular recommendation from the President, it would not be believed that such were the reasons why I left the College of Maynooth.

What use did you intend to make of that recommendation when you sought for it?—I intended it as a proof that I had not been removed from the college on any grounds of improper conduct.

If you had disclosed to the President that it was your intention to leave the Roman Catholic church, did you think that you would obtain that certificate?—My belief is that I would not.

How long had you been in the College of Maynooth before you took the oath of allegiance?—I think it is after Christmas when the sessions are held in Maynooth; I had been there about three or four months.

Was it within the precincts of the college that you took the oath of allegiance?—No, in the Court-house of the town.

At the quarter sessions?—Yes.

Who gave you notice to attend at the Court-house in order to take the oath?—I was a freshman in the college at the time; and as far as I can recollect, I think notice had been given by the monitors that were over us, as freshmen at the time, that we were to go and take the oath of allegiance; and I do not know whether it was the night before we took the oath, or whether it was on the morning of that day.

Did any one at Maynooth ever explain to you the nature of that oath before you were taken to the Court-house, in order to subscribe to it?—No.

Did you ever see a copy of it, or did you ever read it previously to your taking it?—Not that I recollect.

How did you make up your own mind before you went to the sessions-house, as to whether you might safely take that oath or not?—I did not know a single clause in the oath at the time I was going there.

How did you make up your mind as to whether you might safely take that oath or not?—I believed at the time that the professors of the college would not have the students take the oath, unless they deemed it consistent with the church rules; at the time I did not feel any uneasiness about it as being against my creed.

You have a general reliance upon the judgment of the superiors?—Yes.

When you went into the Court-house of Maynooth, will you describe exactly what passed with respect to your taking the oath?—There was, I think, something like a loft where the students all stood up, I think on two sides of the Court-house, and the assistant barrister was in the lower part, and he prefaced the solemnities of the oath by a kind of compliment to the students, saying that they were not to take the oath of allegiance to His Majesty from any distrust that His Majesty had of their loyal principles; and he stated the reason why it was taken. I could not say whether it was because the college was endowed by Parliament or not, or what was the reason; but I know he mentioned that it was not from any distrust whatever of their principles that they were called on to take the oath.

Had you any opportunity of reading the oath upon that occasion before it was administered to you?—I was not offered it, nor do I know any student that saw the oath.

Did you read it, in point of fact, in the Court-house?—No.

Was it read to you?—It was read.

By whom?—By a clerk or by the barrister; I could not say which.

Where were you standing at the time the oath was read to you?—I was standing in one of the lofts.

Was it read more than once?—I cannot say; I think it was read only once, but I am not very certain.

Did you fully understand from that reading the nature and import of the several clauses in the oath?—I could not say that I had a connected view of them. If I had been asked afterwards what the articles were, I could not have told what they were altogether; and I laboured under that embarrassment in common with all the students.

Was there any feeling of complaint among the students upon your return to the college, at not having had an opportunity of fully examining and considering the oath they had taken?—I think there was; some said that it was a queer way to be brought to the Court-house to take the oath without knowing something more about it before they went out; they considered that it was dealing unfairly with them to be called upon to take an oath that they did not see before. I know there was a great bustle about it after they returned home, some saying that they did not know what the oath was, and others saying that they did not know how they could take it in conscience.

In the mean time they had taken it, in point of fact?—They had, and they were unable to see how they could reconcile the oath with the doctrine of the church, regarding the Pope's power of dispensation. I do not know any other point which they doubted about.

What would have been the consequence to any of those students, if they had declined taking the oath, when they were standing on the loft?—I cannot tell.

Can you say whether they would have been permitted to remain at Maynooth?—I cannot tell; tell; I know that some of them made it a point to go home in the vacation at Christmas' in order to evade the oath; and I recollect that some of them said, that by that means they would evade it during their term in the college.

How did those persons become acquainted with the oath before it was taken?—They knew that the oath was to be taken.

Did they know the contents of it?—I cannot well say; I did not know them for my part.

Could the persons of whom you are now speaking have felt objections to the oath, if they had not by some means become acquainted with the oath?—I cannot say what their motive might be.

When you took the oath, notwithstanding the difficulty you have referred to, did you then, or do you now, consider that you were committing what you knew and felt to be a deliberate act of perjury?—No, I did not then conceive that it was an act of perjury; I conceived that I took the oath in sincerity, and I felt myself bound by the oath, but at the same time, as I have mentioned already, it was questioned how far we could take it in conscience, and some I know asked how was it possible that as clergymen, they could possibly do it at all; they said it required many things of them which would make them something like common informers.

Appendix, N° 47.

Tuesday, 28th November 1826.

YOU are Roman Catholic bishop of Down and Connor?—I am.

The Commissioners understand that at one time you held the situation of professor at Maynooth?—Yes.

Were you also educated in the College of Maynooth?—I was.

What chair did you fill?—The chair of logic, metaphysics, and ethics.

For what length of time?—I commenced first as junior lecturer, and I afterwards became full professor. I was about three years in each department, but still teaching the same class.

Did any interval occur between your leaving the college as a student, and your being there as a professor?—No; I was appointed professor at the same time that I was ordained priest.

From what diocese were you originally recommended to the college as a student?—From the diocese of Down.

At what age did you enter the college?—At the age of twenty-one.

Into what class were you admitted first?—I entered into the class called the Class of Humanity.

The first or the second class of humanity?—There was not a second class of humanity at that time; there was a class of rhetoric; I entered in the class of humanity, because the season was far advanced before I received my appointment for the college. I entered late in November, and the classes were so far advanced, that I could not conveniently enter into any one except the class of humanity, at that period.

In what year did you enter the college?—In the year 1801.

What length of time did you continue there as a student?—I continued there as a student till 1806, and I remained as professor till I left the college in 1812.

Where did you receive your education previously to going to Maynooth?—In the diocese where I was born. I received my education at a school in the parish of Down, and partly in the town of Downpatrick.

Was it a Roman Catholic seminary?—It was a mixed school; the masters were Roman Catholics, but persons of every communion attended.

Were you a boarder at that school?—No, there were no boarders received at the school; it was convenient enough for me to board at my father's house.

Can you recollect what degree of proficiency you had attained before you entered the College of Maynooth?—I went through the ordinary course of Latin authors that were taught in the school, and I had acquired some knowledge of Greek.

Do you think that the pecuniary advantage which the students of Maynooth derive from the parliamentary grant, in rendering their education there cheaper than it otherwise would be, has had a tendency to throw the priesthood into the hands of a lower class of persons than formerly went into it?—I think that the priesthood of the present time are taken from a class of Catholics at least as respectable as that from which their predecessors came, perhaps more respectable. Although it would not be an easy matter, without having taken a general view of the priesthood of the two generations, to draw the line of discrimination with accuracy; yet as far as I can judge, I think the present members of the priesthood are at least as respectable, perhaps more so, than those of the former generation.

Speaking of the priesthood generally, do you think that they are better educated than they were before Maynooth College was established?—I think they are much better. In the first place, they are better acquainted with the language of their own country than those who studied abroad; and as all explanations on difficult subjects in the college can be given occasionally in the English language, I think that those who study in Maynooth are better acquainted acquainted with theology and philosophy than those who come from colleges on the continent. I have an opportunity of knowing clergymen who came both from foreign colleges and from the College of Maynooth; and if I might institute a comparison, I should be decidedly of opinion, that the clergymen educated in Maynooth are much better informed; that they are better theologians; better philosophers, and better prepared for the instruction of the people in general.

In the course of your progress through the college, did you pass through the mathematical class?—No, I was sick during the year I read logic, and was sixteen weeks in Dublin in consequence of bad health. I was obliged to return home to recover my health, and when I returned, the class of natural philosophy was so far advanced, that I could not join it; but I read that course after I had finished my course as a student, when I became a junior professor in the college.

Will you have the goodness to state, whether from the experience you had in the college, both as a student and as professor, you think that the instruction given in that class is effective, or whether in your opinion any means could be taken to render it more so?—I think the instruction given in that class is quite sufficient for any clergyman, at least for any man not deficient in natural abilities.

Is not the time that the students pass in that class so short, as to render it extremely unlikely, that any young man of average talent could keep pace with the subject matter that is intended to be comprehended in it?—It is true that they begin with the elements of arithmetic, but generally speaking, they are all prepared on that subject before they come to college; the consequence is, that they get through those elementary branches nearly in one week or two, as they are only required to study those in order to give them better principles of arithmetic than they could acquire in the common schools of Ireland; and after that, they proceed to the more important branches of mathematics which they are well enough prepared to understand; they seldom study the more difficult branches, but they acquire a sufficient knowledge of algebra, geometry, conic sections, and trigonometry; and they terminate the course, generally speaking, with astronomy; the principal questions of this science are clearly explained by the professor, and sufficiently understood by the students. As far as I could judge during the eleven years I spent in Maynooth, those of average abilities were pretty well acquainted with all those subjects.

Is it your opinion that the instruction acquired by the students in that class, is quite adequate to their wants and their future position in life?—I should think so.

Do you think it desirable that a greater length of time should be devoted to the study of mathematics?—I do not think it necessary, as I am convinced that a priest who attends to the religious instruction of his flock, will not have much time to spare for mathematical pursuits.

What was the practice of the college, during the time you were a student there, with regard to the instruction given either in the Old or New Testament?—I commenced my studies there when Doctor Flood was our President, and he obliged every one in the college to commit to memory a certain portion of the New Testament every week; we were called in every Saturday to show that we had attended properly to that duty; and he spent about an hour in explaining the difficult parts of the Scripture we had thus committed to memory, or other parts to which he might direct our attention; that was the common course during his time. After Doctor Flood, Doctor Dunn became our President, he was not I believe so deeply conversant with theological matters, or at least he was not equal to Doctor Flood in his explanations; the reading of the Scripture and the explanation of it of course was not so much attended to, until a professor of Scripture was appointed, and then this department was conducted in a different manner, as there were regular hours for the study and explanation of the sacred Scriptures.

Can you recollect at what time you yourself became possessed of a Bible during the time you were in the college?—Before I went to the college there was a Bible in my father's house, which the whole family had recourse to when they wished to read it; when I went to the college I purchased a Douay Testament, in order that I might have it at my own convenience, to commit to memory the parts pointed out by the President.

Will you state what instruction you received in the Old Testament?—I do not recollect that I received any particular instruction in the Old Testament, because Dr. Flood, about a year after I entered the college, became infirm, and could not continue his explanations, so that he had not time to pass over the entire of the New Testament.

Was the catechism used in the college then the same that is used now?—Yes; the catechism was taught every Sunday; there was a catechism written by Dr. Devereux, and another by Dr. O'Reilly—they were the same in substance; so that it was not considered a matter of any importance whether the one or the other was studied, if we could answer the questions directly according to the Catholic doctrine.

Was there a longer sort of catechism taught called "Christian Doctrine"?—No, I think the two catechisms most used were the catechisms by Dr. O'Reilly and that by Dr. Devereux; but I believe they did not differ in any material point from the "Christian doctrine." I recollect that I read it in the country before I went to college.

Was the Class Book that was lectured from when you were in the theology class, that which was drawn up by Dr. Delahogue?—Yes, it was the same work; we all took dictates from him, which were the same in substance with the work which he afterwards compiled and printed.

His book was not published at that time?—Not when I commenced, nor till after I had finished finished my theology; he commenced printing his treatise on the church, and then proceeded on, as he could spare time, to compile the other treatises.

Was Dr. Delahogue the lecturer at that time?—He was before I entered and after.

At what time did you take the oath of allegiance as a student?—I took it I believe the same year in which I entered the college; I first went to a magistrate in the country before I left home for the purpose of taking that oath, but the magistrate, on examining the statutes, could not find the oath immediately prepared for the students of Maynooth College; and I believe he was at a loss to direct me to any one oath in particular. It was Mr. Savage, a gentleman, who lived near my father's; he sent for his agent, and the agent did point out the oath, but as I found they were in doubt about it, and as I could have an opportunity of taking it at the college, I deferred it till I went to the college; shortly after that period, a magistrate came from Dublin, and all the students who had not taken the oath availed themselves of that opportunity, and I took it among the rest.

Can you recollect what number of students took it at the same time with yourself?—I could not recollect, but I should suppose a great many who entered that same year had not taken that oath of allegiance before they entered.

Will you describe the form in which the oath was taken; did each individual read the oath separately, or was it taken by them collectively?—We were taken to the magistrate four at a time, so that we might suit his convenience—he read the oath distinctly to us; after that we put our hands on the book and swore together.

Did you ever read the oath before you took it, so as to know the subject matter which you were going to swear?—I read it in Mr. Savage's house at the time I have alluded to, when I went to take it in the country before I went to college at all; that was the only opportunity I had of reading it before I went to college; but I had an opportunity of examining the principles of the oath before the time when this magistrate arrived.

Was that opportunity confined to yourself, or was it given to the other students?—I think it was pretty general; there were some parts of the oath explained by a clergyman called O'Leary, and his explanation of parts of the oath was made known to many others as well as to myself, and we considered it very satisfactory.

Was it by Mr. O'Leary himself that the explanation was given?—It was given in a book called O'Leary's tracts.

Was that book put into your hands for the purpose of explaining to you the oath you were about to take?—The book was not put into my hands, but O'Leary's explanation of those parts that I did not understand was mentioned to me.

By whom was it mentioned to you?—I believe Dean Cowan was the person that mentioned it.

Was that with a view to remove any doubts or difficulties on the part of the students?—I should suppose so; there were some parts of the oath that did not seem to be immediately intended for an oath of allegiance; there were some parts requiring us to swear with regard to the power of the Pope and things of that kind, which young men at the age when they generally enter college did not well understand; of course it was necessary to have some explanation given on those points, and O'Leary's explanation was perfectly satisfactory to me, and I believe to the others.

Can you describe at all what O'Leary's book was?—The book was not put into my hands at the time, but I recollect that the object of his explanation on that subject was to shew that the Pope neither possessed, nor ought to possess, any temporal or civil power within this realm, and by stating clearly the extent of the Pope's power as spiritual head of the church, it appeared that he had no right to interfere in our temporal concerns; and it was also plain that such power could not be inferred from any principle of the Catholic doctrine. These illustrations of our belief respecting the temporal power of the Pope, were clear enough to satisfy any reasonable person that he could have no just scruple of conscience in taking the oath, and I had no scruple in taking it afterwards.

Do you know whether any other students at the time had any scruple in taking it?—I do not; what I know with regard to that, is, that those with whom I conversed had no scruple after hearing O'Leary's explanation; and I do not recollect that there was one solitary instance in which any person made an objection when the oath was proposed; I believe they all took the oath without any observation, or without any remark that they found a difficulty in taking it.

Is it within your knowledge, that any individual retained after he had taken the oath, an opinion or impression that any superior authority could absolve him from the obligation of that oath?—I have no recollection of any individual who held that opinion, and I do not believe that any individual in the college entertained any such opinion.

In conversation with the students, previously to their having taken the oath, did you ever hear among them an apprehension or dislike expressed of taking the oath?—I cannot say that I had any conversation with them upon the subject; the Dean announced to us a few days before the magistrate came, that an opportunity would be afforded to all, who had not provided themselves with a certificate of having taken the oath of allegiance, in order that they might perform that duty when he arrived; the only opportunity we had of conversing on that subject was in the hours of recreation from the time when it was announced until the arrival of the magistrate; but I do not recollect that we had any such conversation; perhaps I may have conversed with some on the subject, but being at that time not sufficiently acquainted with the matter, I was not very well prepared to enter into such a discussion. I do not believe there were any discussions of the kind at the time.

Appendix, N^o 47.

Examination of
Right Rev.
28 November 1826.

In the hours of recreation to which you have referred, were the students much in the habit of discussing subjects of that kind?—During the time I was a student, the business of the class was very often discussed in the hours of recreation; there was a very considerable degree of emulation among the students at that period. The President and professors had introduced a system of classification according to merits and abilities, which induced the students frequently, in the recreation hours, to speak on subjects which had been discussed in the class; as far as I recollect, our conversation very often turned upon those things; occasionally those students who came from the same part of the country, met together in the recreation hours, and conversed about their own friends, acquaintances, and former companions at home, but any serious discussion that took place, as far as I recollect, was principally on matters connected with the course of study.

During the time you were at Maynooth, did not the rebellion that was called Emmett's Rebellion, break out?—It did.

Did that excite much feeling in the college?—I did not observe the slightest feeling; for my own part that was the year that I was sick. I came up to Dublin on the day after Christmas, to consult a surgeon; I remained in Dublin, I believe, for sixteen weeks after that without returning; and when I returned to college, I found it necessary to study with more than ordinary attention, in order to make up for the time I had lost during my sickness; the first thing that I heard respecting Emmett's rebellion, was on my way home; I knew nothing of it before that. When I arrived at Dundalk, I was told that unless we proceeded on with very great rapidity we might be apprehended, not being known in that part of the country. I recollect we hastened on to Newry, as I was acquainted with some individuals there, who might be able to give an account of us, in case any person thought proper to call us to account. The first thing I heard was, that the French were supposed to be on the coast, and that there was a great alarm in the country.

You were not at Maynooth at the period of Emmett's rebellion?—No; I went home when the vacation commenced; and I believe the rebellion took place during the time I was at home.

The Commissioners understood you to state, that you were not at Maynooth for sixteen weeks after?—It was in the year that Emmett's rebellion was hatched, that I was sixteen weeks in Dublin; I went to Dublin the day after Christmas, and remained there for sixteen weeks after that. I returned about Easter, and I spent the remaining part of the time, till the studies of that year closed, in the college; and as soon as the vacation commenced, and I had been examined, I then went home along with some other students; and it was on my way home that I heard that the French were on the coast. Emmett's rebellion took place when I was at home in the vacation.

It was not true that the French were on the coast, was it?—I believe not; but that was the report.

How soon after that were you next at Maynooth?—I remained at home till the commencement of Lent afterwards, as I was obliged to have recourse to a medical gentleman when I went home; and I continued in an infirm state of health till the following Lent, and then returned.

Emmett's rebellion was on the 23d of July, how soon after that were you next at Maynooth?—I do not know exactly in what month; but I returned at the commencement of the following Lent.

That must have been eight or nine months after?—I should suppose so.

As you entered the college at the age of twenty-one, it is presumed that you must have formed some political opinions before that time?—I cannot say that I had formed any opinion on politics, as I was at school almost all the time; my attention was directed generally to objects very different from politics.

Did politics form much the subject of conversation at the time you were at Maynooth?—I do not recollect that politics formed the subject of conversation there, nor any thing almost connected with politics, till about the time that the question regarding the veto was agitated; that was the first political subject in which the students took an interest.

Have the goodness to describe, as well as you can, the general character of the political opinions prevalent among the students at Maynooth, during the time you were there?—I have stated already, that I did not know any students distinguished for holding political opinions; and I feel myself at a loss to give any thing like an accurate character of the students in that respect, for I do believe that they did not devote much time to any thing of the sort.

As far as in your opinion, political opinions were entertained at all among the students, did they differ in any degree from those entertained by the Catholic body in general, in Ireland?—I believe, the opinions of the Catholic body were not published so much at that period as they have been since; at least I cannot recollect that they were; but if they were, I do not know that those opinions were at all taken up by the students in the college. I never knew any instance of it during the time I was a student. I do not recollect that we had one student in the college at that time who had assumed a political character.

The question rather refers to political opinions being entertained by the students than to their acting a political part?—Not one of the students to my knowledge made himself remarkable for political knowledge, or communicated his political opinions so as to acquire a political character; I mentioned before that classification had been established; and I believe the students found it no easy matter to succeed in their studies to their own satisfaction; that classification divided the students into six classes, and those who could not not get into the first, endeavoured to be in the second, and so on in gradation; so that I believe they had very little time at that period to devote to political knowledge or political opinions; I know no instance of it, at least during the time I was a student in the college.

What access had you to the library during the time you were a student at the college?—Our access to the library was only on Wednesday and Saturday each week; on other days we were occupied in attending at the classes, and in preparing for them. On Wednesday and part of Saturday, the usual duties of the classes were suspended. I believe, that on Sunday also, occasionally, the library was open, though Sunday was a day of very considerable business, taking into account the explanation of the catechism and our attendance at public worship; but on those two days only, which I have mentioned, we were admitted regularly into the library.

Were you at liberty to study what books you pleased there?—I do not think that there was liberty to study in that vague way; there was liberty, however, to a certain extent. We were allowed to read the works of the fathers of the church, to read works on Scripture history and the English classics. I dare say that some individuals may have abused the liberty and may have read other works. I do not recollect that the boundaries of the permission were properly marked; but I am sure that if the librarian found any one reading an improper work, he would be immediately expelled from the library.

What liberty had the students at that time as to the books they were permitted to possess themselves of for their own private studies?—I do not know exactly what liberty they had in that respect; it was the privilege of the Dean to examine the students rooms, to open every article of furniture that they had in their rooms, to ascertain what books or papers they possessed; and I believe no person could give so accurate an answer to that question as the Dean of the house. I do not recollect exactly what liberty they had in that respect; but I believe they were not allowed to have any book of a suspicious character.

Can you recollect with regard to yourself, whether your studies were confined to the subject matter taught in the class, or whether you had an opportunity of reading books in your own room, so as to acquire a general knowledge?—I recollect that I devoted my time principally to the books of the class; but I had an opportunity of obtaining books from the brother of the librarian, and at that period I devoted a considerable part of my time to read the English classics. We spent a considerable time in taking the dictate; and a dictate taken in that way was not so easily understood as a printed book; so that we were more limited in our time than the students have been since they got the printed treatises.

When you were a student, did you attend the lectures of Dr. Delahogue?—Yes.

Are you acquainted with Dr. Delahogue's Tractatus de Ecclesiâ?—I am.

Were the principles which Dr. Delahogue inculcated in his lectures, the same as are found in that work?—Precisely.

Were those principles generally received and adopted in the college?—Without any exception that I know of—during my time they were received and adopted.

The preceding questions have reference to the principles inculcated by Dr. Delahogue, with regard to the allegiance due to the King, and with regard to the questions as to the deposing power of the Pope, and his right to interfere in matters of a civil or temporal nature, directly or indirectly?—The principles contained in Dr. Delahogue's treatise on those subjects, were discussed in the class and inculcated by him in the strongest terms, and I believe, received with general satisfaction by the students. I never knew a student in the college in my time, who entertained any opinion respecting the Pope's temporal power, or his right to depose kings.

Have you any reason to know or believe, that it was ever in any manner taught or insinuated in the college, or held in the college by any individuals or individual, that the Pope could dispense with the obligation of observing the oath of allegiance?—I do not know one solitary instance in which any individual taught in that college held or holds any such opinion.

Or that he could absolve subjects from their allegiance, or from the observance of the oath of allegiance?—I do not know any instance of that kind; I believe on the contrary, they are clearly convinced that he has no such power.

Was the book you lectured from as professor of logic, the same that is in use in the college now?—Nearly the same. Dr. Anglade lectured before me; and I followed very nearly the same course of lectures which he delivered. I dictated my lectures as he did at that period; and I believe, that his printed work is just the same in substance as that which he dictated, with perhaps some little differences on some questions respecting ideas. I believe my lectures were the very same in substance as what I was taught myself in his class. I was acquainted with his course, and I did not find it necessary to make any great alterations when I became professor myself.

During the time you were a professor at Maynooth, did it occur to you to think that any alterations might be made in any of the regulations of the college, which would be attended with benefit?—I cannot clearly state any alterations which I may have desired to see carried into effect at the time, except that I thought there should be a greater regard to composition in the English language; and I thought there should be more attention paid to the students with respect to sacred eloquence; these two points, I thought, would be very useful to them; a better knowledge of the English language and more perfect preparation for the pulpit. Those things were attended to in Dr. Flood's time; and I dare say they are attended to now; but as I have been very little in the college during the last fourteen years, I am not prepared to state what instruction is given at present on those points.

Right Rev.
28 November 1826.

Was there any professor of elocution at the time you were there?—I cannot say that the person that was in that department was very well qualified; when Dr. Flood was President, he paid more attention to that object than any of his successors during my time; he attended in the public hall almost every Sunday evening, when one of the students preached, and after the sermon was finished, he called some of the students to state their opinions of the discourse, to point out its faults and to make any observations they thought necessary. Then he gave his own opinion with respect to the composition of the discourse, the manner in which it was delivered, the division of it into parts, and every thing else that ought to be observed in a sermon calculated for public instruction. Such information respecting sermons was very useful; and I regretted that it was not followed up by the other Presidents; I believe they were convinced of its utility, but were not competent to perform this duty with the same effect as Dr. Flood.

What practice had the students in your time in English composition?—The practice was not very regular—it depended in a great measure upon the professors in the first and second classes of humanity. In the class taught by the English professor, the students were occasionally obliged to prepare pieces of composition on some subject, which were examined publicly for the purpose of exciting greater attention to that point; but generally speaking, the students were more anxious to distinguish themselves in the classes where they might obtain premiums connected with the college course. The classes in which they studied with the greatest ardour, were logic, natural philosophy and theology, as they expected that their character, during the remainder of their lives, would be in a great measure established by their success in those departments.

Was the time of the students so fully occupied, that it was extremely difficult to introduce any study of English composition in the way that you think desirable?—I think their time was very much occupied, so that they could not devote many leisure hours to composition.

Was there any professor of the Irish language when you were in the college?—There was; but he had very few books in that language for the improvement of his class.

Did he give instruction?—He did; the class book that he made most use of was a catechism, called Donlevy's Catechism, written in the Irish character; he obliged the students in his class to read that catechism, and he explained afterwards to them the lessons they had read.

About what number of students might attend the class?—The number varied, because there are not many parts of Ireland where public instruction is required in the Irish language; at present the students from the north of Ireland, generally speaking, do not require the Irish language, except those in rough districts, where the people are confined to mountains and places of that kind—the Irish is more spoken there than in any other parts; but I should think on an average, about fifty students remained in his class.

Examination of John Richard Corballis, Esq.;
Wednesday, 1st November 1826.

Appendix, N° 48.

Examination of
J. R. Corballis,
Esq.
1 November 1826.

YOU are a barrister?—I am.

Were you educated in the lay College of Maynooth?—I was.

How many years were you there?—From September 1807 till June 1812, about four years and a-half.

During the latter part of the time you were there, did you attend any lectures given in the Royal College of Maynooth?—I did.

What lectures were those?—The lectures on natural philosophy.

What class in the college did you attend?—It was called the Class of Physics; it was under the direction of the Abbé Darré, who was then professor of physics in the college.

Did the circumstance of your attending that class, lead you to mix much or to become much acquainted with the students of the Royal College at Maynooth?—Not more than the natural intercourse that may be supposed to have arisen from my attendance at the class for two hours every day, at two different periods; and from passing backward and forward with some of the students, who occasionally accompanied me to the confines of the college. I had necessarily more or less intercourse with those in the immediate class I attended.

Did the ecclesiastical students in the lay college, attend lectures in the royal college?—They did, some.

Was that to a greater extent than the lay students in the lay college?—None of the lay students but myself attended that year—there had been others in preceding years.

Can you say how many of the students who were educated for holy orders attended that class which you attended, or any other at the royal college?—I think, as well as I recollect, four attended the logic class.

Did that lead to much personal intercourse or habits of intimacy with the students of the royal college?—There was one of them with whom I was myself particularly intimate, Mr. Boylan, one of the present professors. He was, at the time I was attending the natural philosophy class, residing in the college, and having been very intimate with him in the lay college, where he had been also a student, we continued our intercourse afterwards.

Were you led to mix much with the students in the royal college during the hours of recreation?—I think not much.

There

There is a part of the day during which, the Commissioners have been informed, that the students of the college walk about in the space of ground that is within the limits of the college itself; can you say whether you have ever mixed with them during that time, or walked with them at that time, in such a way as to know what their habit of thought and conversation was during those hours?—Not generally; I should rather say my doing so was an exception to my general habit.

Has your connexion with the students in the royal college, or your observation with respect to those in the lay college, who have been destined for orders, and who were therefore more connected with the royal college than the others, led you to believe that they occupied their minds or their conversation much with political subjects?—At the time I speak of, generally one or two of the grown boys in the lay college subscribed for newspapers; of course that created such subjects of conversation from time to time there, but I do not think that the ecclesiastical students were more disposed to converse on those subjects than the others, not more than the grown students in the lay college.

Are you led to believe that political subjects occupied much of their thoughts or conversation in the royal college?—I should think they did about that period; as well as I recollect (for my memory is not very accurate as to the exact time) it was subsequent to the period at which, in consequence of some improper spirit appearing to have crept into the college, with regard to politics, newspapers were prohibited there, and the feelings which had produced this prohibition had not then altogether subsided.

Will you state as nearly as you can, what you know or recollect upon that subject?—My actual knowledge of the thing must necessarily be so imperfect, that I can give no information upon it; but I have a general impression that such subjects were talked of amongst the students, and that they felt an interest in them—this is nothing more than a very vague impression.

You had no impression of hearing the particulars of their conversation?—Certainly not.

When you say that political subjects occupied their attention, do you allude to matters of general politics, or to events connected with Ireland particularly?—I should think both, not more one than the other; but in fact, with regard to those circumstances I speak from very faint recollection, I was not then more than fifteen or sixteen years of age.

Were you in the habit of hearing discussions respecting the state of affairs in Ireland, and the influence of England upon Irish affairs, and notions with respect to the expediency of dissolving the connection, or discussions, as to whether it would be productive of benefit or otherwise?—Never, to my recollection.

Did you ever hear hopes expressed that the connection with England might be dissolved, and that Ireland might establish a more independent system?—Never.

Was it common to express wishes that the Protestant establishment in this country might be got rid of, and that a system in which the ascendancy of the Roman Catholics would be undoubted, might be established in this country?—I have no recollection whatever of those particular subjects being under discussion; I suppose they may have been discussed, but it is mere supposition.

Is there any thing which would lead you to believe that such subjects were fixed and settled, and recognized subjects of attention in the minds of the students generally throughout the whole college?—Nothing in the world.

Do you think if such opinions had been entertained, and conversations expressive of such opinions had been frequent, that it must necessarily have come to your knowledge?—I do not think it likely that subjects so totally different from the pursuits with which I was connected at the time, would have been communicated to one so young as myself, but at the same time I think it very likely that had they occurred, I should have heard something of them; they were subjects that would have excited interest even in young minds at that period, and I should have at least known if such subjects were discussed. I do not mean to say that I should have known their opinions upon them.

You say you have never had reason to believe that such discussions were held at all?—I mean to say that I cannot recollect to my recollection any of the particular subjects of discussion at that period.

From your general knowledge of Maynooth, would you believe that the students there were in the habit of expressing a wish for the separation of Ireland from England, and for the overthrow of the Protestant establishment, and the destruction of Protestants in this country?—Certainly not.

Do you think that any of the objects mentioned in the last question were objects which the students there were in the habit of expressing themselves desirous of attaining?—Never to my recollection.

The question is as to your belief?—Never, to my belief; I do not believe that any thing of the kind ever occurred.

Have you occasionally mixed with clergymen who have been educated at Maynooth?—Constantly.

Have you ever heard it maintained or spoken of as a possible principle to be sustained for an instant, that it would be lawful for a Roman Catholic to violate the oath of allegiance which he takes to the King?—Never, in a single instance.

What do you think is the general feeling of Roman Catholics, as to the imputation that they hold that doctrine, speaking as well from your intercourse with men who have been educated for the ministry at Maynooth, as from your intercourse with Roman Catholic gentlemen?—I speak my own sentiments, and I am sure in doing so, I only express the feelings

Appendix, N^o 48.

Examination of
J. R. Corballis,
Esq.

feelings of every Catholic gentleman of my acquaintance, when I say, that I feel the greatest indignation at the imputation of such principles.

Does that answer apply also to the Roman Catholic clergy?—I am sure the answer would equally apply to them. I do not know whether I shall be excused in adding, that I can never forget the indignation I felt, when, at my first entrance into life, being called to the bar, I was compelled to disclaim on oath the doctrines so frequently imputed to Catholics; being called, as I was, with Protestants of my own acquaintance, my companions and associates at college—to be set aside, as it were, to hear the faith in which I had been brought up condemned as idolatrous in the oath taken by them on the occasion; and afterwards to be obliged myself to disclaim, under the same solemnity, such galling imputations as the oath taken by Roman Catholics conveys.

Your family are Roman Catholics?—They are.

You have been in the habit of mixing with Roman Catholics continually?—Constantly.

Has the sentiment you have expressed as your own, with respect to the sacredness of an oath, been a sentiment which you have heard universally inculcated?—Universally.

Amongst clergy as well as laity?—Amongst clergy as well as laity, without any exception.

Have you ever heard it maintained by any of the gentlemen who have been educated at Maynooth, that it would be lawful for the Pope to dispense with the observance of the oath of allegiance taken by a Roman Catholic?—Never; and perhaps the best answer I can give to that question will be to produce the Prayer-book which was in use at the lay college, and which was put into our hands by persons connected generally with the royal college, and contains the principles of Roman Catholics on that subject. I have brought the Prayer-book with me, and will, with permission, take the liberty of reading some passages I have marked in it as an answer to the question. The title of the book is “True Piety;” it is not the edition which we had at Maynooth, it is a later edition, but it is the same book; it contains a short explanation of the “Principles of Roman Catholics,” together with “Reasons for adhering to the Roman Catholic Religion.” With regard to these doctrines, there are several passages in the book which I think furnish an answer to the question that has been put; but the passage I have marked, and to which I particularly allude, is as follows:

“1st. The pastors of the church, who are the body representative, either dispersed or convened in council, have received no commission from Christ to frame new articles of faith, these being solely divine revelations; but only to explain and to ascertain to us what anciently was and is received and retained as of faith in the church, when debates and controversies arise upon these subjects. These definitions in matters of faith only, and proposed as such, oblige all the faithful to an interior assent. But,

“2d. It is no article of faith, that the church cannot err either in matters of fact, or in matters of speculation or civil policy, depending on mere human reason; these not being divine revelations deposited in the Catholic church. Hence is deduced, that,

“3d. If a General Council, much less a Papal Consistory, should presume to depose a King, and absolve his subjects from their allegiance, no Catholic could be bound to submit to such a decree.

“4th. Hence it follows, that the subjects of the King of England lawfully may, without the least breach of any Catholic principle, renounce, upon oath, the teaching or practising the doctrine of deposing Kings excommunicated for heresy, by any authority whatsoever, as repugnant to the fundamental laws of the nation, as injurious to sovereign power, and as destructive of peace and good government.

“5th. Catholics believe that the Bishop of Rome, successor of St. Peter, is the head of the whole Catholic church; in which sense this church may therefore be stiled Roman Catholic, being an universal body united under one visible head. Nevertheless, “6th. It is no matter of faith that the Pope is in himself infallible, separated from the church, even in expounding the faith; by consequence, papal definitions or decrees taken exclusively from a General Council, or universal acceptance of the church, oblige none, under pain of heresy, to an interior assent.

“7th. Nor do Catholics, as Catholics, believe that the Pope has any direct or indirect authority over the temporal power or jurisdiction of princes. Hence, if the Pope should pretend to absolve or dispense with His Majesty’s subjects from their allegiance, on account of heresy or schism, such dispensation would be vain and null; and all Catholic subjects, notwithstanding such dispensation or absolution, would be still bound in conscience to defend their King and country, at the hazard of their lives and fortunes, (as far as Protestants would be bound) even against the Pope himself, should he invade the nation.”

Then again there is the following passage:—

“It is a fundamental truth in our religion, that no power on earth can license men to lie, to forswear or perjure themselves, to massacre their neighbours, or destroy their native country, on pretence of promoting the Catholic cause or religion: furthermore, all pardons or dispensations, granted or pretended to be granted, in order to any such ends or designs, could have no other validity or effect than to add sacrilege and blasphemy to the above-mentioned crimes.”

Was that book in common use at the lay college?—It was the common Prayer-book of the school given to the boys on their going to school at the lay college at Maynooth.

Appendix, N° 49.

Examination of the Reverend Peter Kenney, Thursday, 7th December 1826.

THE Commissioners understand that you for some time were the Vice President at the College of Maynooth?—I was.

In what year did you enter upon that situation?—In the year 1812; I think in the month of September, and I left it the following June. I know that the time that I was Vice President was not longer than one year.

Who was the President at that time?—Dr. Murray.

Were your duties at Maynooth to assist the President?—I was his representative when he was absent; and it was my duty to assist him in the general government of the house.

Would you be so good as to state what circumstances led to your election to that office?

—It was Dr. Murray's own request to me which led to it. He found it rather difficult at the time to get a person to fill that office, and he requested of me to undertake to do it. My compliance was a great sacrifice of my convenience; but as he was extremely desirous that I should do it, I consented to go, upon the express condition, that I was not to remain longer than a year, if I could remain so long. My acquiescence was entirely a matter of accommodation to meet his wishes.

At the time Dr. Murray applied to you to take upon yourself the office of Vice President of Maynooth, were you a resident in Ireland?—I was at that time an officiating priest in Dublin.

Are we to understand that you were not a candidate for the office?—It was not in any respect an office that I wished to undertake—it was solely an act of compliance with the wishes of Dr. Murray, and which he was pleased to say he considered as an act of condescension on my part.

Whilst filling that office, was it any part of your duty to give lectures to the young men?—Not on science or theology; I did not hold any chair, but I have given spiritual instruction at stated periods.

Have the goodness to state at what times, and what was the character of the instruction given?—The instructions were given generally preparatory to holy orders, which were conferred in the week of Pentecost. It is usual for ecclesiastics to retire at that period: even those who live in colleges and religious houses observe a greater degree of retirement, and give more time to prayer and self examination. On such occasions there is generally a person appointed to propose to them fit subjects for their meditations, and to point out in what manner they should spend their time in these spiritual exercises. I have given this Retreat, as it is called by us, also a general Retreat given at the beginning of the academic year, when the new students come in. Then there are five or six days more particularly devoted to spiritual duties, and on this occasion also I proposed the subjects of their meditations. I am asked the tenor of those instructions. They were meditations on death, hell, on judgment, on eternity; on the duties of the priesthood, the sacredness of the office, and other subjects that may be supposed to arise from these principles.

We understand you to say that this was conducting a Retreat that took place during the time you were Vice President?—Yes; but such Retreats have always been given there.

Was it a part of your duty to give instruction to the young men, connected with their education, with such spiritual exercises as you have described?—I did not, as I have before stated, hold any chair. I never gave catechistical instructions.

Or scriptural instructions?—Applications of the Scriptures were very frequently made, because it was necessary that those subjects should be enforced by reference to the Holy Scriptures, for they were to be considered as revealed truths; and not as the mere result of our experience, or of human reason. In this way I have frequently expounded passages of the Scriptures. The explanations of the passages of the Scriptures which I gave, were incidental to the subjects which I have mentioned, and were given in order to assist the students in their meditations and other pious exercises.

Is it the practice of the Vice President to give instructions of a catechistical nature?—It was not then esteemed a part of his duty. Mr. Montague undertook to do it. It was not at that time annexed to the duty of Vice President. The Dean, I think was the person, who then gave the catechistical instructions.

Was there any other candidate for the office of Vice President when you took it?—I was not in collision with any person, most certainly.

Your appointment was rather in the nature of an election than of nomination?—It was the effect of the earnest request of the then coadjutor Archbishop of Dublin, who was at the same time the President of the college.

Did not Dr. Murray himself hold the office of President only temporarily?—I really cannot say upon what conditions he accepted the office, but I know that he was only one year at the College of Maynooth; and his going thither was a great inducement with me to accept of the invitation to become Vice President.

Had you been connected with any seminary or establishment for the instruction of youth before that time?—Not before that period—of course I had been in colleges in a subordinate capacity.

But not connected with it as one of its superintendents or as a superior?—No, I was not.

Neither in nor out of Ireland?—Before that time I never had been a superior in any sense of the word, nor officer in any college whatever.

Appendix, N^o 49.

Examination of
Rev.

Peter Kenney,
7 December 1826.

Were you in the habit of preaching discourses to the students at Maynooth?—On the occasions on which I spoke, and only then. I do not recollect that I preached a sermon at Maynooth, except on the occasion of the spiritual exercises.

Were they in the nature of sermons?—They were; they were the same subjects, but they were delivered in another style, and do not go by that name, and therefore I did not give them the name of sermons.

In what seminary were you yourself educated?—I studied in Palermo; I studied theology there; I was also in other seminaries.

Be pleased to name them?—I was at Carlow seminary; I was afterwards at Stonyhurst in England; and afterwards in Palermo in Sicily, where I finished my course of theology.

Are you a native of Ireland?—I am; I am a native of this city.

Can you state whether the education given in the college at Palermo is the same, or materially different from that of Maynooth?—All the principles of faith and morals are precisely the same.

Have you taken the oaths of allegiance appointed for the Roman Catholics of Ireland?—I have.

Were the principles expressed in those oaths, with respect to the power of the Pope, taught and inculcated at Maynooth when you were there?—Most certainly.

We understand that since you have left Maynooth, you have been connected with another establishment for the education of the youth of this country?—I am connected with an establishment of that nature at Clongowes Wood.

Was it your intention to establish that seminary before you went to Maynooth?—Yes, I had some notion of doing it.

During the time you were at Maynooth, were you occupied in the preliminary arrangements necessary to the establishment of the seminary at Clongowes Wood?—Not at all.

When you quitted Maynooth, did you go at once to Clongowes?—No; when I quitted Maynooth, I did not know where the seminary was to be, nor were my plans upon the subject at all matured. When I said I had it in my mind, as I was asked whether I intended to form an establishment of that nature, I meant to say, that I had that intention when I could find a proper situation for the establishment.

Have the goodness to state how long it was after you quitted Maynooth, that you opened the seminary at Clongowes for the reception of pupils?—In 1814, the seminary was established at Clongowes; and in the month of July, the schools commenced.

Are you the only individual, connected with the establishment at Clongowes Wood, who has at any time held any situation in the College at Maynooth?—The only one.

Is there any individual in the College at Maynooth, who at any time held any situation as an instructor, or in any other way connected with the establishment at Clongowes Wood?—Not one.

Will you have the goodness to state what number of students have gone from your establishment at Clongowes to Maynooth?—I cannot state it with certainty; I have a recollection of two; I think that there was another, but I cannot call his name to mind. There were certainly two who were our pupils when boys, who went to Maynooth after they had left Clongowes Wood.

Are there any students at Clongowes whom you know to have the intention of going into the College of Maynooth?—No, I cannot say there are; I do not know there is such an intention on the part of any of the students at Clongowes. I might say, as the question is asked, that I was not prepared to be called upon to give any account of the particulars of the establishment at Clongowes Wood. At this moment it has occurred to me, that I have heard that it is the intention of one young boy to go to Maynooth, that there is some probability of his going thither. I suppose he will go there, because I have heard, he purposes to enter into the secular priesthood, that is all I know of the matter.

Do you seek to prevail upon, or to induce young men to go to Maynooth, or dissuade them from doing it?—In the matter of ecclesiastical vocations we never interfere. I mean we are never the first persons to suggest, or introduce it in any way.

Does there exist any sort of connection between the establishment of Clongowes Wood and the College of Maynooth?—No more than that we are priests and Catholics: that is, the clergy at Clongowes Wood are Catholic priests, as well as those who are at Maynooth. There is no connection whatever by which it could be said, that those two houses of Catholic education are more connected than any other two Catholic establishments, which any individual might please to select.

Since you have resigned the situation of Vice President of the College of Maynooth, have you at any time given instruction within that college?—I have.

Have the goodness to state on what occasions?—On the same occasions on which I gave them before; I have given instructions of the same nature.

How often has that occurred?—As well as I can now recollect, it cannot be more than three or four times; but I cannot distinctly recollect. I have been very often asked, and declined to accede to the request.

On those occasions we understand you to allude to the spiritual Retreats which you have conducted within the college?—Yes.

And that you gave exhortations and instructions similar to those given by you when Vice-President?—Exactly of the same nature.

Can you state in what year you conducted the Retreats, since you quitted Maynooth?—I think I gave the Retreat in Maynooth in the year 1824: and as I wish to be explicit, and am am asked how often I have given them within the walls of the house, I am obliged to state that I have given them within the walls of the house to the clergy of the archdiocese of Dublin, who are assembled at the time of the vacation, when the students are not there; for it is usual for ecclesiastics of the Roman Catholic church to spend a few days every year, when it can be conveniently done, in such exercises of piety. On these occasions the bishops nominate a priest to conduct the spiritual exercises, and as it has sometimes happened that I have been asked to go, and have actually performed the duty, I must add, that, if these times are to be counted, they will increase the number which I before specified.

When you said three or four times, were you to be understood to mean that those numbers related to the conducting the Retreat of the students, and not of the clergy?—Yes.

Do you belong to the order of the Jesuits?—I am a Jesuit.

Was there any other person in Maynooth at the time you were Vice-President, belonging to that order?—No, there was not.

Is it within your knowledge, that any person educated at Maynooth, has connected himself with that order?—Yes; there are a few who have performed a part of their education at Maynooth.

State as nearly as you can what number they amount to?—Three I distinctly recollect; it occurs to my mind, there has been a fourth.

Have you reason to be fully assured that there have been no more than four?—I am sure, at least I cannot recollect that there is another; and I now recollect that there has not even been a fourth person.

During the time you were the Vice President at Maynooth, did you think it your duty to prevail upon any individuals within the college to join your order, or endeavour to induce them to do it?—Never; I never had a conversation or said a word upon the subject, with the exception of one occasion, when a proposition was voluntarily made to me by a young gentleman of that kind, and which I formally then declined.

Had the bull of the late Pope, which authorized the re-establishment of the Jesuits, as an order in different countries, been issued when you were at Maynooth?—No, it had not; it was only in August 1814 that that bull was issued, and I have already stated that I left Maynooth in the year 1813.

Did the Jesuits then, in any sense, exist in this country as an order?—They were not recognised as such; they could not be.

At what time did you become a member of the order of the Jesuits?—I went to Sicily in the year 1808, or the beginning of the year 1809, I am not quite sure which, but it was at that period.

Was the college at Palermo, at that period, under the care of the Jesuits?—Yes, there was a partial restoration of the order for the kingdom of the Two Sicilies in the year 1804; my studies were performed in that college which was a college of Jesuits.

Did that partial restoration take place through the medium of a bull?—It took place by a special brief as we denominate it. This is a different document from the one, which I have mentioned before, and which is called a Bull.

Was that partial restoration which you say took place in the year 1804, by the authority of the See of Rome?—Yes, it was.

Was it a complete restoration, as far as Sicily was concerned?—Yes, but confined to the place.

It was local?—It was.

Were you at Stonyhurst after you had been at Palermo?—I have been to Stonyhurst since; but not to study there.

During the time you were at Maynooth, had you any sort of connection with the individuals connected with the establishment at Stonyhurst?—We were friends, and being upon terms of friendship, I corresponded with them, but never in any manner on the affairs of Maynooth.

You stated that you became connected with the order of Jesuits when at Palermo?—I was a Jesuit when at Palermo.

Did you become one on entering into the college there?—I considered myself to have been one before, for I had manifested my intentions, and my wish prior to that period; but I then became aggregated to the body that was restored, so far as that country was concerned at that time.

When did you take the vows?—I took them in Sicily, but I made them in a private way before I went to Sicily.

When you were at Maynooth, was there a society called the Sodality of the Sacred Heart established?—There was not.

Have you at any time belonged to that sodality?—I really cannot say that I do belong to it. The reason why I express myself in this way is, that I had a desire of belonging to it, and I recollect applying to Dr. Murray, who was authorized to erect these pious associations, for leave to erect one in a chapel in Dublin, and he gave me that leave to the best of my recollection. I did then mean to put my own name at the head of it. I however never carried this design into execution, and I have therefore great doubt, whether my name has been entered in any book of the Sodality of the Sacred Heart.

In conducting the spiritual Retreats of Maynooth, have you in any way had communication with the students upon the subject of that sodality which subsequently existed?—I never spoke to them in my life on the subject.

Were you in any way instrumental in establishing that sodality?—In no way instrumental.

Appendix, N° 49.

Examination of
Rev.Peter Kenney,
7 December 1826.

Do you consider the Sodality of the Sacred Heart as in any way connected directly or indirectly with the order of Jesuits?—No further than that there are many Jesuits entered upon the books of this society, and who perform the pious practices enjoined. With the permission of the Commissioners, I will explain to them what is the nature of this sodality. The Sodality of the Sacred Heart is nothing else than a pious association of individuals, Roman Catholics, priests, bishops, laymen and women, any one whatsoever; this pious association has for its object to honour the sacred humanity of Christ under the symbol of his sacred heart, as the heart is the emblem of the virtues of human nature; the manner in which an individual becomes a member of this sodality, is by having his or her name written in a book which is kept for that purpose; the only utility of putting down the name is, that it is a kind of pledge that you are sincere in your wish to perform the spiritual practices, which are prescribed. There is no other sort of union amongst the members; as members they never know each other, except when they meet in chapel to say their prayers together; there is no sort of tie or connection whatever beyond what I have said, and this sodality has never been under the direction of the Jesuits to my knowledge.

Is it one that the Jesuits seek to promote?—Many of the individuals I understand are very zealous in promoting that devotion, and in encouraging the faithful to practise it.

Was it not founded before the order was restored?—Long before.

Do you mean before it was originally instituted?—I am not sure when the first sodality was instituted; but it certainly was a long time after the institution of the society of Jesus.

Was not Claude de la Colombiere the founder of the institution?—No; but he was considered a great patron of the devotion.

Can you state who was the founder?—No, I cannot; it has nothing about it of that regular aggregation which constitutes a religious order. The association first commenced in some parts of France, and then made progress in that country and elsewhere; latterly it came under the cognizance of the Holy See, and to encourage piety and devotion, the Holy See authorized an arch-confraternity at Rome, which arch-confraternity has the power of aggregating any number of persons to practise its devotions, and to communicate to them the spiritual favours which the Pope has conferred upon the association. When Dr. Murray was at Rome some years ago, he obtained from that arch-confraternity, who are not Jesuits, the power of erecting sodalities in this arch-diocese.

Was not that after Dr. Murray ceased to be President at Maynooth?—Yes.

And you Vice President?—Yes.

Is there any vow taken upon entering upon this association?—No, nor obligation of any kind.

Nor to any superior?—No, nor to any superior; there is no other aggregation than that of a few Christians assembling together to say a few prayers, and to perform acts of piety and devotion.

In a book published in Paris this year, intitled, Memoirs of Scipion de Ricci, Bishop of Pistoia, we find it stated, that the members of the society of Jesus, have thought that the worship of the Sacred Heart was most proper to serve as a centre, and as a point of re-union for all those who were working for the re-establishment of the order, and on that account they had not neglected any means or any artifice, in order to spread and permanently to establish this worship. All the Popes before Clement XIII. have been more or less opposed to it, fearing lest this new symbol of the love of Jesus Christ to men, might be taken by simple minds for a separate part of the entire body of Jesus Christ*. We would beg to ask you what is your opinion of that statement?—I conceive it to be a very erroneous and a very malicious statement. The author of this statement Scipion de Ricci, was Bishop of Pistoia. It is well known, that he adopted principles which Pope Pius VI. thought to be subversive of Catholic discipline, and even to be inconsistent with Catholic faith; he held a synod that was solemnly condemned by the Pope; in the articles of this synod he made several assertions derogatory to the devotion of the Sacred Heart, which were solemnly condemned by the Pope in the bull Auctorem fidei, and this bull condemning those assertions was received by the whole church.

Was it not understood at the time, that the cause of the displeasure of the Pope against Ricci, was the opposition of the latter to the Jesuits?—Never; it was the adoption of certain measures which Joseph II. and his successor wished to bring into the ecclesiastical discipline—of these the holy see could not approve; the Pope did not pronounce any censure upon Ricci, until this bishop went so far as to hold what is called a Diocesan Synod; he embodied the obnoxious opinions in the form of decrees; and the book went by the name of the Synod of Pistoia; those opinions were subversive of many points of Catholic discipline and Catholic faith; and Pope Pius VI. condemned the work, and censured many of the propositions contained in it. I rather think it will be found to be a fact, that the bishop himself begged pardon of the Pope, and recanted what he had done.

Is it an untrue statement which is set forth in the work in question, that all the Popes before Clement

* “ Personne n'ignore, dit Ricci, et une funeste expérience ne l'a que trop prouvé, depuis les troubles qui agitent encore l'Europe, combien de machinations les Jésuites ont mis en œuvre, sous la protection du Pape Pie VI, pour se rétablir en corps de société. Ils ont cru que le culte du sacré cœur était ce qu'il y avait de plus propre à servir de centre et de point de réunion pour tous ceux qui auraient travaillé à ce but; et dans cette vue, ils n'ont négligé aucun moyen, aucun artifice, pour établir solidement ce même culte et pour le répandre. Tous les Papes avant Clement XIII. y avaient plus ou moins été contraires, dans la crainte que ce nouveau symbole de l'amour de Jesus Christ pour les hommes ne fût pris par les esprits simples pour une partie séparée de corps entier de Jesus Christ lui même.”

Clement XIII. disapproved of the devotion of the Sacred Heart?—I never heard of any Pope who disapproved of it, as now practised; there might have been at one period propositions advanced on the subject which were not theologically correct.

Is there any confraternity that is more particularly favoured or adopted by the order of Jesuits, than that of the Sacred Heart of Jesus?—There are other confraternities that are more particularly connected with it; I cannot say more favoured, because all devotions are laudable and deserve to be encouraged.

Can you state any particular fraternity, if there be any, that is more adopted by the society of Jesus, than that of the Sacred Heart of Jesus?—There is the Sodality of the Blessed Virgin; there is also the Sodality of Bona Mors; and the only reason for saying that these are more adopted by or connected with the Jesuits, is that the head confraternity is annexed to the church of the Jesuits at Rome.

The confraternity of both those you have last mentioned?—Yes.

Is the Sodality of the Blessed Virgin known by any other title than the one you have stated?—There may be many Sodalities of the Blessed Virgin, and the titles of the same sodalities may be various in various places; in Rome, the sodality is called the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin; in some other places it is called the Conception; and the reason of the difference in the appellation originates merely in the difference of the feasts, which each considers as its principal feast.

Is it known occasionally by the name of the Sacred Heart of Mary?—Not that of which I speak; nor do I know of any such, though there may be such a sodality.

We have before us a book that is intitled, "The Mass of the Sacred Heart of our Lord Jesus Christ, appointed to be said on the Friday after the octave of Corpus Christi, Dublin. Printed by P. Blenkinsop, 129, Capel-street, Stationer to the R. C. College, Maynooth." In page 94, of that book, we find stated, "The devotion to the Sacred Heart of Mary;" and in one of the prayers in that devotion, it is stated, "Go then devout client! go to the Heart of Jesus; but let your way be through the Heart of Mary. The sword of grief which pierced her soul opens you a passage, enter by the wound love has made, advance to the Heart of Jesus, and rest there even to death itself. Presume not to separate and divide two objects so intimately united together, but ask redress in all your exigencies from the Heart of Jesus, and ask this redress through the Heart of Mary." Has that devotion any connection with the confraternity you mentioned?—None whatsoever; all devotions which have the Virgin for their immediate object must have some reference to each other; but there is no special connexion whatever between the devotion now described and the sodality which I have mentioned; I have already said that I have not ever known a sodality erected under the title of the Heart of Mary.

Look to the whole of the prayer from which that extract has been read, and say whether you consider it as a prayer intended for the confraternity of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, or as a prayer for the confraternity of the Heart of the Blessed Virgin, or for neither?—Upon looking at it, I do not think it was intended for any confraternity whatever; but like many other similar prayers, this is printed for whoever would choose to recite it.

Do you know any thing of the publication of that book now in your hand; have the goodness to examine it?—I know this to be a translation of the Mass, which Dr. Murray obtained at Rome, for the feast which is celebrated in this arch-diocese, in honour of the Sacred Heart of Jesus.

You mean the first part of the book?—Yes. I know nothing particular about this edition; but I take this to be an abridgement of an English work on the same subject, that has been very long in print; how this edition was brought forward, and by whom, I know not.

Do you know by whom the English edition, of which you speak, was prepared?—I do not.

Have the goodness to mention the title of it?—Devotions to the Sacred Heart.

Are you aware whether the devotions to the Sacred Heart, contained in the English book of which you speak, were reprinted at the expense of the conductors of the establishment at Stonyhurst?—That work may have been; but I am not aware that such is really the case.

Have you any means of knowledge that will enable you to say whether it was the mere voluntary act of Blenkinsop, to print that book in your hand, or whether it was suggested to him by any particular authority?—I have no knowledge that it was suggested to him by any particular authority; it is very likely that he being a printer, who sold Catholic books, found it his interest to meet the wishes of many devout Catholics, who might wish to buy the work; and as he was in the habit of printing books of devotion, he may have been applied to, and have been thus induced to print it. I do not know, that I have ever before seen the particular edition now before me.

You have spoken of the first part of the book being a translation of the mass which Dr. Murray procured at Rome; have the goodness to point out the place in that volume where the first part ends?—The mass of the Sacred Heart, including the title page, contains seven pages, which pages are not numbered in the subsequent part of the book; these seven pages precede the preface, and the regularly numbered pages of the book.

Does it not appear to you, from the examination which you have made, that the mass of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, is a separate thing, and bound up with another work?—It does.

Do you not perceive that the whole of the mass of the Sacred Heart consists of this: the introit, the gloria in excelsis, the collect, the epistle, the gradual, the gospel, the creed, the offertory, the secret, the preface, the communion, and post communion?—Yes; those are the parts which go under the denomination of the Mass of the Sacred Heart; but there is the ordinary of the mass besides, which is what is said every day.

Rev.Peter Kenney,

The common daily ritual?—Yes, what we call the Ordo Missæ, or Ordinary of the Mass.

But what is given here as the mass of the Sacred Heart, is that part of the mass which constitutes the peculiar devotion of the Sacred Heart?—Yes; and I can give the reason why these seven pages are made a separate article; the original mass is, of course, in Latin. When it was known that this new mass in honour of the Sacred Heart was granted, many of the faithful who have missals translated into English, were anxious to get this mass into their missals also; and the printer, who understands these things very well, got up these sheets to sell to any person who wished to buy them separately. He then thought that it would be useful to prefix the mass to the book of the Sacred Heart.

Look to the table of the contents of the book, and say whether the mass of the Sacred Heart is not stated merely as one item in the contents, the whole contents forming one entire work, and not two or more works bound up together?—The table of contents states in the list every thing that is between the two covers, but still it designates by the number of the pages clearly that the mass of the Sacred Heart is distinct from the body of the book, for it refers to page 3, for the mass of the Sacred Heart, and then begins to count the other pages.

We beg of you to observe, that the table of the contents of the book contains the whole of the matters between the two covers, and there is but one title page to the book, which is that which has been read to you; can you point out any title-page or denomination which applies to what you consider to be the second work bound up with the former one?—I take it that the work had another title-page; it certainly ought to have had it; this title-page should be, Devotions to the Sacred Heart. It is probable that the printer, for the convenience of his customers, inserted and bound up with these devotions, the mass of the Sacred Heart, as being analagous to the contents of the book which he had probably ready at the time for sale, and when he made the table of the contents, he made it for all the matters contained within the two covers, in the same way as he might have done if seven or eight magazines were bound together, and a general table of the contents made for the entire collection.

Then you consider he omitted the second title-page?—Yes, I think so; this first page is not a proper title-page for the whole work.

And that he constructed a table of contents that might run throughout the whole work?—I conceive so.

Supposing that the printer had omitted what you consider as the second work, which he had appended to the other, of how many pages would that which you conceived to be the first work have consisted?—I think it is marked seven.

Then in fact it would have amounted to nothing worthy the name of a volume?—Certainly not, if the printer had only put the mass of the Sacred Heart between the two covers; but what I look upon to be the fact is this; that he had previously printed a book containing the devotions of the Sacred Heart to which he very naturally prefixed the mass of the Sacred Heart.

Can you say who was the author of those devotions?—I cannot.

According to the discipline or practice of the Roman Catholic church, by whom are such devotions usually composed?—There is no law of discipline to say they shall be composed by any particular individual.

We beg of you to attend to the analysis of the volume about to be suggested to you, and say whether you consider it in any respect incorrect; it begins by the "Mass of the Sacred Heart," which appears to occupy seven pages and a half; then follows the preface, stated as page 3; then the "nature of the devotion," at page 7; "the method of practising this devotion," at page 56; "the litany of the Sacred Heart," page 61; the "rules of the association of the Sacred Heart," at page 85; "the letters patent of aggregation of the Sacred Heart," at page 88; the "British subjects Petition for the establishment of it at Bruges," at page 91; "the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Mary," at page 94; "the litany of the Sacred Heart of Mary," at page 96; "the litany of Jesus," at page 119; "a prayer in honour of the five wounds of Jesus," at page 123; "the litany of St. Francis Xavierius," in the same page, viz. 123; "the devout client's address to St. Aloysius," page 137; the "condemnation of the propositions of the Diocesan Council of Pistoia," to which you have already referred, condemning the devotion of the Heart, at page 144; "the Hymn to the Sacred Heart of Jesus," at page 145; "the office of the Sacred Heart of our Saviour Jesus Christ," at page 146; and there the volume ends. We would beg to ask you, whether you consider the book with those contents as forming one consecutive work, or being two different works bound up together. We beg of you, also, to look at the typography, and to say whether you have any doubt that the whole of the book was printed at the same time, and intended to constitute one work, and not two, or several?—It is my opinion that the work in question consists of two separate distinct publications bound together, and that the contents are correct, inasmuch as they give the contents of the whole of the subject-matter contained between the two covers.

You mean to give it as your opinion that the mass is one part, and the rest of the work a second part?—Yes; I conceive that the two parts consist of the mass, which occupies only seven pages, and that the rest of the book contains but one work, of which the list of the contents seems to be accurate. That this second part had a title-page that is suppressed, is evident from the preface being numbered at page 3; this page was therefore preceded in the original form of the work by the two pages of the title leaf.

Does

Does it not follow that the rest of the book, as contra-distinguished from the mere mass, is mainly conversant about the Sacred Heart of Jesus?—Mainly; I conceive that to be the object of it.

In what sense do you mean to adopt the word mainly, as put in the preceding question?—In the sense in which I supposed it to be proposed to me, that the greater part of the book, and the principal object of the book is that of the devotion to the Sacred Heart.

Does not the beginning and middle, and the ending of what you call the rest of the book, occupy itself exclusively about the Sacred Heart of Jesus?—The beginning and the middle do, but the ending contains other devotions, which appear to be quite distinct.

The question is as to the end of the work; are not the last nine pages occupied by the office of the Sacred Heart of our Saviour Jesus Christ?—They are.

Have the goodness to look at page 94, of the book; does any one subject appear to be concluded in that page, and a new one to commence?—Decidedly; one part of the page contains part of a Latin decree or concession on the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, and the lower part of the page commences with a kind of treatise on the nature of the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Mary.

From the mode in which that book is printed, it would seem as if the compiler thought that the two subjects had some connection with each other, from his not having marked a distinction between them; state what the connection is between the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus and the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Mary?—I see no other connection than that which exists between devotion to Christ on his own account, and devotion to the Virgin on account of Christ; there is an absolute homage paid to the Sacred Heart of Jesus on account of its personal union with the son of God, and there is a relative devotion to the Sacred Heart of Mary, on account of its sanctification by its moral or spiritual union with that of Christ.

Is that a union arising out of the common qualities of the subject, rather than any union that arises out of the rules or regulations of the sodality?—I know no union whatever between the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Mary and the Sacred Heart of Jesus arising out of any rules or aggregation, or any thing of that kind, nor do I believe there exists any such union or united associations under the title of the Sodality of the Heart of the Virgin. I certainly do not know any thing of such aggregations, if they do exist.

Did you ever in any book which you have happened to examine, containing an account of the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, see the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Mary appended and annexed in the same way as it is in this volume?—In the same book I have before seen two devotions put between the same covers.

Have you ever seen either that book, or the larger work of which you have said you supposed this to be an abridgement, at Stonyhurst?—I have seen the larger work there.

Have the goodness to look to page 119, does not the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Mary apparently terminate in that page?—The devotion to the Sacred Heart of Mary seems to terminate long before that page, for I find here a novena of nine days to the honour of the Sacred Virgin, which is a devotion of another title.

Which matter terminates in the page shewn to you?—The devotions to Mary terminate in that page, and then commence the devotions to our Lord.

What follows the devotions to the Virgin?—The litany of Jesus.

What connexion is there between the litany of Jesus and the devotion to the Virgin?—None.

Is it not an entire different subject matter?—Yes.

Composed at a different time?—Most certainly; there is no doubt that this book is an aggregate of several little devotions, not having any particular connection with each other, which the printer has thus put together, in order that pious persons who may happen to have an inclination to one devotion rather than to another, might deem it an advantage to buy a work which enables them to select the practices of piety that they prefer.

Have the goodness to look to page 126, and state what is the title which you find there?—“The manner of performing the novena, or the nine days devotion to St. Francis Xavierius.”

What does that immediately follow?—It follows the litany of St. Francis Xavierius, and this litany follows the litany of Jesus.

What connection is there between those different subjects?—No particular connection whatever—they are wholly distinct, in fact they have other objects in view; the one is an act of adoration, and the other of relative veneration.

What is it that follows the novena of St. Francis Xavierius?—The litany of St. Aloysius.

What connection is there between those two?—No more than that of devotions, each to different saints.

Were not each of those saints distinguished members of the society of Jesus?—They were; and they are objects of veneration to all Catholics as well as to Jesuits.

What follows?—Then come propositions regarding the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus that have been condemned, extracted from the acts and decrees of the diocesan council of Pistoia; then follow the hymn to the Sacred Heart, and then the office to the Sacred Heart. Perhaps I may be permitted here to observe, that the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Mary, is so very little known in comparison with the devotion to the Sacred Heart of our Lord, that when we make use of the expression, The devotion to the Sacred Heart, we only mean the Sacred Heart of Jesus.

From the censure of the two propositions of the diocesan council of Pistoia, to the end, does the subject of the book relate to devotions to the Sacred Heart of Jesus?—From thence to the end, it all relates to devotions to the Sacred Heart of Jesus.

Appendix, N° 49.

Examination of
Rev.

Peter Kenney,
7 December 1826.

The Commissioners have now before them another volume, entitled, "Devotions to the Sacred Heart of Jesus; Exercises for the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, Confession and Communion; Visits to the blessed Sacraments; Feasts of the Sacred Heart, &c.; with an Appendix on the Nature of Indulgences; translated from the French, revised by and printed under the inspection of the Rev. Joseph Ivy, Dean President of St. Bridget's seminary, Blanchers Town, Dublin. Printed by Chambers and Hallagan, No. 4, Abbey-street, 1820." This is a volume containing 360 pages; have the goodness to see whether it relates to any other subject than the devotions to the Sacred Heart of Jesus?—Besides the devotions to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, this volume contains exercises for visiting the most Holy Sacrament, with an appendix on Indulgences; this I take to be the whole.

If the two books were put into the hands of any person connected with the Sodality of the Sacred Heart, which of the two would they think contained in the fullest manner the subject connected with their sodality?—The question seems to embrace two objects; 1st. Which of the two the Sodality of the Sacred Heart considers as of most authority. 2dly. Which contains the greater number of devotional practices; the authority of the books I fancy will be the same.

Which of the two do you consider as most strictly belonging to their sodality?—I cannot say one more than another; I fancy that some would prefer the little one, because it contains the rules of the sodality, and others the larger one, on account of the greater number of pious exercises.

Are they not more fully contained in the larger work to which you have been referred?—With regard to the length of the devotions, the latter one would be preferred.

Look to the book now put into your hand, and state what title-page it has?—"The Pious Sodality of the Most Sacred Heart of Jesus, universally propagated throughout the Christian World: fifth edition, improved with the approbation of Most Reverend Dr. Murray, A. B. Dublin. Printed by John Coyne, 24 Cooke Street, &c. 1825."

Does not that work appear to be a work approved by Dr. Murray?—Yes.

Do either of the other works which have been put into your hands appear to have been approved by Dr. Murray?—There is no evidence of any approbation of Dr. Murray being given to either of those two works.

Is not the work that appears to be approved of by Dr. Murray, that to which the members of that sodality would naturally look as the approved work?—Most certainly it would be considered by them as the most approved of all three.

You having supposed that the title-page was torn out of the first volume shewn to you, may not that title-page have contained the approbation of some competent authority?—I cannot say that it did not; nor can I say that it did.

Do you not think if there was an approval given by authority to publish it, that the printer or the publisher would have taken care in some part of the work or other to state it?—I think he ought to have done so, and such is the general usage.

Did the Sodality of the Sacred Heart exist in the college at Palermo, of which you have spoken?—No; it did not.

When you gave a spiritual Retreat at Maynooth, in assigning the meditations, did you not give instruction to all the members of the college?—I cannot say that all the members of the college were always present; but I should suppose that all the students were, who might not have been prevented from attending by indisposition, or other sufficient cause.

Are you aware that any person, except yourself, who was not a vice-president or professor, was ever called upon to conduct the Retreats at Maynooth?—Other persons have been called upon.

Was any person, a stranger to the institution, ever called upon to conduct the spiritual Retreats for the students?—Yes, other persons have been called upon.

Will you have the goodness to name them?—I am not aware who the persons may have been, but there must have been others.

The question is, whether those annual Retreats are not conducted by the President or Dean, and not by a stranger; the question meant to ascertain the fact whether you were the only person, being a stranger, who was marked by that distinction?—I cannot say that any other persons, who were not members of the house, were called in, or who were not vice-presidents.

The meaning of the Commissioners is to ascertain whether any of the officiating priests of Dublin, or any other place, have conducted the Retreats at Maynooth for the students?—I cannot say as to the Retreats for the students; whether any clergymen officiating in Dublin, or any other place, have been invited to conduct a Retreat.

Or any clergyman, except members of Maynooth?—I cannot say.

When Dr. Murray was President, and you were Vice President, was not he obliged by his duties as coadjutor Archbishop of Dublin, to be almost constantly absent from the college?—No, not almost constantly, sometimes; but not almost constantly.

Did he usually reside at Maynooth?—Yes, that was his residence.

You have said that the acceptance of the office of Vice President was attended with a considerable sacrifice of your own convenience, and that at the time you accepted it, you entertained a doubt whether you could continue at Maynooth so long as a year. Will you explain what you alluded to when you said it was a sacrifice of your convenience?—Of course I gave up my situation in the chapels in town which I then filled; I left my own house in Dublin, and exposed myself to all those inconveniences that are attendant on a man relinquishing a situation with which he is pleased, to take one which he did not seek, nor wished to have, and on leaving his own friends, to live amongst gentlemen who were utter strangers to him; other sources of inconvenience might be added, but these are surely sufficient to justify the assertion.

Was the purchase of Clongowes Wood effected while you were Vice President at Maynooth?—No, not until after I had left it.

Did you take any measures for collecting your present assistants at Clongowes, or any one to fill those stations in your establishment, while Vice President of the College at Maynooth?—No.

You have said that the society of Jesuits was restored in Sicily in the year 1804; that is, as we collect, ten years before it was restored generally by the Pope; had it been restored in a partial manner before it had been restored in Sicily?—It had.

State where?—In Russia.

Was there not a period of time in which that order was entirely suppressed, so that it did not exist in any country?—I cannot give a determinate answer; because there is a great doubt upon that question.

State the nature of that doubt?—The Jesuits were always preserved in Russia as a body of men living together, and exercising the duties of their institute. The Pope's brief of suppression did not make any exceptions in their favour; but the brief was never promulgated in Russia, as the sovereigns of Russia would not allow the brief to be enforced. Hence arises the doubt, whether it could be called a canonical suppression in Russia or not; for though the will of the Pope was that the order should be universally suppressed; yet the brief being a brief regarding discipline, there arises a question, whether it could be supposed to take effect where it had not been published.

In the countries where the Pope's bull had been published, did not the society continue in fact to exist, at least in some instances, though not avowedly under the name of Jesuits?—In no way whatever that I have learned; from all that I know, wherever the bull was published, the order was suppressed.

The question is whether they continued to live together in point of fact, though not under the name of Jesuits, yet conforming to the ancient rules of the order?—In no country that I know of did that take place; if there was any exception it would be in favour of one house in Rome, where the Pope allowed a few of the old men to remain together till they died off, but this instance cannot properly be deemed an exception, as these old men did not live there according to the ancient rules of the order.

You must be aware that it has been very generally stated, that the Jesuits continued in fact, though not in name, under the title of Pères de la Foi; are we to understand that this is quite erroneous?—It is quite erroneous.

Under what name did they continue to exist in Russia?—Under the name of Jesuits.

Was there no interruption to their continuance in Russia?—No interruption.

Are they not suppressed at present in Russia?—They are not, properly speaking, suppressed; they are exiled from Russia.

Does not the bull issued in 1814, restoring the order generally, refer to the previous restoration of it in Russia?—It does.

Did not we understand you to say that it had not been actually suppressed in Russia?—The question, as I understand it, has for its object to reconcile the reference in the Pope's bull of general restoration, with my assertion that the Jesuits were never suppressed in Russia. I stated when asked whether the whole body was not suppressed everywhere, that there was a doubt on that subject, and I stated that that doubt arose from the circumstance of the brief of suppression, which as far as regarded the will of the Pope was universal, not having been published in Russia, where the Jesuits de facto always remained; when the Pope chose to restore them universally, he referred to a restoration, or rather to an approbation which he effected by acknowledging those persons in Russia to be Jesuits in 1801. This act of the Pope is called a Restoration, because it was an authenticated declaration of the Pope, giving a canonical existence to those Jesuits, who de facto had always remained together, though from 1773 to 1801 they had not been recognized by Rome as a religious body.

Who at present is the general of the order of Jesuits?—Father Luigi Fortes.

Where does he reside?—At Rome.

In what year was he elected?—In 1820.

Who was his predecessor?—Father Thaddeus Brzozowski.

In what year was he elected?—I declare I cannot state with accuracy.

How many years had he been the general?—I should think he was elected about 1805 or 1806, somewhere thereabouts.

Were either of those persons in Ireland, so far as you can inform us, while they held the office of general of the Jesuits?—I believe they never crossed the Irish, or British channels, or ever saw either of them.

Is it at all possible that they should have been here without your knowing it?—If they had been here since I have been a Jesuit, I think I should have known it.

Examination of
Rev.

Peter Kenney,
8 December 1826.

IN referring to the book that we discussed yesterday, it appears in page 153 as follows:

"The two following propositions extracted from the acts and decrees of the diocesan council of Pistoia in Tuscany, are condemned by a brief of Pius 6th, Auctorem Fidei, dated 28th August 1794, and addressed to all the faithful." If you look to the two propositions, you will see that one is marked N° 62, and the other N° 63, do you know to what those two numbers refer, or of what series they are a part; the two propositions are as follow:

"Proposition 62. The doctrine which rejects the devotion to the most Sacred Heart of Jesus, placing it among the devotions it represents as new, erroneous, or at least dangerous. Being understood of that devotion, such as it is approved by the Apostolic See, is false, rash, pernicious, offensive to pious ears, injurious to the Apostolic See."

"Proposition 63. Moreover for this reason that it censures the worshippers of the Heart of Jesus, under the pretence that they do not consider that the most sacred flesh of Christ, or any part of it, or even the whole humanity, cannot be adored with the supreme worship due to God with any separation or abstraction from the divinity. As if the faithful should adore the heart of Jesus as separated from the divinity, when they adore it as the heart of Jesus; viz. the heart of the person of the Word to whom it is united inseparably, in the same manner as the lifeless body of Christ during the three days of his death, without separation or abstraction from the divinity, was truly adorable in the Sepulchre. Captious, injurious to the faithful worshippers of the heart of Jesus?"—These two propositions are part of a long sequel of propositions that are condemned by the document, which is here called a brief, and which should be called a bull, issued by Pius 6th in the condemnation of the diocesan synod of Pistoia. The propositions are not condemned in globo, each proposition has affixed to it the particular censure, which in the judgment of the Pope and the Catholic church it merited.

Do you understand that those two propositions are the only two of the series which allude to the devotion to the Sacred Heart?—I am not quite sure; but I rather think from the fact of their being transcribed into this book, that these are the only ones; for as the subject is the devotion to the Sacred Heart, I should think if there had been others, they also would have been inserted. But I am not quite certain that they are here accurately transcribed.

Was not the person who presided in that synod, Scipio de Ricci, bishop of Pistoia, of whom we were speaking yesterday?—Yes.

Did he not always assert that the true reason of his being condemned by the Pope was his constant hostility to the order of the Jesuits?—I do not know whether he complained that such was the cause of the Pope's displeasure with him; but I am very willing to believe, that he might easily make such a cause a pretext to cover the novelty of his opinions. That such however could not be the real and effectual cause is clear from this fact, that there were no Jesuits existing when he was condemned. For the society of Jesus was suppressed in the year 1773 by Clement the Fourteenth, and the displeasure of the Pope was expressed; and as far as I can recollect, the whole difference between the Holy See and the Bishop of Pistoia occurred in the following pontificate of Pius Sixth, who condemned him.

What is the date of the condemnation pronounced by the Pope?—It is stated to be in 1794.

By Pius the Sixth?—Yes.

When you were selected as Vice President of the College at Maynooth, were there any other members of the order of Jesuits in Ireland?—There were two.

While you were Vice President, did you communicate the circumstance of having been appointed to that office to the general of the order, or to any authority in the order, intermediate between the general and yourself?—I never made to him, or received from him any communication on the subject; and to this moment, I believe, that my appointment is as utterly unknown in that quarter as if it had not occurred.

If the general of the order had prescribed to you any particular course of conduct to pursue as Vice President in the shape of an order, would you have felt yourself bound to obey it?—No; unless such advice were conformable to all my other duties there, and such advice as I would have taken from any other friend.

The question is, whether the peculiar duties you were called upon to perform there as Vice President fell under the jurisdiction of the general of your order, so as to entitle him to interfere if he had so thought fit?—The duties of my office there could not in any way be under his jurisdiction, but he has a right to give me advice on every subject on which he may think right to advise me; but I have no obligation to follow that advice, unless my conscience tells me it is conformable to every other duty I have to discharge.

Would you have felt yourself bound to obey implicitly his commands, if those commands did not transgress the rules of your order?—I should not feel myself so bound on every occasion that might possibly occur, because, though the command might not transgress any rule, literally and separately taken, yet it might be in conflict with some other duty.

Can you give any instance as an illustration of what you allude to?—The rule of the order order may be supposed to be merely the letter of the law as contained in the rule; now that rule does not expressly tell me to honour my father or mother; there then is a duty not included in the rule, which I am bound to discharge. Now by possibility the superior might give an order, which would be within the strict letter of the rule of the order, and at the same time be in conflict with this other duty; and if so, I should not be bound to obey that command; such is the illustration that occurs to me. The rule of the order from the beginning to the end does not contain the Lord's Prayer; now suppose the general were to give me an order not to say the Lord's Prayer, it might be said there was nothing in the rule of the order literally assumed to prevent him giving that direction; and yet if he were to give me such an order as that, I should not comply with it, because it would be against a known duty.

If he were to give you a command with respect to which there might be a doubt, whether it was in conflict with any other duty or not, should you have felt yourself at liberty to resolve that doubt?—Most certainly, in such a case it would lie on my conscience to apply to the best advice I could procure, in the same way as any discreet person would apply to the best advice he could get in a case of difficulty.

Should you in that case be at liberty to apply for advice to any person you please?—To any person whom in my conscience I thought proper to consult, whether bishop, priest, or layman.

Suppose that the general of the order were to take exception to the oath of allegiance in this country, and desire his inferior in this country not to take it, must he obey; the question supposes that the inferior has not taken the oath at the time he receives the superior's command?—If I had a doubt in my own mind of the propriety of the oath that was to be administered, I should act as I would in the case before mentioned; if I had no doubt, I would take it; for allegiance is a duty which a subject owes to his sovereign before any other obligation is contracted, whether to bishop, or superior, and he is therefore already bound by that prior duty.

Suppose the general of the order were to admit the principle that allegiance was due by the inferior in this country to the sovereign; but to take objection to the particular form of the oath of allegiance, he having been apprized of the form of oath, not through any application made to him by his inferior for advice, but from other sources; the question is, in that state of things, were he to think proper to issue his command to his inferior, not to take that particular form of oath, would the inferior in the case put, be at liberty to take it?—He would be perfectly at liberty to take it, if he had sufficient grounds to believe that the oath was otherwise lawful. The way he is to ascertain whether there are just grounds or not for admitting a particular form of oath is, not by applying to his religious superior, who is not the proper tribunal for deciding on the lawfulness or unlawfulness of an oath; he should go to the proper tribunal, which is the judgment of the bishops. No religious superior in the Catholic church, who is not a bishop, is a judge in matters relating to faith and morals. The inferior should therefore apply to the bishop, and if he tell him that such oath is consonant to the principles of Catholic faith, or rather to be more explicit, that it contains nothing repugnant to the truths of divine revelation as held in the Catholic church, then such religious inferior would not only be justified in taking that oath, but be bound to do it when required by the laws of his country.

Has the general of your order the power of dispensing his inferiors from any particular description of oaths that they may have taken?—He has a power delegated to him by the Holy See in certain cases. I should rather say, he may have it; I do not know that he has it, but I know that the Holy See is frequently in the habit of delegating to religious superiors the power of dispensing in certain kinds of oaths or vows. These oaths or vows are private engagements by which a man binds himself, without reference to any other person; for instance, if an inferior made an oath, or made a vow to fast upon certain days in the week, to go upon a certain pilgrimage—these being acts that merely restricted his own will, and being judged to be inconsistent with his other obligations, then, if the Pope had delegated that power to him, which the Pope has jure proprio, the general would have, in virtue of this delegated power, a right of declaring that such oaths were not binding under these circumstances. Perhaps I might be allowed to say, as a general principle, that no general of any religious order has any right of interference whatever in granting dispensations, or any exercise of spiritual power, but what the Pope may please to grant to him.

And which the Pope is at liberty to withdraw at any time?—Whenever he thinks proper, he is at liberty to modify, restrict or withdraw it.

Were the vows by which you were bound while you were Vice President at Maynooth, the same as existed in the order of the Jesuits prior to its suppression?—The vows which I had taken prior to the period when I was Vice President of Maynooth, existed in the old society; the same form of vows was pronounced before the suppression that is pronounced now.

The question means to ascertain whether you were bound, when Vice President at Maynooth, by all the vows that then existed in the society?—Not by all, for there is a gradation amongst us from a less sacred to a more sacred obligation. There are some vows called simple vows, others that are called solemn vows.

Pray explain the nature of the distinction?—The simple vows are rather a private act of consecration, by which the individual who makes them devotes himself to God. They have neither the stability, nor in general the extent, which the solemn vows are understood to have. A solemn vow is the last and the most solemn consecration that man can make of himself; and such consecration must be accepted by the authority of the church; it thereby becomes a public act to which the church is a party as well as the person who makes these vows—whereas a simple vow is merely the private act of an individual.

Appendix, N° 50.

Examination of Rev.Peter Kenney,

Are we to understand that at the time of your vice presidency, you were bound by the solemn vows?—By the simple vows, but not by the solemn.

Were you bound by all the simple vows that existed in the old order, prior to its suppression?—No; there are many simple vows attached, in addition to the solemn vows, which are taken only by those who take the solemn vows. In a word, I was only bound by the ordinary vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, which all Religious make, with this difference, that they were simple, instead of being solemn.

Is there not at least one vow in addition to these by which the order of Jesuits is bound, which does not bind the other regulars?—The Jesuits make four solemn vows; the fourth vow is that of obedience to the Pope.

It is to that vow to which the question applied?—The fourth solemn vow which the Jesuits take, in addition to the three vows that are made by all regulars, is pronounced in these words: “Promitto specialem obedientiam summo pontifici, circa missiones.”

Is that the whole of the fourth vow?—Yes, it is.

Is that the whole of all vows, whether simple or solemn, of a professed member of the order, taken to the Pope?—The whole; there is no other vow taken to the Pope, and since it is required, I will explain in what sense that vow is taken. The Jesuits understand by this vow that they bind themselves, as far as they have the free disposal of themselves, to go upon any foreign mission, to announce the gospel, if the Pope chose to send them on such mission*.

Are they not equally bound to go upon foreign missions, if the general of the order should send them, without any intervention of the Pope?—They are not so specially bound, because upon that they do not make a particular vow; but if there were no legitimate impediment to prevent their going, they would be bound to go by the vow of obedience, if the general sent them; and this obligation is not peculiar to the Jesuits, any more than to any other regulars who pronounce the vow of obedience, and are of a missionary institute.

Be so good as to explain the full import of the term “specialem” in the vow?—It signifies no more than this, that those who make this solemn promise, contract an obligation of obedience which they did not before owe to the Pope by vow.

Pray define the word missiones?—The words in the vow, circa missiones, signify any place to which the Jesuit may be sent for missionary purposes.

Is not the Roman Catholic church in Ireland considered as one of those missions?—No, it does not mean that, it means missions, at least I have always understood it, though I never heard the question proposed before, but I always understood it to mean infidel countries.

In point of fact, is not the Roman Catholic church in Ireland denominated the Irish Mission?—It is.

Is not Ireland considered a missionary country, as contra-distinguished from a country where the Roman Catholic church exists?—It is called a missionary country, because it is usually so called by the Congregation de Propaganda Fide, which is the channel through which this country corresponds with the Holy See. It is usual with that congregation to call all countries missionary, the government of which is not Catholic; in this sense the words “missionary country” are used, but I have always understood that the word missiones in the vow, to mean countries where you went to preach the gospel; to the Hindoos, for instance, or any other more remote countries where the Christian religion is established. When I express myself in this manner I do it so as my opinion, and as the impression of my mind at this moment; it never occurred to me to put the question upon the proposition.

Is not Great Britain a missionary country as well as Ireland?—Yes, more so perhaps, in the sense in which the word is used by the Propaganda, but I think that the sense in which the word missiones is used in the vow of which we are speaking, does not regard the religion of the government, or of the country, though the foreign missions of infidel countries are its principal and most meritorious object.

What is the correlative term to missionary; what term do you apply to countries where the Roman Catholic religion exists, and which are not considered as missionary countries?—In the curial style of the Propaganda, such countries are called Catholic, and they communicate with Rome through the papal nuncio, or through any of the other congregations to which the business to be transacted may more specially appertain. In countries where the religion of the State is Catholic, I suppose the term missionary would not apply. There is one case, however, which may form an exception, and that is the state of the Netherlands, which is a very recent case. Though the Netherlands are a Catholic country, yet as the government is not now Catholic, I do not know whether the Propaganda would call it a missionary country or not. I do not know the fact; I know that they call Holland a missionary country, but whether this particular instance of the Netherlands would be an exception to the general statement which I have made, I am not aware.

Japan and China were always considered as strictly missionary countries, were they not?—
They

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

* As for instance, to go to America, to India, or to Turkey. This is the principal and the most difficult object of the vow; but it is also understood to oblige the Jesuit, who makes it, to go for the same purpose to any country, whether it be Catholic or A Catholic, Christian or Infidel.

They were always considered missionary and foreign; they were always called foreign missions.

Can a foreign country be a missionary country if there is no mission in it; for instance, Japan, at present?—They are denominated missions from being objects of missions, whether actual missions or not. In the sense of the word used in the vow, they are considered to be missionary countries.

We are seeking at present for a definition of the term missionary, as understood in Roman Catholic theology, and not confining it merely to the expression in the vow; are all pagan countries considered missionary countries, where, in point of fact, no missions may have been sent to them; for instance, any nation in central Africa?—Theology is not concerned in this use of the word missionary. I take it to be rather a mode of speaking that is adopted in the ecclesiastical offices, to distinguish one country from another; to distinguish a country where the government is Catholic, from a country the government of which is not Catholic. Taking it up with this distinction, all foreign countries, though they may not have ever been visited by missionaries, are actually missionary countries, because such countries are the objects of missions.

Can you point out any difference in the sense in which Ireland is called a missionary country, from that in which Japan may be called a missionary country?—No; inasmuch as it is a missionary country, I do not see any difference, except that the one is more peculiarly a missionary country than the other; substantially, there is not any difference in the sense in which the term is used in reference to this country.

Do you now, upon mature reflection, consider that the word missiones, in your vow, can have any reference to Japan that it has not to Britain and Ireland?—The meaning of the words, as declared by the constitutions, not being left to the mere letter, when I gave the explanation of the meaning of the word missiones, I did it from my impression that all constitutions among us used the word in that acceptation, and that it was the common understanding.

Then are we to collect, that in your constitutions you understand the word as excluding the British islands from being comprehended in it?—I do not consider them to be comprehended in it*.

Has not the Roman Catholic church in Ireland, although Ireland is considered a missionary country, to all intents and purposes in the eye of the See of Rome, a church having all the settled rights of a church, with a hierarchy, the bishops of which are bishops in ordinary?—As much as in any country in the world.

Is the distinction altogether nominal, as used in the different ecclesiastical offices, or attended with any practical results, and what are they?—I take the distinction not to be merely nominal, for I think there is a great difference between a country where the government is Catholic and where it is not Catholic; but I trace the use of the word to the office; I think it is from the manner in which it is used in the office, that the term is come to be applied to these countries: the office De Propaganda is the channel through which all countries where the Catholic religion is not established by law, whether they have a Catholic hierarchy, or are supplied by missionary priests and bishops, communicate with the Holy See; and therefore all those countries are in the sense of that word denominated missionary countries, merely from the peculiar regulation of the See of Rome, which for the more easy dispatch of business, divides the nations of the world into two classes; namely, those whose governments are Catholic and those whose governments are not Catholic; I do not, therefore, derive the distinction from the existence or the non-existence of a Catholic hierarchy; for though there does exist in this country a Catholic hierarchy as fixed and permanent, and as independent of the control of the Pope, as that which exists in any country on the globe, still the official expression in the Propaganda is, that it is a missionary country†.

If

* Mr. Kenney, after his evidence had been given, addressed a letter to the Commissioners, from which the following is an extract:

“When I was asked if the missions mentioned in the vow included such countries as Great Britain, I gave it as my opinion that they did not. It will be seen, that I gave that answer from the impression then existing in my mind, and stated, that as I never had occasion of reflecting on the question, I could only speak from the recollection and feeling of the moment; that impression was, that the vow was restricted to the foreign or infidel missionary countries. The great cause and the grand object of the vow are most certainly these foreign countries. There was no necessity of providing for the home missions by the obligation of a vow, as they are already supplied by an indigenous clergy, and are comparatively attended with less danger and difficulty to the missionary. Hence in all the explanations and instructions given in the course of our education on this vow, the foreign or infidel missions were solely proposed, as being the main difficulty and the main object of the vow; this imperceptibly led me to have the idea that they were the exclusive objects of the vow, so that the Jesuit who had made it, was not obliged to go vi hujus voti to any other than an infidel country. On reference however to parts of our institute, which did not make any impression on my mind when I before read them, I find that the vow extends to all countries, whether Christian or Infidel, and that consequently he who makes it, is bound to go whithersoever he is sent for missionary purposes.”

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

† This explanation is moreover confirmed by the fact that the Greek Catholics, the Poles, who are now subject to Russia, Canada and the United States, have each a regular hierarchy; yet all these bishops, though they govern the churches over which they preside jure proprio, like all other diocesan bishops, communicate with the Holy See through the Propaganda, which consequently considers those countries as missionary countries.

Appendix, N° 50.

Examination of

Rev

Peter Kenney,

8 December 1826.

If the Pope, referring to the particular vow of special obedience about missions by which the members of the order are bound, were to desire any particular Jesuits to repair to the British islands, do you conceive that they would be bound to obey that command?—Not by that vow, if such a mission as that of the British islands were not included in the word missiones *.

The question is intended to afford a criterion by which we may ascertain what is the meaning of the word missiones?—No; because the meaning of the word missiones is not taken from the manner in which the Propaganda used the word, but from the plain authorized sense in which the vow is pronounced.

Are we to understand from former answers, that there are different gradations in the order of Jesuits, and that some of the ranks of that order are bound by a greater number of simple and solemn vows than others are?—Yes.

It is so?—Yes, it is.

We are not sure whether it appears distinctly by how many vows you were yourself bound when you were Vice President of the College of Maynooth?—The simple vows which I had taken when I was Vice President of the College of Maynooth, were the usual vows that members of religious orders make; namely, the vows of poverty, chastity and obedience, with the promise of entering the society and remaining therein.

And no others?—No other.

How many in all?—The three religious vows and that promise.

Were you at any period of time at which you have communicated spiritual instruction at Maynooth, bound by any greater number of vows than those you have now stated?—I was bound, when I gave the last instructions at Maynooth, and perhaps the time before, by a greater number of vows than those I had taken when I was Vice President.

State the number of those additional vows?—I think there will be four in addition, which will make the entire number seven. There are three vows which I have already mentioned, that are called the usual religious vows,—there is the fourth vow, that I have also explained relating to missions; those are all the solemn vows. There is besides a simple vow regarding poverty, and another vow never to seek any dignity nor promotion either in the society or out of it; and another, never to accept of any, unless compelled by the authority of him who can command under sin.

Have you stated all?—All.

What rank did you hold in the order of Jesuits when you were Vice President?—I was then a priest of the order, I cannot call it a rank, unless the question be intended to ascertain whether I had the spiritual direction of any others of the same order that might happen to be in this country; I have already stated there were only two.

Had you any members of the order under your command at the time of being Vice President, or at any time when you have given spiritual instruction at Maynooth?—Yes, I had; I had those two, when I was Vice President, and others since then.

Pray describe what situation or rank you held in the order when you were Vice President of Maynooth, in relation to both the highest and lowest ranks in the order?—The lowest classes in the society are scholars and lay brothers; I was a priest of the society, I could only rank as a priest of the society, or a local superior of the few in this country.

By the question, it was meant to inquire what intermediate ranks there were at that time between the general of the order and yourself?—There were many ranks; because I had no other than what I have just stated. Perhaps the question means to elicit whether there was any intermediate superior between me and the general.

That is a part of it, but in order to answer the question, it would be necessary to state all the ranks that existed in the order at the time?—There is the general; then there are the provincials, who are the heads of the provinces; then the local superiors; those are all the gradations of authority, to ascertain which, I believe is the object of the question.

You are a local superior?—Yes.

Are there not also scholars in Ireland?—They have no gradation of authority,—the priest has no particular authority; the gradations are the general, the provincial and local superior.

The general, at the time in question, you have already stated to have been a Pole of the name of Brzozowski, pray who was the provincial next in gradation between that general and yourself?—There was no provincial.

Are we to understand there was no provincial, either in Great Britain or Ireland?—There was no provincial between me and the general,—the gradations of authority regard the order as a body, as a regularly formed body; the Jesuits in Ireland never have been such a regularly formed body,—they are no more than a few missionaries, and all the official authority that is held, is merely the authority of direction invested in some one of those persons, but there is no provincial. The Jesuits have been at all times in Ireland much in the same way, as any two or three men would be who might be sent to America to preach the gospel and serve the Catholic churches in that country.

Then are we to understand that there is no provincial, either in Great Britain or Ireland?—There is no provincial between the superior in Ireland and the general, but I have nothing to say about Great Britain.

Are

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

* If the question supposes them to be sent for the purposes for which alone the vow is made, viz. to discharge the spiritual duties of a missionary, I conceive that they would be bound, as the vow makes no exception of any place; though infidel countries are its chief and most cherished object.

Are you local superior in Ireland?—Yes.

And as such have authority, as we understand, over those whom you have described as the priests of the order and scholars?—If there were any.

How do you mean if there were any?—The superior would have authority over any Jesuits that might happen to be in Ireland, whatever their designation might be; if he be their superior, he has authority over them.

Taking the last period at which you communicated any spiritual instruction at Maynooth, pray state what number of the order, subject to you, existed in Ireland at that time?—The number of priests, and of those who may become priests, must have been less than twenty; but if we are to include the domestics or lay brothers, then the entire number may have been about thirty.

Are we to understand from the former answers, that according to the constitution of the order, the local superior in Ireland might not be subject to a provincial residing in another country, suppose in France or Spain?—If the country in which he resided formed a part of the province, then he might become subject to the provincial.

But the question comes back, whether the Pope might not assign Ireland to that which he might call a province, the province of Spain for instance?—The thing is possible; there is nothing absolutely impossible in such an arrangement, but it would be so absurd a regulation, that it may be deemed absolutely impracticable.

In point of fact, does Ireland belong to any other province?—No; it is not under the jurisdiction of any provincial.

Pray in what country did you first take the vows belonging to the order?—I first took the vows in England.

In what year?—In the year 1806.

The order of the Jesuits had not been restored in England at that time?—Not restored universally till 1814. I stated yesterday that there were partial restorations,—there was one in Naples in 1804; in 1801, the restoration or recognition of the Jesuits, who still existed in Russia, occurred; after this restoration, there was a belief that persons might be aggregated to the society existing in Russia; this however became a controverted point, which occasioned me in 1808 to go to Palermo, where I formally and certainly became aggregated to the body.

We understood you to state yesterday, that the partial restoration in Sicily was confined to that Island?—To Naples and Sicily.

Could you at that time have become a professed Jesuit in France or Spain?—Not according to the founded opinion that the restoration in Russia, Naples and Sicily, limited the whole order to these kingdoms.

Was not that owing to the fact that the order had not been revived in France and Spain?—It was owing precisely to the fact, that the Pope's briefs confined the restoration of the order to certain countries.

Was there any facility, then either theoretical or practical, to becoming a professed member of the order in England at that time, rather than in France or Spain, in which as we collect, it would have been impossible to enter the order?—No other facility than that there was a belief that the vows being made any where, would effect an aggregation to the body that existed in Russia, which belief was rendered doubtful by the fact of the limitation of the order to Russia, and therefore to remove all doubt about it, as far as I was concerned, I went to Sicily.

And took the vows there?—And took the vows there; so that I make this explanation merely to be perfectly accurate, being so solemnly interrogated on these matters on my oath; but perhaps for all purposes for which inquiry could be made, I should be quite justified in saying that I became a Jesuit when I went to Sicily; what passed before, was rather a matter of private devotion, and I feel considerably, that those acts of private devotion, which did not connect me ostensibly or effectually with any body of men at the time, should be put on the record of public minutes.

Did you consider any obligations, which you had taken previously to going to Palermo, as binding upon you in foro conscientiae?—When I took the vows, I certainly considered them to be valid, because I believed them to have been authorized by the competent authority; but when this fact became doubtful, the obligation of the vow became also doubtful.

Did you take the vows again in Palermo?—The same vows again, and became aggregated there indubitably.

Is there any country in the world in which you do not consider the society to be now re-established?—As far as the validity of its vows is concerned, it is re-established all over the world.

By force of the Pope's bull of 1814?—By force of the Pope's bull of 1814; we are to distinguish between the spiritual aggregation of a number of religious in what is called a religious order, and the civil establishment which that body obtains in any particular country. It very frequently happens that the meaning of the word re-established, confounds those two ideas, which are evidently distinct. By the bull of 1814, the Pope makes it lawful for any number of men to take the vows of the order of the Jesuits in any country whatsoever; but they cannot have civil rights in that capacity, or be recognised, unless the state thinks proper to do so by some act of its own.

Does not the re-establishment of the order in any particular country depend upon the fact whether the bull has been published in that country?—Yes; as a canon of discipline, it does depend on the bull of restoration being received in that country or not.

Can you state whether the Pope's bull has been published in this country?—It never has been

Appendix, No 50.

Examination of Rev.Peter Kenney,

been published in this country. There is a difference in the manner in which briefs or bulls of discipline take effect in different countries. It is not necessary that a bull of the Pope should be always openly and formally promulgated and accepted. In countries where such bulls have a connection with civil rights and ecclesiastical establishments, as with the bishops court, the prerogative court, and such other courts, then, a formal acceptance becomes necessary. In other countries, where no civil right can be acquired by the practice of that which is enjoined by such a bull, there is not the same reason for a formal or public acceptance, and canons of discipline, or bulls concerning discipline, frequently take effect by practice.

By practice?—Yes; and are allowed to be acted upon.

Do you consider that this bull for the re-establishing the order of Jesuits as taking effect by practice, though not by publication, in Ireland?—I have never heard of any opposition made to it.

Was the college at Palermo, of which you were a member, exclusively under the management of individuals belonging to the order of the Jesuits?—Exclusively.

Did all the students in that college belong to the order?—Those who resided in what is properly called the college, were of the same order; but there was a part of the house which was allotted to the education of young noblemen, who did not belong to the order.

Had the college existed prior to the restoration in 1804?—It had.

How soon after the restoration of the order, did it become occupied by the order of Jesuits?—I believe immediately.

Where had the individual superiors been immediately before their restoration?—At their own houses; they were employed individually in their own occupations, or in various situations.

But were they not in the same college?—No; not before the restoration. The establishment had formerly belonged to the Jesuits before the suppression, but had not been occupied by them in the interim between the suppression and the restoration.

How was it occupied during the six months prior to the restoration of the order?—As a college; it had become the university of the city.

Was it under the management of the same superiors during the six months prior, as it was the six months after the restoration?—No; they were entirely different persons. I do not know whether any of the many, who became Jesuits after the restoration, might not have been previously members of the university; but if any, they must have been only a few individuals.

The question is, as to whether the individuals who had practically the management and superintendence of the college, as professed Jesuits, immediately after the restitution of the order, were the same individuals, or not, who had practically the superintendence of the college previously?—By no means.

Are we to understand that the individuals who had had the superintendence and management of the college prior to the restoration of the order, were sent away, or proceeded to other places where the order was re-established?—The college prior to the restoration, in 1804, was the college or university of the city, composed of lay men and secular priests; when the King thought proper to re-establish the Jesuits, he provided these laymen and priests with another house; and he restored to the Jesuits their own old house.

Then we are to understand that different individuals came into the house on the restoration of the order?—Quite different.

Can you tell us generally, how those individuals who then took possession of the college, had been occupied before the restoration of the order?—I suppose as men usually are who live in their own homes; some of them had been secular priests, and some of them had been brought up, and under the care of their parents, until the day on which they entered amongst the Jesuits.

Had they been employed in different countries?—Their number was composed of natives of different countries, who consequently had previously lived in different places, but they had not been engaged in any common undertaking; nor were they in any way aggregated together, from the time of the suppression of the society until the time of its restoration; many of them were members of the old society, who lived as private individuals in the best way that they could.

What might be the annual expense of a student educated at Palermo, when you were there?—I cannot exactly say; but I should suppose that the annual expense might have been 40*l.* a year, or 50*l.* a year; for a Jesuit student, I should think it would not exceed from 40*l.* to 50*l.*

Can you state it from your own experience?—I think that my expenses did not exceed that. I think students might be supported in Palermo, at the rate of from 30*l.* to 40*l.* per year, or at the most 50*l.*; as there are different gradations in different houses.

Do you think in general it costs about that?—Yes; I think so.

In this particular college, of which you were a member, was the expense of the student about that sum?—I think in the particular college of which I speak, the education of each student did cost from thirty to forty British pounds a year.

Did it cost that to the college or the student?—All the colleges of the society that are founded, have always property annexed or given to them by the state.

They are endowed?—All colleges of the society are endowed colleges; and that is so essential to us, that we can have no college properly so called, that is not an endowed college.

Is it so endowed as to enable it to afford gratuitous education?—Education is given gratuitously gratuitously to the members of the province to which the college belongs, according to the extent of its funds

Are there at this time any students intended for the Irish priesthood in the college of Palermo, so far as you are informed?—Not that I know of.

Do you know any other colleges under the management of the Jesuits abroad, in which students are educated for the Irish priesthood?—There are colleges abroad in which there are students, who most probably will become missionaries in Ireland.

What period of your education did you pass at Stonyhurst?—About three years.

Pray state the period?—From the end of the year 1804, to the beginning of the year 1808.

You went to Palermo after that?—In that year.

Had not Stonyhurst existed under the same management for a considerable period, antecedent to that under which it existed when you entered?—It had.

Were not the superintendents members of the society, when you were there?—I cannot say that they were, for the reason I gave before; nor can I say that they are members now, I could not say they were members then; because there was no bull or brief, nor any authentic document at that time which had emanated from the Holy See, restoring the order; nor can I say that there are any members there now, because I cannot say, that the bull of the universal restoration is really accepted, or acted upon in England.

But your answer does not mean to imply any doubt that the individuals are bound by the vows of the order in foro conscientie?—I have given a reason, why I cannot say, whether they are Jesuits now or not; if the bull has no force there, they are not Jesuits now, nor were they Jesuits then, if competent authority had not united them together, as members of a religious order.

Are not the individuals at Stonyhurst in this situation, that if properly recognized by the bull, they are to all intents and purposes members of the order?—Yes, if the bull were accepted in the country, and that they were aggregated; and this would be equally true of any other individuals.

Is it matter of doubt whether the bull has been accepted in England?—It is so far so, that I understand the apostolic vicars say, that it is not accepted.

Were the works of Bellarmine put into your hand, either at Palermo, or at Stonyhurst?—They were not; but I have consulted them in the same manner as I have other authors.

Of course, since you have ceased to be a student, your investigation has been extensive, but were those works suggested to you as forming part of the course of education?—They formed no part of the course of education.

Were they suggested to you as works to be referred to?—The works of Bellarmine in general, have been highly and deservedly commended; but I beg leave to say, if the questions lead to the doctrine of the deposing power, I am quite ready to give a direct answer.

Were the subjects connected with the doctrine, distinguished by the name Ultra-montane, discussed at Palermo or Stonyhurst?—I do not know what doctrines may be designated by the name of Ultra-montane; but I know that I have not imbibed, or learned, or believed any doctrines at any time or period of my education, that are contrary to the oaths and declarations of allegiance which Catholics take in this country. The doctrines on which I might be supposed to hold any particular opinions, and that are sworn to in the oath of allegiance, I take to be the doctrine of the deposing power, including the assumed right of dispensing with the oath of allegiance, and the doctrine of the infallibility of the Pope. With regard to the doctrine of the deposing power, I declare that in my whole life I have never heard that doctrine proposed, expounded, explained, or in any way whatsoever discussed in any school in which I have ever been; and as far as my knowledge reaches, I do believe that the doctrine of the deposing power, including the assumed right of dispensing with oaths of allegiance, is not taught at the present time in any school, college, or university in the world. I cannot recollect to have heard that doctrine introduced, or intimated, or spoken of, even in private conversation among the Jesuits, except as an obsolete opinion, not now believed by any one, and never to be hereafter revived. The assertion contained in the oath of allegiance, that it is not an article of Catholic faith to believe that the Pope is infallible, is a doctrine which Jesuits as well as all other Catholics maintain; but the proposition which asserts that the Pope is infallible, when, loquens ex cathedrâ, he decides, that such or such a doctrine is an article of Catholic faith, is an opinion which each man is free to hold whose conscience and judgment lead him to that conclusion: and I beg leave here to add, that as a Jesuit I am not bound to hold this opinion, nor am I bound to hold any doctrine, or any opinions, or maintain any assertions whatsoever, that every other Catholic is not bound to hold and to maintain. I am free to avow, that in fact a great number of Jesuits maintain the doctrine that the Pope, speaking (as the schoolmen say) from the chair, in which he teaches the whole church, is so far assisted by the Spirit of God, as to be preserved from error, when he thus propounds a dogma of faith to the whole church; but they defend this position as private theologians, exercising their own judgment in a matter on which the supreme authority of the church has not pronounced a definitive sentence; nor are they bound to support this doctrine, even as matter of opinion by any law, or by any statute, or by any vow, or by any obligation, that does not arise from their own free and full conviction. They enjoy, in this respect, the same liberty as other Catholic theologians who teach the same opinion, and as those also, who without censure defend the contrary assertion. I look upon this question to be a speculative rather than a practical one; I have not, therefore, ever given to it that time and attention that would enable me to swear, were I even interrogated by my bishop, that the Pope is infallible, speaking ex cathedrâ; for the question here is not about infallibility residing in the church, nor about the advantages or the disadvantages of believing in this infallibility, since all Catholics believe that the church, that is, the body of bishops with the Pope at their head, are infallible when they propound dogmas of faith. The question is not, then, whether the privilege is attached to the body of pastors, with the Pope at their head, but whether it resides in the Pope before the assent of the body of pastors is known. Now, however obnoxious the tenet of infallibility may appear to a statesman, or to a politician, he cares not whether it be considered to rest with the Pope alone, or with the bishops united to the Pope, if it be certain that the Pope and the bishops will always agree in the same decision; such is, however, the fact. In eighteen centuries, amongst the almost innumerable definitions that have been addressed by the Holy See to the whole church, there is not one in which the bishops did not finally agree. Hence the abettors of the opinion that the Pope is infallible in propounding dogmas of faith to the whole church, always maintain that the providence of God will secure that the bishops shall join with him, so that, in point of fact, whether the Pope speaks first, or the Pope and the bishops speak together, they will always be united in judgment; and the result will be, that the decree or dogma propounded will be received as infallible. Of this we have a splendid instance in the bull Auctorem Fidei, so often mentioned in these examinations; it was addressed to the whole church by Pius the Sixth in 1794, and every dogmatical definition which it contains has long since been venerated as the infallible judgment of the Catholic church. How, then, can the interests of society, or of the state, be more involved in the question of the Pope's infallibility than they are in that of the infallibility of the Catholic church, which we all receive as an article of faith? If the Pope, loquens ex cathedrâ, be not infallible, his doctrine will still be unchangeable, and in a little time the judgment of the bishops will proclaim that at least he spoke an infallible truth. The agreement, then, between the Pope and the bishops, in matters of faith, is the practical result of Catholic principles, while a difference of judgment, to say the most of it, is a theory that is merely possible. As far, then, as the social system may be supposed to be interested in the tenet of infallibility, the infallibility of the Pope cannot in practice be distinguished from that of the church.

Were you taught, either at Palermo or at Stonyhurst, that the Pope was infallible, when speaking ex cathedrâ?—The proposition did not come in the regular course of study; I recollect that it was not to be found in the printed authors that contained the entire course of our theological studies; but I am not quite sure that the professor, as is commonly the case where there is a printed course of studies, might not have expressed his own opinion, or at least given arguments for and against it. I am, however, quite certain, that he left every one to follow the opinion that each one, after mature consideration, deemed best, and thus each man exercises his own judgment in deducing arguments for his opinion from the Holy Scriptures, and from the authorities cited in the defence of either side of the question.

The question was rather whether any particular doctrines taught in those places of instruction, with regard to that point, were of that character as would naturally lead a young man to adopt the idea that the Pope was infallible, always admitting it was a matter of freedom whether he should believe it or not?—I do not recollect any other instruction, public or private, given for that object. In private conversations, opinions may have been incidentally expressed that might influence young men to adopt it as a grave opinion, just as any senior, by his arguments in such conversations, might influence the opinion of a junior, who may be supposed to pay a deference to the opinion of a man more learned than himself, and thereby he might be led to examine the question more minutely than he had hitherto done.

Who was the author principally referred to?—Antoine's Theologia Dogmatica, &c.

What book of moral theology was read at Palermo?—One part of the time, Busembaum; and at another period the works of De Ligorio. At the same time that these books were made, as I may call them, the class books, the students were allowed to study any other books on the same subject; and to adopt what might appear to them the better and the safer solution of any doubt, even though it did not agree with the solution contained in the Class Book; there was full liberty for every person to hold his own private opinions upon any subject on which all Catholics were not bound to agree.

Are we in error in supposing, that the works of Busembaum maintain the deposing power of the Pope in temporals?—His only work is the "Medulla Theologiæ Moralis," which does not contain a single assertion on the deposing power. The discussion of that opinion does not appertain to a course of moral theology*.

Is not Busembaum understood to be one of the writers of the order of the Jesuits, who has been the most objected to by persons not belonging to the order?—He was most wantonly and maliciously abused by the French party, who were raging for the destruction of the Jesuits, about the middle of the last century. The frequent repetition of the calumny has deceived many, who took no interest in examining into the truth of the statement. He was accused of teaching what is called the regicide doctrine, though the question is not once introduced in the whole course of his work. The only proposition that could even by any contortion of its true meaning be made to support the charge, is the following one. When discussing the right of self defence against an unjust aggressor, he gives this solution, which he borrows from authors who had written before him: "Ad defensionem vitæ, et integritatis"

* Busembaum also wrote after 1626, when Vitelleschi, the then general of the Jesuits, strictly forbade that question to be proposed in the schools, or to be treated by the writers of the society.

integritatis membrorum, licet etiam filio, religioso, et subdito, se tueri, si opus sit, cum occisione contra ipsum parentem, abbatem, principem: nisi forte propter mortem hujus, secutura essent magna incommoda, ut bella, &c. Sylva, Bonacina. Lib. 3. Trac. 4. Dub. 3. c. 1. p. 8. ed. 1729." In the early editions of the work, there are many propositions, which like the preceding one, had been previously taught by many others: and in his preface, he begs that their insertion may not be taken as an approval or a recommendation from him: he cites them as he found them in reputable authors, that the clergy, for whose use the work is solely intended, may judge of their value. Some of these opinions were censured as scandalous and pernicious in practice, by Alexander VII. and by Innocent XI., in 1679. In every edition posterior to this sentence, these propositions have been either wholly omitted, or distinguished by a reference to the list of condemned propositions. None of them however has any connexion with either the deposing or the regicide doctrine.

Can you recollect the date of those modern editions of Busembaum?—There is one printed at Bassano in 1816: and another I believe so late as 1822 at Mecklin: both editions have the commentary of De Ligorio, the Bishop of Saint Agatha, on the text of Busembaum.

Could you supply us from your own library with any of the modern editions of Busembaum?—The work is in this country. I have no difficulty to let the work be seen by any gentleman who wishes to examine it. I do not think it is to be got at the booksellers.

Was any thing taught you at Palermo or Stonyhurst, with respect to the extent of the power which the See of Rome held over Protestants by reason of their baptism?—I do not recollect any proposition of that kind being proposed in the course of our education.

Were not the decrees of the Council of Trent very fully explained in the course of your education?—No doubt; they are always cited as decisive authority.

Is it not part of one of the canons of the Council, that if any one should say, that those that are baptized are free from all the precepts of the holy church, either written, or delivered by tradition, so that they are not obliged to observe them, unless they will submit to them of their own act, let him be accursed—and afterwards in the 14th canon, in the same part of the Council, "if any one should say, that those baptized children, when they grow up, are to be asked whether they will confirm what their godfathers promised, and if they say they will not, they are to be left to their own discretion, and not to be forced in any manner to lead the life of a Christian, by any other punishment than that of keeping them from the reception of the eucharist and other sacraments, let him be accursed;" are not these parts of canons of faith in the Council of Trent?—I know it follows from the principles of the Catholic church, that every person who is once validly baptised becomes subject to the laws of the Catholic church. This is a necessary consequence from the truth, that there is but one baptism; and that by this baptism we become children of the church; and, as such, are subject to her spiritual jurisdiction. The baptized person may separate himself from her communion, but he cannot deprive her of the authority which Christ has given to her. To establish this independence of her authority is the object of the canon.

But is it not the clear meaning of that latter canon, that as a practical consequence of that submission they are to be compelled to obey those laws by other than spiritual censure?—No, that is not the meaning.

Will you explain it?—The meaning is, that they may be compelled or rather induced to lead a Christian life by a greater punishment than the mere privation of the sacraments. Now they can be compelled by a spiritual censure of a higher order than that of keeping them from the eucharist; therefore it does not necessarily follow, that they are to be compelled by punishments that are not spiritual.

Pray explain how you conceive that any censure, purely spiritual, can have any compelling or binding obligation in the mind of a Protestant who disregards it?—The church in this canon does not suppose the case of a Protestant no more than of any of her own obstinate children: it only asserts the right of the church to bring obstinate persons to a sense of their duty by the use of ecclesiastical censures. In the case for instance of the child of Catholic parents, baptized in the Catholic church, who on arriving at the years of discretion, should refuse to submit to the laws of the church, the church has a right to say "I shall cut you off from my communion by the sentence of excommunication," which is a far greater punishment than the mere privation of the sacraments*.

Was

* These canons then have no reference whatever to civil penalties inflicted on any particular denomination of Christians on account of their religious tenets. In fact the proposition that is condemned in the 14th canon, is said to be extracted from the works of Erasmus, who never left the communion of the Catholic church; and that he spoke of persons baptized in the Catholic church, seems evident from the admission that those who should refuse to ratify their baptismal engagements ought to be deprived of the sacraments. Now if such privation be considered a penalty for them, excommunication must be a still greater chastisement. It was then both just and necessary that the church should assert her right of publicly stigmatizing, by the most severe censure that she could inflict, the man who would publicly refuse to lead the life of a Christian, after he had been initiated into the Christian covenant, and had become responsible for the solemn vows, which in his name and for his advantage had been pronounced by his godfather and godmother. The error thus censured, made the obligation of the law of Christ depend entirely on the ratification which a youth makes of his baptismal vows, so that if he should refuse to ratify them, he should be allowed to live in the midst of Christians like a Turk or a Pagan. The condemnation of this error declares that by the very fact of baptism, he is bound to practise the

Was any instruction conveyed to you at Palermo or at Stonyhurst, as to the duty of subverting any system, the direct tendency of which might be in your opinion the spiritual and final ruin of man?—There was no instruction or any other direction given upon the obligation of subverting any system which might be considered as erroneous, in any other way than by fair open persuasion and argument*.

Of course you took the oath of allegiance, on being appointed Vice President of Maynooth?—I have taken it.

Can a Roman Catholic properly take an oath of allegiance, the form of which has not been tolerated or sanctioned by the Pope?—He can; for there is not any need of recurring to the Pope for his leave or sanction to take an oath of allegiance. There is no need of any man recurring to spiritual authority to enable him to perform a duty to which he knows that he is already bound; or to sanction by oath the performance of an obligation already contracted.

The question is not, whether it is necessary in each particular instance to have recurrence to the authority of the Pope, but whether an individual Roman Catholic may take an oath of allegiance, the form of which has not been either sanctioned or tolerated by the Pope?—He may.

If the Pope were to except to the form of any particular oath of allegiance, and enjoin Roman Catholics at the peril of their salvation not to take it for the future, would they be at liberty to exercise their own judgment, and take it notwithstanding?—They would be at liberty to exercise their own judgment, unless the Pope declared that the oath violated a principle of morals, or abjured a dogma of Catholic faith.

Supposing the Pope were to do so?—If he were to declare that the oath was a renunciation of Catholic faith, then no Catholic could take it, unless he had the judgment of the whole church in favour of the oath.

The question is, as to what would be the obligation upon the Roman Catholic in such a case as you have supposed?—There would be an obligation on the Catholic to examine further, whether the judgment of the Pope was received or rejected by the concurrent testimony of the bishops, before he could lawfully take such oath.

Do you mean the bishops of his own country?—He should endeavour to learn the judgment of the bishops of all countries, because he should endeavour to have the highest authority, before he could take an oath condemned by the Pope.

But until the judgment of the whole of the bishops could be collected, would it be his duty to abstain?—It would; no Catholic could otherwise take that oath; supposing always that it included some dogmatical proposition, quite distinct from the allegiance due to the sovereign, but declared to be contrary to the Catholic faith.

But if the Pope should assume, perhaps erroneously, that any particular form of oath of allegiance did interfere with some dogma of Catholic faith, would it not be, according to what you say, the duty of Roman Catholics, called upon to take such oath, to abstain until the point could be cleared up by all the bishops in the different Catholic countries?—I again state that, if the exception were against the practice of allegiance, it would not be his duty to wait further; but if the question was not as to his duty of allegiance, but upon some particular assertion, which, besides the known duty of allegiance, was annexed to such oath; and if that assertion were pronounced by the Pope to be contrary to the Catholic faith, then it would be the duty of the Catholic to abstain from taking an oath, containing such clause, until he could obtain the judgment of the church, that it was not a violation of any dogma of Catholic faith.

The question does not suppose that the Pope could assume as an abstract proposition, that no allegiance was due from any subject, but only alludes to a particular form of the oath of allegiance, to which objection is taken?—If the form to which he excepts, contains nothing more than a declaration of the allegiance due from a subject to a sovereign, the supposed prohibition should not prevent the Catholic from taking the oath, no matter who the sovereign may be, or what may be the circumstances of the subject. But if the promise of allegiance be mixed up with certain other assertions or propositions, which are connected duties of a Christian; and that this obligation may be enforced by a penalty or censure, that is different from the privation of the sacraments. Kemnitius himself, though he tries by an unjust insinuation to cast suspicion on the motives of the council, admits however the entire doctrine of this canon, and teaches that such obdurate persons should be excommunicated by the church. He even goes much further than the enactments of this canon, when he states that the civil magistrate ought to punish such transgressors for the public and notorious blasphemies of which they may be guilty. This I take also to be the doctrine of the Established church. For if a man were prosecuted in the ecclesiastical court for living in a state of public adultery, he could, I imagine, be punished by temporal penalties; and he would be severely punished by the civil magistrate if convicted of bigamy, nor could he in either case avert the chastisement, by declaring that he had not ratified his baptismal promises, and therefore was not bound to observe the matrimonial contract as it is observed in the Christian law. According then to our law, of which the Christian religion is part and parcel, even severe temporal chastisements may be employed to make a man lead a Christian life, even though he have not ratified his baptism; and all that this 14th canon of the 7th sess. says, is, that in the same case and for the same purpose, another penalty as well as privation of the sacraments may be adopted.

* Nor have I ever been specially advised to oppose even by legitimate means, any particular religious system, establishments or institutions, however erroneous in their principles or injurious in their effects; but I have been always taught, that whenever I should attempt to combat error or to defend the truth, I should never use other means than that of fair argument and open honest persuasion.

nected with other points of faith, different from that of allegiance to the sovereign, and if the Pope declared such incidental assertions, not intrinsically connected with the well known duty of allegiance, to contain errors of faith, no Catholic could conscientiously take that oath, until he obtained a judgment in favour of such assertions that would supersede the judgment of the Pope.

Does that which you just state, apply to the whole of the oath, or only to part of it?—In the case supposed the Catholic should object to the whole oath. I give this answer; because the proposed question might refer to the intricate composition of an oath, in which the declaration of allegiance might be closely interwoven with the expression of erroneous opinions, and in general the censures which an ecclesiastical authority passes on such oaths, are passed upon the whole formula, on account of the connection existing between the different propositions; but in this case, the subject, when he rejects that form of oath, on account of the objectionable matter mixed up with his duty of allegiance, is bound to protest his readiness to take any oath that contains no more than a declaration of allegiance to his sovereign.

In the year 1791, there was a form of oath of allegiance under the consideration of the legislature in England, and the leading members of the Roman Catholic laity were desirous to take that oath, and entered into a correspondence even of an angry nature with the vicars apostolic of England, who finally disapproved of that oath. Do you conceive that the Roman Catholic laity were bound to acquiesce in their decision?—I do think that the Roman Catholic laity were bound to acquiesce in the decision which the vicars apostolic then gave; because I well know that the objection to that form of oath was not on account of the assertion of allegiance, but on account of certain other opinions inserted in that declaration, which they declared to be opinions that no Catholic could safely swear to maintain.

The question did not suppose that the objection was founded on account of that part containing the principle of allegiance, but only to recal to your recollection what really took place, and to ascertain whether the vicars apostolic of England have a binding power upon the judgment of the laity with respect to the lawfulness of taking any particular form of oath?—Their judgment in such cases should obtain the acquiescence of the faithful, until it be corrected by superior authority.

Are you aware that Bishop Horsley stated in his place in the House of Lords, that the objections taken to the oath met his approbation, that the objection did not apply to any part of the oath which pledged the person to the performance of civil duties, but to a part of the oath which touched upon religious dogmas, and that he would not allow a clergyman of his diocese to take it?—I think I have heard that some prelate did make some such declaration, but I was not aware that it was Bishop Horsley; but it is well known that the legislature deemed the exceptions so valid, that they rejected the condemned oath, and substituted what is called the Irish oath in its stead.

Is the question how far a particular oath contains matter contrary to the Roman Catholic faith, one which may be determined by individual members of the Roman Catholic church for themselves, or must they be directed in that by ecclesiastical authority?—If a doubt is entertained of the lawfulness of taking it, the oath should be subjected to the authority of the bishops in the first instance.

Are they not bound to consult and to take the opinion of the bishop before subscribing to such an oath?—If they have a doubt whether that oath contains any thing contrary to Catholic faith, then according to the principles of the Catholic church, they must have that doubt solved by the authority of the church.

Supposing an individual has no such doubt in his own mind?—He has then no obligation to consult any one, but to take the oath of allegiance; no man is bound to submit to the judgment of priest or bishop every oath that may be proposed to him to take, or any oath, when he believes the subject matter of the oath to be lawful.

Do you conceive that the Roman Catholic laity in 1791, had doubts in their mind that the particular form of oath then proposed, contained doctrines repugnant to the Catholic faith?—I do not wish to pronounce any opinion upon them.

When the professor of moral theology at Maynooth was before this Board, as a witness, speaking on the subject of oaths, he was asked this question; "It is laid down in the book as one of the species of materiæ mutatio." "Si res jurata fiet impossibilis vel illicita ob superioris prohibitionem;" will you have the goodness to translate the words, "illicita ob superioris prohibitionem," to which he answered, "That class of cases consists in some persons who have not the full and absolute disposition of the thing they swear to dispose of, but they must obtain the assent of a superior, in order for them to perform the engagement they have taken, and the superior refuses his consent, or prohibits the inferior, over whom he has authority, to do such a thing; in that case, he cannot fulfil it without disobeying his superior, whom he is bound to obey. Suppose that one of the members of a religious house was to swear to do such a thing, and the superior hearing of that, sees that the thing will be absolutely pernicious to the community, or will be an extraordinary thing, of course he prohibits it; then it becomes illicita, not in se, but ex auctoritate superioris, and he cannot do it without infringing on the rules of the community which he had bound himself to obey, and committing a sin." We beg to ask you, whether your view as to the subject matter of that question coincides with his?—My view coincides with his, as the answer clearly indicates the thing promised, to be a matter already subject to the jurisdiction of the superior.

The professor of moral theology was then asked, "Do you mean that the superior of an order of regulars, may prohibit an oath taken by one of the regulars to be observed?" to which he gives the following answer; "If that oath is contrary to his community, and he is the judge of that, because we suppose, that a man who is in a regular order, has no will of his own; that his will is identified in some manner with the will of the superior, and he can do nothing of himself." We shall be obliged to you to state your opinion on that matter?—I shall distinguish whether that oath is a promissory oath, in which the rights of others are concerned, or an oath that merely regards the particular good of the individual; if it is an oath in which the rights of others are concerned, the superior cannot prohibit the performance of the oath, unless the person who is interested gives up his right to exact the performance of that oath; but if it merely concerns the individual himself, so that the just rights of others are not involved in the promise, then the superior, judging that such oath would be better not performed than performed, might lawfully prohibit the performance of such an oath. I add, that when it is said that the inferior has no will of his own, or that his will is in some way identified with that of the superior, this is to be only understood of those things which the voluntary submission of the inferior can subject to the superior's controul, as his own time, conduct, studies, employment, &c. He cannot submit to the superior the rights which others may have acquired over him, as the rights of his parents, his creditors, his sovereign, &c. nor can the superior exercise any controul in an arbitrary way.

Appendix, N° 50.

Examination of Rev.Peter Kenney,

The answer of the professor of moral theology, suggests another criterion to which you have not at all alluded in your answer, that is, being contrary to the interests of the religious community of which the regular is a member?—I prefer the answer that I have given. The good of the community may be just ground on certain occasions to prohibit the performance of an oath, the subject matter of which is already under the superior's controul; but I do not think that this reason gives the adequate answer, because there might be oaths required to be taken, which the superior could not prohibit, or annul if already taken, and which might be injurious to the community to which he belongs; so that I think the adequate and the clear answer would be to distinguish the two kinds of oaths; and as these questions, like all cases of conscience, are matters that require some time for reflection, I feel persuaded, that the respected professor whose words have been cited, would on revision, agree that this is the answer required by the object and purport of the question.

In the course of that examination, this further question was put to the professor of moral theology; "Suppose a member of the order of Jesuits to come before this Board as a witness, and the usual oath is tendered to him to disclose the whole truth, and he is examined as to matters relating to his own community, which it may be very evident both to him and his superior that it might be noxious to that community to disclose; do you conceive, that that regular would be bound to state the whole truth or not?" to which Mr. Anglade answers, "I think he is bound to do it." We would beg your answer?—I think he would be bound to answer in every case where he was legitimately called upon so to do; and if not so called on, he ought either to decline taking the oath, or object to the unauthorized question.

Might not the superior take upon himself in that case, to declare that such disclosure would be injurious to the community, and therefore prohibit him from making that disclosure?—Though he were to think it would be injurious to the community, his authority could not interfere in the supposed case, and though the deponent himself firmly believed that it would be injurious to the community, yet if he were lawfully required to take the oath, he should take it and fairly state the truth.

The Commissioners will feel obliged if you would furnish them with a copy of the rules of your order?—I feel no difficulty in furnishing the Commissioners with a copy of the institute, which will be found to be contained in two volumes folio; those volumes contain every thing that can be called rule, decree or advice, given by the authority of the society to the members of the society. They form the entire code of our legislation. I must, however, make this remark, that only the parts which relate to the vows are obligatory, under pain of sin, even of a venial sin; all the rest is rather advice or counsel, than command; amongst the various parts of this institute, are the decrees of congregations, and other acts that emanated from the authority of the order, from its origin to its suppression. All these were deprived of the sanction, which they derived from the approbation of the Holy See, by the bull of suppression. Now, as the present Pope has renewed the society according to the primary rule of St. Ignatius, I cannot tell what portion of those decrees may have already received, or may hereafter receive, further sanction from the Pope.

Are there any instructions, admonitions or suggestions, given to any class of the members of the society, other than those contained in those two volumes?—Every thing, admonition, instruction and rule, and every legislative enactment or ordinance are contained in these volumes; perhaps, the question has reference to a little pamphlet or publication that is called the Monita Secreta. I am quite prepared to say, what is my opinion of that work. Whoever looks for any part of the contents of that work in the rules and constitutions of the society, will be greatly disappointed. I consider it, and I declare it to be, as far as my knowledge goes, a false, infamous, and malicious libel; such a libel as no one charitable man ought to impute to another, without having the fullest evidence, that the atrocious imputation was merited.

Were not the rules and institutes of the order made public for the first time upon the occasion of the trial of the great cause of the Jesuits before the parliament of Paris, in the year 1764, or thereabouts?—I am certain there were numerous copies of the institute of this society, in the fullest extent, printed in various countries, long before that period; if I can recollect any thing of that unhappy dispute, printed copies were instantly produced, on being called for, and in virtue, as was pretended of these very rules, the society was condemned to pay a debt which one of the members had contracted.

The question referred to whether all the institutes and rules of the order had been made public previously to that trial?—The constitutions were ordered to be printed in 1558, and before the year 1762, the whole institute of the society had undergone sixteen editions; it was to be found in every library of any note; and various analyses, compendiums and abstracts had been published, both by the Jesuits and their enemies. The charge of concealing their institute was one amongst the many crimes imputed to the Jesuits by the furious faction that calumniated them, that they might the more easily destroy them. But the inconsistency of these charges are their best refutation. How could the institute of the Jesuits be concealed from the public when the substance of it, and all the privileges annexed to it, are found in the bulls of the Popes that confirmed their institute, and which the Jesuits were obliged to produce in the civil and ecclesiastical courts of every country in which they obtained a legal existence? The letters patent of the kings that authorized their establishments frequently mention in the preamble, that the institute had been previously examined; those of Francis II., in 1562, and the arrêt of the parliament of Paris, 1592, are proofs of this statement. How could the institute be unknown to the public before 1761, if the enemies of the Jesuits had discovered, 100 years before, that the Monita Secreta formed a portion of their rules? With respect to this infamous production, I may be allowed to state, what I know of its history: In the year 1616, it was found posted in writing against the walls of the Jesuits college, in Cracow. It was dictated by a malicious revenge. An unhappy member, who deserved to be dismissed, and was dismissed from the society, forged it to bring the Jesuits into odium. For a considerable time after their first publication, no mention can be found, as far as I have been able to ascertain, of these Secreta Monita, until the unhappy disputes which took place in France about the time mentioned in the question between the Jesuits, the Jansenists, and the magistrates, who supported that party; a copy at that time having been found in some library, was published; and from that period down to the present, it is a work usually adopted by the declared enemies of religion to cover the Jesuits and the Catholic religion with obloquy and opprobrium.

Was it found in a library of the Jesuits?—I cannot say that it was; and I rather think that it was not in a library of the Jesuits; but though it were, that circumstance would not prove its authenticity, as their libraries contain the works of their enemies as well as those of their friends. When published the first time, it was declared by the Holy See to be a malicious libel, and condemned as such. To the best of my recollection, it was put upon the index of the prohibited works at Rome. This I add as a proof, that it was a forgery; for no government could publicly condemn a part of that institute, the whole of which it had solemnly approved.

Have you any knowledge whether it was proved, or attempted to be proved, in the cause before the parliament at Paris?—I do not know that such an attempt was made; but I think it would be quite within the wish of the enemies of the society to set up some degree of proof, if they could; for any one that had put forward such a libel on such a body of men, would endeavour to establish the charge if he could do it. But I think that there is a prima facie argument in favour of the society. For it was the wish and the interest of those who produced the document to authenticate it, and yet notwithstanding all that they have said and written, there has never been any proof brought forward, that it ever emanated from a Jesuit, or that any part of it was sanctioned by the legislation, acts or doctrines of the Jesuits.

Appendix, N° 51.

Examination of The Most Reverend Doctor Murray;
Wednesday 20th December, 1826.

THE Commissioners understand you to be a trustee of the College of Maynooth at this time?—I am.

And a visitor?—Yes.

In one of those situations or the other, have you been connected with that establishment for several years?—Yes; I was also at one time President of the College, for a short period, with a view to keep the place still open for another gentleman, (Dr. Everard) whose health did not allow him to continue in office. At the earnest solicitation of the trustees, I undertook the superintendence of the college in the mean time; but as soon as I found it unlikely that he would be able to resume his office, I resigned the presidency, never having intended to occupy it permanently.

When was that?—I think in 1813 or the beginning of 1814.

How long did you hold that office?—I think about one year and a quarter, or perhaps a half.

Were you trustee previously to your accepting that invitation?—No; nor for several years afterwards. I think it was about the year 1820, that I became a trustee; but the books will state the exact time.

Have the goodness to state what you consider generally to be the duty of the trustees?—The duty of the trustees is stated in the Act of Parliament, which is before the Commissioners, and I know of no other duties which belong to them but those which the law gives them.

Appendix, N^o 51.Examination of
Most Rev.Dr. Murray,
20 December 1826.

How often do you assemble as trustees in the course of the year?—Generally twice.

At Maynooth?—Not always at Maynooth. Of late the trustees have in general held one of their meetings at Maynooth, and the other for the greater convenience of the trustees, in Dublin, receiving there the officers of the house and communicating with them.

We believe you have a general superintendence and authority over the affairs of the college?—Yes. The trustees were appointed by Parliament to erect the college, and to prepare from time to time such buildings as would in their opinion be necessary for the masters and students; and to superintend the disbursement of money, and to make bye laws for the house, with the approbation of His Majesty's government in Ireland.

What number of trustees are in the habit of attending?—The number required by law is seven; of course there must be always that number to constitute a Board.

Do the meetings which are generally called, consist of a greater number?—Yes.

Do all the trustees generally attend?—No, not all; some of them attend very diligently.

In what way is the business brought before the Board of trustees?—It is brought at the suggestion of the president, or the secretary, or of any trustee who may think proper to submit to the consideration of the Board any subject connected with the interest of the establishment.

Have the goodness to state whether the trustees would turn their attention to any business which was not brought before them in that manner; the object of the question is, whether if any matter connected with the college was privately known to an individual trustee, he would feel it his duty to bring it under the consideration of the Board?—Most undoubtedly; if the interest of the establishment were concerned, he would think it his bounden duty.

Do you conceive that the power of the trustees in the establishment of bye-laws, with the approbation of the government, would go so far as to enable them to repeal any of the regulations established by Act of Parliament?—Not by any means.

In what way are the accounts brought before you?—They are submitted to us by the bursar, and the officers of the house, and examined by us through a sub-committee appointed to investigate minutely all the vouchers and the expenditure of the money; and afterwards those accounts are submitted to the Commissioners of imprest accounts, as is required by law.

Is the examination confined to verifying the sums expended, or do you conceive that you have any jurisdiction as to the application of the money; do you call the application in question, or only look to the expenditure?—We of course look to the application of the money, that being a part of the duty of the trustees.

Is there not an annual estimate given in of the money that is likely to be required for the use of the college under detailed heads to the government?—We submit no estimate of that kind that I am aware of. I have with me a copy of our petition which is prepared under the sanction of government. It is exactly the same every year, and prays for the usual sum allotted by Parliament for the use of that establishment.

We have had laid before us a copy of an estimate which we have been informed is annually delivered in together with the petition?—The only paper signed by the trustees, and sent by them annually to Parliament, is the petition already referred to. It is the same every year, and goes in the manner just stated, to pray for the allotment of the usual sum granted for the maintenance of that establishment.

As trustees, have you any knowledge of the estimate which is said to be delivered in together with the annual petition?—No; it has not engaged my attention. I suppose, however, that originally in fixing the sum that would be necessary for the support of the establishment, an estimate should be made out of what would be required to meet the probable wants of the institution.

Have the goodness to deliver in a copy of the petition?—

[The same was delivered in and read as follows.]

“ To the Right Honourable and Honourable the Knights, Citizens and Burgesses in the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland assembled.

“ The Petition of the Trustees of the Roman Catholic Seminary in Ireland,— “ Humbly Sheweth,

“ That Petitioners most gratefully acknowledge the continual benevolence of this honourable House, by which they have been enabled to effectuate, in a considerable degree, the purposes of the institution:

“ That the unprovided charge of the seminary for one year ending the fifth of January amounts to the sum of eight thousand nine hundred and twenty-eight pounds, for which Petitioners have no resource, save in the liberality of Parliament.

“ Petitioners therefore humbly pray, that this honourable House may grant such relief as in their wisdom they deem meet, and as in duty bound Petitioners will ever pray.”

[Signed by seven Trustees.]

Is this petition presented as a matter of course, or presented upon requisition from the secretary of the Lord Lieutenant?—It is presented as a matter of course.

Does the secretary of the Lord Lieutenant every year before Christmas address a letter to the trustees, calling upon them both for a petition and estimate for the services of the ensuing year?—I am not aware of it; these communications pass through the secretary and and the officers of the house, and they are so much a matter of course, that it is not deemed necessary to bring them under the constant consideration of the trustees.

In the application of the money, do the trustees consider themselves at liberty to distribute the grant as they please, provided only it is applied to the objects required by the Act of Parliament?—Certainly; keeping always in view the primary object intended by Parliament.

You said it was a part of the duty of the trustees to superintend the erection of the buildings, can you say whether there was any original understanding between the trustees and the government as to the extent to which those buildings were to be carried, or as to the number of students for whom accommodation was to be provided?—I was not at all connected with the establishment at the original foundation of it, nor was I then even residing in Dublin.

Has any thing come to your knowledge which would enable you to form a judgment as to that fact?—I have often heard that the original plan was more extensive than the one executed.

State what you have heard as to the original plan?—That the college was to consist of four sides instead of three, of which it consists at present.

By whom did you understand that plan to be formed, by the government or by the trustees?—I am not aware of the quarter from which it originated, but I have heard it spoken of very frequently as contemplated, and as a thing looked forward to still, whenever it can be accomplished.

According to the terms on which the vote is made, would the trustees feel themselves at liberty to apportion any part of the grant to the erection of fresh buildings?—Certainly.

If it was the intention of the trustees to increase the accommodation of the students, would they think it their duty to communicate that intention to the government?—No; except they were to call for an additional grant to carry the object into effect.

Do you happen to know whether at any time an application has been made to the government specifically for a grant of a sum of money to be applied to building purposes?—I understand there was an application before I became connected with the college, for a further sum to increase the establishment; and of course to provide increased accommodation by additional building—that sum was granted for one year, and afterwards I understood that a part of it was continued.

Do you know what part was continued?—About one-fourth of the additional sum.

Do you happen to know whether the money granted by the government is divided in such a manner amongst the whole of the students, as to show, when it is accounted for, the total number of the students upon the establishment?—I am not aware that the number of students, including those who are maintained at their own expense, is ever stated; but there is a fixed and uniform number supported at the public expense, or rather partially supported; for they too are obliged to supply themselves with dress, and books, and furniture, and things of that kind.

We would beg to put into your hands, a paper purporting to be an "Estimate of the Charge of the Establishment of the Roman Catholic seminary in Ireland, for the year ending 5th January 1828; signed, B. Crotty." Are we to understand that you never saw that document?—I never saw it, but I dare say it is correct.

Is it not stated in the first article in that estimate, that commons would be required for 250 students?—Yes it is; that is the number which is on the government establishment for the ordinary course of studies. In addition to this number, there is a class consisting of those who, after finishing their ordinary course, are allowed to remain in the college for more protracted studies, and which class when filled up, would consist of 20.

Does that comprehend the total number of students on the establishment?—It comprehends the total number of students that receive support from Parliament. But there are besides in the house many other students who support themselves, or are supported by burses founded by individuals.

Making altogether about four hundred?—I cannot state accurately the total number, as this is not regulated by the trustees, but depends upon the number which each bishop may, by the means just referred to, be enabled to send.

Is not a part of the money which would appear to be appropriated to 250 students, in reality diffused and shared among a greater number by an arrangement made for dividing the allowance devoted to one between two?—Yes, the number of students is so inadequate to the wants of the country, that the bishops sometimes think it advisable to put two students instead of one upon the allowance that is supplied for one, each of the two supplying from his private means the difference.

Would not the estimate be more accurate in reality, if it stated that the sum, in whatever portions allotted, was divided among the real number, which would exceed 250?—That is impossible, because it depends upon the different prelates, who never agree as to the precise number wanted for each diocese beyond what the State supplies.

Does it not depend upon those who superintend the affairs of the college?—No; upon each bishop, who has so many places allotted to him—the number of 250 places is divided, first, among the four provinces, 75 being given to each of the provinces of Armagh and Cashel, and 50 to each of those of Dublin and Tuam; this number is then distributed through the dioceses of each province, and each bishop is allowed to turn those places to the best advantage he can for the wants of his diocese.

Do you happen to know whether the number of students at present educated in Maynooth, is sufficient to supply the annual wants of the priesthood in Ireland?—It is quite clear that it is not.

Appendix, N° 51.

Examination of
Most Rev.Dr. Murray,
20 December 1826.

Do you conceive it would be desirable to accommodate a larger number of students in Maynooth?—If Maynooth be intended to supply the ministry in Ireland, the number should be considerably enlarged.

Do you know whether there is any idea on the part of the trustees to increase that accommodation?—I think there is a wish to increase the number of the students; whether it would be desirable to do so in that particular establishment or not is another question. There are some who think that it would be more advisable to have a separate establishment, and not to enlarge the number in Maynooth, in consequence of the difficulty of maintaining discipline when the number is so extended.

Is it your opinion that the number collected there is too large?—The number is too large for the accommodation which the house at present affords.

Are they really more numerous than the house can properly accommodate?—The officers of the house are of that opinion.

In case of any extended means being afforded for the education of an increased number of students for the Catholic priesthood, would it be desirable to have a distinct college for their reception, or have a place to which they should be sent preliminary to their going there; in other words, would it be better, in your opinion, to cut off one or two of the classes, for instance?—My opinion leans to that conclusion; but I should not wish to state it as a matter on which my mind is entirely made up, without consulting the Board.

You have said that a part of the increased grant made for building, has been continued annually down to the present time?—So I understand; I do not say it was given exclusively for the purpose of building, but for the general maintenance of the establishment, whether by procuring necessary accommodation or otherwise.

We observe that in 1807, and for some years before, the annual grant received was 7,760*l.* that in 1808, in which the grant for 1807 was included and received, the amount was 12,610*l.*; and we observe, that in the years 1809 and 1810, the annual grant was 8,972*l.* 10*s.*, the 8,972*l.* 10*s.* appears to exceed the sum of 7,760*l.* does it not, by about the sum you mentioned, that is, the fourth of the increase of 8,972*l.* 10*s.*?—So I understand.

Do you not believe that that increase, producing an amount of 12,610*l.*, was for the purpose of providing for the maintenance of the additional pupils to be accommodated in the additional buildings erected by the 5,000*l.* granted to the college during the Duke of Bedford's Lord Lieutenancy?—I believe it was distinctly mentioned by Mr. Perceval, in his place in the House of Commons, that that additional grant, or part of it, was given expressly because certain buildings had been commenced on the faith of a promise of that grant, and of course it was not intended exclusively for the maintenance of pupils; that is the impression that remains upon my mind. At this distance of time I cannot be supposed to recollect exactly the words that were used.

The Commissioners understand that the college has funds of its own, over and above the parliamentary grant?—Yes, there is 500*l.* a year, a legacy of the late Lord Dunboyne; and besides, there are some burses founded by individuals for the maintenance of students.

Were there not two sums of 600*l.* remitted anonymously to the college within the last few years?—I have understood that there were some sums of that kind.

May the trustees make what application they like of those sums?—They are particularly restricted with respect to the burses, and must attend rigorously to the conditions on which the foundation is made in the college. With regard to the 600*l.* or whatever may have been the sum alluded to, I think they have a power of disposing of it, in any manner which they think proper for the benefit of the establishment; unless the donor himself may have defined the particular application of it.

Is there not a special application of a fund for the use of the Dunboyne establishment?—Yes; a fund arising partly from a parliamentary grant, and partly from the Dunboyne legacy, which the trustees were desirous to appropriate to that particular object. When the number of which the Dunboyne establishment was intended to consist is not complete, the latter sum, or such part of it as is not expended, reverts to the general funds of the house.

Has there not been a practice rather to keep the number of students upon the Dunboyne class on a reduced scale, with a view to save the money arising from the Dunboyne fund, and that which is added to it by the government, in order to enable a separate application to be made of that money?—No; quite the contrary; it has been the wish of the trustees to keep up the contemplated number of twenty if they could do so, but they have never been able to realize that wish, because the number of individuals to be put upon that establishment could not be spared from the wants of the different dioceses, to which the students belong.

But is there not a specific addition made to the parliamentary grant, in order to enable the college to maintain the Dunboyne class?—Yes, there was a grant of about 700*l.* Irish.

Do the trustees think themselves at liberty to apply the money so granted, in any other way than to the maintenance of students upon the Dunboyne class?—There would, I believe, be no difficulty in applying part of it, if necessary, to the other pressing wants of the house; but in point of fact, that sum has been applied to the support of that particular branch of the establishment. The additional accommodation procured, and the number of Dunboyne students maintained in the house were quite sufficient to account for the expenditure of that part of the grant.

Can you recollect what statement was made to the government to grant the money that was to be applied to the support of the Dunboyne class?—No, I do not even recollect at what time it was made.

Since you were a trustee?—No, it was not.

Do

Do you know whether any statement was made to the government at that time, that the legacy of Lord Dunboyne had been applied to the maintenance of the Dunboyne class?—The intention of the trustees to apply it to that purpose was I believe signified, and they wish to do so still, if they can get an opportunity so to apply it.

But in reality it was a grant made upon the condition that that money should go to the maintenance of that class?—The statement was as I have mentioned; there was a sum of 500*l.* per annum at the disposal of the trustees, and it was their wish to apply it towards the maintenance of twenty students, whose course of studies should be prolonged in the house, if the government should think it advisable to grant an additional sum to enable them to accomplish that object.

Do you not think that the trustees by that proceeding, pledged themselves to the government, in the first place, to the erection and maintenance of that class; and secondly, to the application of the money arising from the Dunboyne fund to that object, as well as the money granted by the government in aid?—They do so, as far as it is possible for them; a large part of the money has been spent in building for the express use of the Dunboyne students.

We collect from you, that the only reason that the Dunboyne class is not now full, and has not been since its institution, is, that there are not individuals in the college fit to be placed upon it?—That there are not individuals who can be spared from their dioceses, and are fit to be placed upon it.

Might there not be at present students in the college who would with advantage to themselves and benefit to the clergy, be placed upon it?—That would be contrary to the intention of the institution. The object of the Dunboyne establishment, is to enable students who have already finished their ordinary course with distinction, to continue in the house, for three years longer, to prosecute their studies on a more extended scale. Any student, therefore, who has not finished the usual time allotted for his course, is not eligible to a place on that establishment.

If application was originally made to the government to grant 700*l.* a year, in aid of the Dunboyne class, and it was ascertained that from the want of persons qualified to be placed on that establishment, that sum of money would not be required, would it not be stated in the estimate, that instead of 700*l.* being required for the use of the Dunboyne class, some smaller sum would only be asked for?—It appears to me that the petition, and all connected with it, have been framed under the eye of government, and with the knowledge of government, and obtained their sanction, and of course I think it is not our business to interfere with an arrangement so made.

Would the trustees think that they were at liberty now to apply the 700*l.* originally granted to the Dunboyne class, to the other purposes of the establishment?—If the institution were wholly given up, I should hardly think they would feel themselves at liberty so to do, without submitting it to the government; but they look forward to the advancement of the institution which they deem of great consequence to the country.

In the estimate for the next year there is a sum of 1,107*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* for twenty students of the Dunboyne establishment, being at the rate of 55*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.* each; are we to understand from you, that a sum to this amount has been usually expended on that class, whatever their number may have happened to consist of?—I have stated the contrary; I mentioned that besides the grant of 700*l.* allotted by Parliament for the maintenance of the Dunboyne establishment, there is a yearly income of 500*l.* arising from the legacy of the late Lord Dunboyne, destined for the same purpose; that the 700*l.* being the amount of the additional grant by Parliament, was expended or considerably more than that sum upon the institution; and that the trustees not being able for the present to uphold the institution of the Dunboyne establishment according to the wished for extent, consider that the remaining part of their funds of 500*l.* should in the meantime revert to the general purposes of the college.

Do we understand you to say, that the reason practically why the Dunboyne class is not kept full, is, that the demand for officiating priests throughout the country is so great, that you cannot therefore afford that number to remain a sufficient length of time to keep it full?—Yes, precisely so; the bishops are obliged to call home the students even sometimes before they have finished their ordinary course, to employ them in the active exercise of the ministry; and in no instance for the last few years, have they been able to spare a sufficient number of students who have finished their course, to make up the number necessary to complete the Dunboyne establishment.

Is it optional with the individuals who are students, whether they will remain?—No; it is optional with the bishop of those individuals who may be chosen to allow them to stay or not.

Suppose an individual when he has obtained the distinction of being elected to the Dunboyne class, is unwilling to leave, is he at liberty to stay?—He must obey the command of his own bishop.

Would the inclination or the disinclination at all prevail practically upon the bishop, if a young man for instance were disinclined to remain upon the Dunboyne class, would that disinclination operate upon the mind of the bishop?—I cannot answer for the sentiments of the different prelates upon that head. Each would be governed by his own sense of duty.

Do you know whether it is an object of ambition, among the young men, to be admitted into that class?—I think their sentiments differ very widely upon that subject. To some it is an object of ambition, and others after going through what they consider a laborious course, would prefer returning to their respective dioceses.

Appendix, No 51.

Examination of
Most Rev.

Dr. Murrey,

20 December 1826.

As the young men selected for that class, are those the most distinguished for their abilities and good conduct, would it not be natural to consider it as an honour to be placed upon it?—Yes.

Do you think it was at one time looked forward to with more eagerness by the students than at present?—I am not prepared to answer that question.

Was it with reference to the expense at all, that the fires in the rooms appropriated to the Dunboyne students, were discontinued?—I believe the principal reason was, that fires in apartments so small, each of which was to be at once a sitting and a bedroom, were considered to be injurious to the health of the students: they afforded also a greater temptation to them to assemble together in a way not thought favourable to the purposes of study.

On what branches of the expenditure have the savings usually arisen, which have been applied to the purpose of building?—In order to answer that question, I should examine distinctly the different accounts. Those savings have been various, according to the prices of provisions. It would be easy to ascertain the precise amount of the savings on each part by reference to the accounts submitted to the trustees from time to time.

In the copy of the petition of the trustees which you have given in, we observe this statement: "That the unprovided charge of the seminary, for one year ending the 5th January, amounts to the sum of 8,928*l.* for which petitioners have no resource, save in the liberality of Parliament." In what manner do the trustees ascertain the precise sum that is there stated?—The sum that is there stated, is the precise sum in new currency that the bounty of government allots for the support of the institution, and they have no further inquiry to make on the subject; they simply present the petition, stating that sum.

Then are we to understand that the petition every year states the same amount?—Exactly, and in the same terms.

£.8,928?—Exactly, and in the same terms.

That is the precise sum?—It is the precise sum in new currency equal to 9,672*l.* former currency, comprising the grant of 8,972*l.* already stated as given in 1810, and the additional sum of 700*l.* afterwards granted on account of the Dunboyne establishment.

Are we to understand that the trustees do not settle or approve of, or prepare an annual estimate to be submitted to Parliament?—They sign the form of petition which I have handed in, with an understanding, that that is the form approved of by His Majesty's government; they sign no estimate to be submitted to Parliament.

But that merely regards the form of the petition; but the question relates to something beyond that; whether according to parliamentary usage, by which an estimate always accompanies a petition from every public body receiving aid from the government, an estimate is not delivered, such estimate as we presume being not only prepared by the officers of the house, but seen by the trustees?—It is not thought necessary to see the estimate, as it is supposed to be arranged with the approbation of government.

By whom is that estimate prepared?—I really do not know; but I suppose it has been prepared by the officers of the house in the same manner every year since the increased grant was allowed.

Are we to understand that there is an understanding between the government and the trustees of the college, that there shall be a certain annual sum not fluctuating, but of the same amount from year to year?—That is the understanding of the trustees, that such a sum will be granted from year to year, by the continued bounty of government and of Parliament.

The Commissioners have observed in the statutes of the college, one that prohibits any individual, either professor or student, from publishing any book without the leave of the President; have the goodness to look at the clause in that statute, and say whether any breach of that statute has come to the knowledge of the trustees?—I am not aware that there has been any breach of that statute on account of which any one has been accused before the Board.

The Commissioners have been informed that Dr. M^cHale, when professor of dogmatic theology, published two pamphlets under the name of Hierophilos, which pamphlets were sold by the bookseller who published them, who is also the authorized bookseller of the College of Maynooth, within the walls of the college, there being no concealment whatever that Dr. M^cHale was the author of them, as it appears to us—that in point of fact, although the pamphlet was not published actually in his name, it amounted, if not to an actual, to a virtual breach of the statute—can you state to us in what way it could happen, that that circumstance should not of necessity have been brought under the cognizance of the trustees?—No such accusation has been brought under the consideration of the Board. It is the duty of the President to enforce that statute; the President of course is the person who should in the first place answer as to the supposed breach of the statute.

There having been an evident breach of that statute, although not known to the trustees, can you point out to us any means by which the operation and the enforcement of that statute could be rendered more sure than it appears to be at present?—No means immediately occur to me. The President is the executive authority, placed there by the trustees to enforce the observance of the statutes; and if any criminal negligence on his part were to come under the consideration of the trustees, they would of course call upon him to account for it. I am not aware that any thing of that kind has been brought officially before them.

Does it appear to you that the circumstance of the pamphlet being published under a feigned name in itself makes any difference, or prevents it being the duty of the President taking notice of it, as if published with his authority?—When the author's name was not avowed, avowed, the President might not have thought himself justified in instituting an inquisitorial examination into the subject. He might have supposed that the matter was liable to considerable doubt, and therefore he might have thought it right not to enforce the statute. Besides, the person named by the Commissioners as the author of the pamphlet was on the eve of quitting the college, and the President might have considered it unnecessary to put out by force one who was actually retiring through choice, as if for the mere purpose of fixing a stigma on a man otherwise of immaculate character, who was going to occupy a high station in the church.

In your opinion, do you think those considerations would have justified him in overlooking such a breach of the statute?—Dr. Crotty is a very prudent, a very zealous, and a very intelligent man. I would rather consult his views on the subject, than pronounce a judgment on him, without knowing exactly the motives by which he may have been governed.

Without any reference to asking any opinions as to his individual act, we would ask this, do you consider that the publication of a pamphlet, without the name of the author attached, does, according to the words of the statute itself, take the case out of the statute?—I think not, if it were clear that the person who wrote the pamphlet was known to be the author of it.

If it had come to your knowledge, or to the knowledge of any trustee, that such a pamphlet had been published under a feigned name, though avowedly by a professor, should you have felt yourself bound to have taken notice of it?—I am not at present prepared to say what I should do in such a case; I should think the person had acted wrong in publishing such a pamphlet, and would be liable at least to rebuke, even though it might not be thought advisable to enforce the statute in all its rigour against him.

The question went fully to this point, whether if such a knowledge had come to you incidentally, you should in your character of trustee have thought yourself peremptorily bound to take notice of it, and to put the statute into effect?—It does not belong to the trustees to put the statute into effect—this is the President's duty.

Now supposing it had come to your knowledge that such a publication had taken place, and the President had been guilty of an omission of his duty and not brought it before the trustees, would it have been the duty of the trustees to have noticed that omission of the President?—I think it would be right to call upon the President to account for this apparent omission of his duty.

Do the individuals subscribe the statutes when they enter upon their professorships?—No.

When elected students, it is understood that they subscribe generally to the statutes?—They do.

Under oath?—No.

Would there be any objection on the appointment of any other individual to a professorship, or any other office or authority in the college, to their being required to enter into an obligation to conform to, uphold and obey the statutes?—I do not see that there could be any objection to such an arrangement.

Could that object be carried into effect without Act of Parliament, through the medium of a bye-law established by the trustees?—Certainly.

The Commissioners have been informed that there exists within the college of Maynooth, a society called the Sodality of the Sacred Heart?—There is a sodality of that name in the college.

Do you know how long it has existed?—I do not recollect the exact date of its commencement; but it has existed there only for a few years.

Are you at all acquainted with the circumstances connected with its institution in the college?—Intimately acquainted with them.

By whom was it recommended originally?—By me. It could not exist there but by my authority, as Catholic ordinary of this diocese.

Be so good as to state generally the nature and the character of that institution?—It is purely a religious devotional institution, calculated to excite in the minds of the associates a feeling of love and gratitude to our Blessed Redeemer, for the boundless love of us that glowed in his sacred heart, and was particularly instanced in those two great prodigies of goodness, the institution of the eucharist and the sacrifice of his life upon the cross. I do conceive that pious associations calculated to impress the minds of Christians with sentiments such as these, must be deserving of commendation.

Is there any thing in the institution which has either for its object, or has indirectly in its tendency, to connect the individuals belonging to it with any particular religious order in the Roman Catholic body?—No; no particular religious order. It is an institution sanctioned by the Pope, and established in any diocese where it exists under the authority of the bishop of that diocese.

The Commissioners have before them a work which is entitled, "The devotion and office of the Sacred Heart of our Lord Jesus Christ, with its nature, origin, progress, &c., including the Devotion to the Sacred Heart of the Blessed Virgin Mary, &c. &c. &c.; also, Exercises for the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass of the Sacred Heart, to which is prefixed, the recommendatory pastoral letter of the Lord Bishop of Boulogne. A new edition," Published in Dublin, by a man of the name of Clarke, 50, Great Britain-street. We are informed, that this book is a reprint from a similar work, published by Keating, in London; it contains not only a great deal of matter connected with the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, but some pages that appear to relate also to the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Mary; it contains also litanies and other matters, under the head of "Other pious Practices and Devout Prayers;" after which, there is, "The Litany of our Lady of Loretto;" and it comes at last without any apparent separation to "The Litany of Saint Francis Xavierius." It contains also, "A commemoration of Saint Ignatius of Loyola;" and it contains, "A commemoration, &c. of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland;" in which it appears, that on the "Second Day," presumed to be the second day's devotion, there is this address; "Most glorious St. Francis Xavierius," then the matter is to follow: "as on the first day and so on all the following days." On the fifth day, there is this prayer, "Lord God of the Virtues! by whose means thou workest miracles and prodigies peculiar to thy sovereign power, I offer up to Thee the merits of those most stupendous Spirits and those of thy servant St. Francis Xavierius, whom thou madest a new Thaumaturgus or worker of new and prodigious miracles;" on the seventh day, "Lord God of the thrones! on whom thou reposest as on the seat of thy glory and chair of thy majesty, I offer up to Thee the merits of these supreme spirits, and those of St. Francis Xavierius, that throne of thy glory, that vessel of election;" and again, other matter connected with St. Francis Xavierius; also this, "The Devout Client's Address to St. Aloysius," and "The Litany of St. Aloysius;" there then follows other matter, after which, the offices of the Sacred Heart of Jesus are resumed. It suggested itself to the Commissioners, upon an inspection of this book, that it has been so arranged as to connect the worship of the Sacred Heart, with such matters as must necessarily associate it with the members of the order of the Jesuits, in the minds of those persons who become united to that sodality. It being the duty of the Commissioners to ascertain whether the College at Maynooth is, in any degree directly or indirectly connected with the body of Jesuits, you are asked whether the ideas which have arisen in our minds, have in your view any foundation, and whether there is any connection directly or indirectly, in the institution of the Sodality of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, with the body of the Jesuits?—There is no connection directly or indirectly between the College at Maynooth, and the order of the Jesuits; nor does that sodality connect itself or the college with them. It is a sodality which, I believe, did not at all commence with the Jesuits. The first person I know of who gave it any kind of celebrity was, the Père Eudes, a priest of the congregation of the Oratory, who propagated it in seminaries which he established first at Caen, afterwards in other places in Normandy; and I never understood that it was particularly connected with the Jesuits. There is certainly nothing in the institution, as established in the College of Maynooth, which has a tendency to connect that establishment with any religious order whatever.

Are you acquainted with the work to which reference has been made?—I do not think I have ever seen that book; it may contain many things that are very good; but I do not answer for its perfect accuracy.

Should you entertain any doubt that the compiler arranged the matter, so as to combine the thing in the minds of persons in such a way as to lead them insensibly to a greater predilection and respect for the order of Jesuits, than they previously had?—I repeat that I do not recollect having seen the book. I should be very happy, that all should have a respect for the Jesuit body; but I think that the sodality in question, is wholly unconnected with it, and has no tendency to connect the two institutions together. I have myself a great respect for the Jesuit body, and for some individuals of it, I have the highest veneration.

We have before us a book, entitled, "The Memoirs of Scipion de Ricci, Bishop of Pistoia." We would beg to direct your attention to the following paragraph, and to ask your opinion thereon; the passage commences with the words "Personne n'ignore" ?*

[The Book was offered to Dr. Murray, who declined looking at it.]

I beg to decline giving my opinion upon any book published at Paris, whether the Memoirs of Scipion de Ricci, or of any other person.

Suppose any effort was made by any person connected with Maynooth, to induce any of the persons in the course of education there for the secular clergy for this country, to become a member of any religious order, would you consider that act a breach of trust in such a person?—I would consider it most unfair and most dishonourable.

Suppose you found that any religious order was in any way directly or indirectly endeavouring to induce any young man educating at Maynooth to join such religious order, would you consider such persons as acting improperly?—I would.

Have you any reason to apprehend that any such interference has at any time taken place?—No.

Was not Mr. Kenney, Vice President of Maynooth, during the year that you were President?—Yes; I was so happy as to have been able to procure the advantage of his assistance, during a part of the time that I was President.

On what understanding, with respect to the period of his continuance in the office of Vice President, did he accept it?—I think for about a year. He was then an officiating clergyman in one of the Dublin chapels; and I found the assistance of such a man highly necessary for me, as my attention was then unavoidably directed to various other cares, besides the duties of the office of President. I had consented to accept that office with the understanding, that I was not to hold it for a longer space of time, than about a year. I was desirous to have his assistance during that period, and with great reluctance he consented for that length of time to become my assistant.

Would

* The passage alluded to in the question is that which was referred to in the examination of Mr. Kenney, and is to be found in page 384.

Would you have requested him to have become Vice President, or suffered him to become Vice President, if you thought he was capable of availing himself of his situation in the college, to induce any persons there to join the order of the Jesuits?—Most undoubtedly not.

Has not Mr. Kenney occasionally conducted the spiritual Retreats of the students at Maynooth?—I believe he has on one occasion since he left the college, but he has at different times conducted the Retreats of the secular clergy who assemble annually at the college of Maynooth, to spend a few days in exercises of devotion.

Are persons eminent for their powers of preaching, the persons usually selected for conducting such Retreats?—Yes; they are sought for on account of their talents, their zeal and their knowledge of a spiritual life and of the spirit that ought to animate an ecclesiastic.

Is Mr. Kenney frequently applied to, to preach for the benefit of public charities and so forth?—Very often; his time is very much encroached upon by the eagerness of people to have him advocating any cause of charity, or any other which they deem of importance.

For which cause is he applied to, as being a Jesuit, or as being a man of very considerable powers?—Solely in my opinion as being a man of very considerable powers, of very extensive information, of ardent and enlightened zeal, possessing an accurate knowledge of the springs which move and the virtues which elevate the human heart, together with a great facility of communicating his sentiments to the public in an impressive manner.

You were understood to say, that you did not consider the devotion of the Sacred Heart was at all connected with the Jesuits as a body; have you had any reason to know that an opinion has prevailed that they were particularly the favourers of that devotion, and took much pains to promulgate it?—Not as a body; I know that there was a certain individual of the name of Colombière, a man of considerable talents, and a great preacher in France, who did exert his talents to recommend that devotion; but I do not understand that the Jesuits as a body ever interested themselves about the propagation of it.

Is it more particularly connected with them than any other description of devotion which prevails in the Roman Catholic church?—I believe not.

Was its institution in this country connected at all in point of time with the restoration of the order of Jesuits?—It was established in Dublin long before the restoration of the order was even thought of.

Is it within your knowledge when it was first introduced into this country?—No.

Was there any particular bull, or any authority from the Pope to enable the bishops to grant permission to persons to form such institutions?—I am not aware of any.

Are you aware that it was favoured by Doctor Moylan?—It is very likely that it was; as he was most anxious for the introduction of every institution that could promote piety among his flock, it is very likely that he may have encouraged that particular species of devotion.

Was there any particular permission obtained from the Pope to establish the sodality in Maynooth?—Not from the Pope.

Or any authority from the See of Rome?—No, that authority exists in the bishop; whenever once erected by the bishop, then the associates are at liberty to recommend themselves to the devotions of particular sodalities elsewhere; and there is a sodality in Rome which may be called in some measure the chief sodality with which they may be thus associated; it is called, I think, the Society or Confraternity of the Secular Priests of St. Paul.

The question is, whether the diocesan had within himself the entire liberty of establishing this sodality in Maynooth, or whether in point of fact application was made to Rome on that subject?—The ordinary had in virtue of the original constitution of the sodality, a full power to erect it in Maynooth and elsewhere throughout his diocese, without any specific application to the See of Rome upon the subject.

But was there any application to the See of Rome on that occasion?—No, not that I am aware of; there was no application made to the See of Rome on that subject.

To no authority at Rome?—No, to no authority at Rome; there was a union of devotion between them and the sodality—I have before mentioned the secular priests of St. Paul.

Has every bishop the same authority?—Yes, every bishop in the Catholic church.

Were you not in Rome some years ago?—Yes.

Did you observe whether this sodality existed there at that time, and was favoured?—I did; I saw that it existed there and was favoured; I thought it a very rational kind of devotion, and I resolved to encourage it upon my return, seeing there the good effects which it is calculated to produce.

Was it after your return from Rome that you sanctioned the existence of it at Maynooth?—Yes, long after; it was suggested by some of the trustees, that some little devotional sodality of that kind would be desirable in the college, to encourage a spirit of piety among the young men; I, and another trustee, who had also witnessed the good effects of it, turned our thoughts to this sodality, and by my authority it was then erected, as Catholic ordinary in this diocese.

Is it part of the duty of the trustees to select the books which are used by the professors of Maynooth, in directing the studies of the students, or does this depend on the individual who holds the chair?—The trustees must approve of the class-books used in the college course, but as to the books consulted for the more extensive discussions on the subject-matters of the course, that must rest with the professor.

Examination of
Most Rev.
Dr. Murray,
20 December 1826.

The question had reference to the text or the class-books—of course the books at present used were approved by the trustees?—Yes.

What book was used before Cabassutius, as a book on canon law?—I believe that Cabassutius was the first which was authorized by the Board, as a book on canon law.

Do you recollect any other books brought over by Doctor Troy at any time?—Yes.

Why were they not used?—Because they were supposed to inculcate opinions too strong with regard to the interference of spiritual authority in temporal matters.

And for that reason they were not used in the college?—Yes, for that reason they were not used.

What was the name?—Devoti.

And Cabassutius was introduced in lieu of it?—I cannot say it was introduced in lieu of it, because there was no book of that description authorized till Cabassutius was adopted.

Examination of the Reverend Thomas Furlong; Thursday, 2d November 1826.

Appendix, N° 52.

Examination of
Rev.
Thomas Furlong,
2 November 1826.

YOU are a student at Maynooth?—I am.

You are one of the Dunboyne class?—I am.

Are you the senior among them?—I am.

How long have you been in that class?—The present is my third year.

How many years have you been in the institution?—This is my eighth year.

Were you admitted into the first humanity class?—No; I read logic in my first year.

Where did you receive your preliminary education?—For the five years previous to my entrance into college, in the seminary of Wexford.

Are you a native of the county of Wexford?—I am.

Were you recommended from that diocese?—I was.

Were you recommended by the Roman Catholic bishop of that district to Maynooth College?—I was.

In what condition of life were your parents?—My parents hold land in the barony of Forth.

Are they of that class of persons that were the original settlers in that barony?—I presume they are; the name of Furlong I should think is not of Irish derivation.

Who was the head of the seminary of Wexford when you were educated there?—The Reverend Miles Murphy was president.

Do you happen to know where Mr. Murphy was educated?—I do not know where he was educated previous to his entrance into college; he went through his theological studies in the College of Maynooth, and I believe he spent some time there also in the study of the classics.

Will you be so good as to state to what degree of proficiency in classical or other learning you had attained, before you entered the college?—I had read most of the Greek and Latin classics, part of Lucian, Xenophon's Cyropædia and Homer, the five first books of Livy, part of Cæsar and Tacitus, of Virgil, Horace, and Juvenal.

Who was the professor of the class into which you were first admitted at the time of your entrance into the college?—The Reverend Mr. M'Nally.

Did you continue a year in that class?—Yes.

And proceeded in regular succession through the institution?—I proceeded regularly through the other classes.

In what way were you nominated to the Dunboyne class?—In the usual way I believe.

Will you state what the course is—is there any concursus, or is it a mere process of selection?—I am not thoroughly acquainted with the process of appointment; in the nomination, attention is paid I understand, to the studies and the conduct of the candidates for the establishment.

Does the hope of being named upon the Dunboyne class, operate extensively amongst the young men as an excitement to diligence and good conduct?—I cannot answer for others; with me it had little influence.

Is it an object of ambition amongst the young men?—It is in some degree I believe an object of ambition.

Is it thought to be likely to have a beneficial effect upon them in their future course through life?—Yes, it is; the studies of the Dunboyne class are thought to be well calculated for the attainment of the end which the Board of Trustees proposes to itself in having young men nominated to it; that is, to fit them by a proper ecclesiastical education for a more competent discharge of those duties which they will afterwards have to exercise on the mission.

When you were in the logic class, will you have the goodness to state what portion of the youths that were in it, were capable of doing the business of the class with credit to themselves?—I cannot answer precisely, but I think that far the greater part could do so.

Was there any thing like a considerable proportion that appeared to have been so far deficient in their studies as to be unable to keep pace with the course of instruction that was delivered?—I do not think there was.

In the logic class the instruction is delivered by the professor in Latin, is it not?—It is for the most part.

Was

Was there any considerable number of students in the class who were so little conversant with that language as to be unable to follow him?—No, I should think there was hardly one.

In the application that is made by the professor to the different students successively, to give answers to questions proposed by him and explanations of points referred to them, are they not required to reply to him in Latin?—In Latin generally; but should any one find difficulty in expressing himself in Latin, he is permitted to answer in English.

Speaking generally, and referring the question to the close of the year when the young men will have had an opportunity of receiving a good deal of instruction from the professor, was there any considerable number of the students who were unable to express themselves and answer in Latin?—No, it is unusual to reply in English; there are some instances of it, but they are rare.

Will you state whether the course of study in that class is such as entirely to occupy the time of the young men, or whether they have an opportunity, and if an opportunity, whether they have also the inclination to prosecute any private studies of their own?—I do think that most of the young men of each successive logic class are disposed to prosecute private studies, and occasionally find leisure and opportunity to apply themselves to them.

Do they begin as early as that period to study theology?—Theology, precisely so called, forms no part of their course of study, nor is it, as far as I know, read by them in private.

All that they do at that time is to learn the catechism and attend lectures upon the Scriptures delivered by the Vice President?—I believe they also attend an evening class.

Was that so when you were in the class?—I attended during my logic course an evening class, in which English rhetoric was taught.

During the time you were in the logic class were you possessed of any books, excepting those which it was necessary for you to use in the class, of your own property?—I do not now recollect precisely how many others I was possessed of, but I am sure (excluding the Greek and Latin classics, which I had not immediately with me) they were very few.

Do you happen to recollect whether at that time you were possessed of a Bible or Testament?—I had neither at that time, at least in my immediate possession. I say in my immediate possession, because I recollect having had an English Testament previously to my entering college.

Do you know whether many of the students in the class had a Bible or Testament?—I do not recollect at present.

Was there any rule for or against it at that time?—No express regulation at that time, but it was desired that each student in the class should, if possible, be provided with a copy of the Scriptures, as he was obliged to commit to memory, on each Wednesday and Saturday, the substance of a chapter in some one of the books of the Old Testament; on this account also, I think it probable that there were several copies in the possession of the young men in this class.

How did you yourself get possession of any Bible, to enable you to perform the study that was required?—I borrowed one.

Is there any rule upon the subject now?—Bibles have lately been printed for the college by the direction of the trustees, and I believe each person is obliged at his entrance into college to purchase a copy, which is given to him immediately.

On referring to the book, which contains the minutes of the proceedings of the trustees, of the date of 22d June 1825, is the following entry: "That the proposal of Mr. Coyne, to supply the college with 500 copies bound of the stereotype edition of the Holy Bible, at 14s. 6d. each, be accepted." Is that the edition of the Bible that you alluded to in your last answer?—I suppose it is the same.

Is it the rule now that the students are bound to supply themselves with a copy of the Bible?—Each student is obliged at entrance to purchase a copy, if he do not otherwise procure one.

Does that copy remain in his own individual custody during the time that he is in the college?—I cannot answer generally.

Is he permitted to take it into his own possession?—Most undoubtedly he is required to have it in his possession, in order that he may be enabled to make the necessary preparation for the class at which the Vice President presides, and at which, as I have already said, he is required to attend his first year. It is also indispensably necessary for each individual during the three years of his theological course.

Did you purchase one of the Bibles referred to in the minute which has been read?—Not one of those; the regulation to which reference has been made had not taken place at the time that I entered college.

Are you in possession of a Bible?—I am in possession of the Vulgate, and also of the Douay version.

After having continued a year in the logic class, did you proceed into the physic class?—I did.

What number of students were there in that class at the same time with yourself?—I think about forty or fifty.

Will you be so good as to state whether, in the short time that is allotted for the study of mathematics and algebra, the students are able to obtain any considerable proficiency in that science?—I do consider they are.

Did they, in point of fact, obtain any considerable proficiency in the class in which you were?—A good portion of them did so.

Appendix, N^o 52.

Examination of
Rev.

Thomas Furlong,
2 November 1826.

Was there any considerable portion of the class that were so unable to keep up with the instruction given, that in point of fact they were incapable of following it?—There were some who had not, as I conceived, the degree of talent requisite to attain to a competent knowledge of the science; others were deficient, not from want of talent, but of application.

Were there more who were incapable of profiting by the instruction given in this class than in the preceding class, the logic class?—I believe not; it was considered that the class which preceded that in which I studied, had acquitted themselves with considerable credit in the study of the mathematics.

At the time that you quitted the physic class, had you become possessed of many books for your own private studies?—Not more, as far as I recollect, than in my logic year, with the exception of the tracts that form the course of the year.

Had you at that time made yourself acquainted with the French language?—I had been acquainted with the French language previously to my entrance into college.

Had you any opportunity of keeping up your knowledge of it by the instruction you received there, or the study of any French books?—Yes, I was obliged during my physic year to attend a French class.

Had you any opportunity of acquiring any knowledge of Italian?—Not at that time.

Have you had since?—I had; one of the professors of the college had the kindness to give private lectures on the rudiments of the Italian language, at which I attended.

Are there any premiums distributed among the physic class?—There are.

Did you obtain any of them?—I was so fortunate as to obtain the second premium.

After the physic class did you go into the divinity class?—Yes.

Were you three years in that?—I was.

Was Dr. M'Hale the Professor of Dogmatic Theology at that time?—He was, during the whole three years.

Was Dr. Anglade the Professor of Moral Theology at that time?—He was.

Is the study in that class altogether more severe upon the young men than in the previous classes you have described?—I think that the study of theology is more severe than the other previous studies; the mathematics are burthensome to the memory, but on the whole, I think the study of them not so distressing as the study of theology.

During the course of the theological study, what lectures are given upon either the Old or New Testament?—During my time in the Scripture class lectures were given on the book of Genesis; also on the gospels according to St. Matthew and St. John. The other gospels were not read in detail. The parallel passages were noticed in some instances, and whenever an apparent contradiction between them and the gospels of St. Matthew and St. John occurred, it was usually accounted for. Lectures were also given on the epistle of St. Paul to the Romans, the first to the Corinthians, and the epistle to the Hebrews, and on the first and second epistle of St. Peter.

That course does not comprehend the book of Acts?—No.

Was the Commentary of Menochius the one you referred to for explanation?—It was the one generally referred to, but Estius, A'Lapide, Maldonatus, and Perreius were also consulted by several of the young men in the class.

In addition to those lectures, and the explanations that were given of the Old and New Testament, was not the principal course confined to the different treatises of dogmatic and moral theology, which were prepared by Dr. Delahogue for the use of the college?—The treatises prepared by Dr. Delahogue, and those written by Bailly, were the class books in dogmatic and moral theology.

Were any other books lectured upon but those?—Those were, as I have said, the class-books; but other books were, I presume, also consulted by the professors, in which the principles found in those are detailed at greater length.

Were the principles taught strictly consonant with the doctrines laid down or the explanations given in the treatises themselves?—I think in general they were.

When you say in general, do you mean that you have any recollection of their having in any case differed?—Not in any essential point; there might be occasionally some unimportant difference.

Dr. Delahogue lays down this proposition in his treatise, De Ecclesiâ: "Christus Petro et ejus successoribus, aut Ecclesiæ nullum concessit potestatem directam vel indirectam in Regum temporalia: proindeque isti nunquam auctoritate clavium, etiam indirectè deponi possunt, aut eorum subditi a fide et obedientia illis debita eximi ac dispensari;" has that proposition been constantly maintained by Dr. Delahogue and his successors in the chair of dogmatic theology?—As far as my acquaintance with the doctrine of the professors extended, I have known it to be invariably asserted by them.

What is the principle you have yourself imbibed with respect to that proposition from your education in the college?—The principle I have imbibed exactly coincides with that stated by Dr. Delahogue.

Are you aware of the objections which have been made to that proposition by those who are considered as Ultra-montane writers?—Yes, I am acquainted with them in general.

Are you aware of the way in which Dr. Delahogue answers those objections in his book?—I know the principles upon which he answers them.

Do you concur in the soundness of those principles?—I do.

The questions refer to the answers which he gives to the objections made to that proposition drawn "De exemplis Pontificum," and "De Decretis Conciliorum quæ adversus independentem Regum potestatem objiciuntur?"—I concur with him in all those principles.

Will

Will you have the goodness to state, whether you have any reason to apprehend that a contrary principle, or a principle in any degree clashing with that which is laid down in the proposition of Dr. Delahogue, to which your attention has been called, is entertained by any of the students at Maynooth?—None whatsoever; I have no reason whatsoever to apprehend that a contrary principle is either inculcated or credited there.

Will you state from your general conversations with the young men in the college, what you believe to be their prevailing feeling with respect to the principle of allegiance to the King?—I believe from my knowledge of that circle in which I have been conversant, that their allegiance is truly pure, and that they are truly loyal to His Majesty; I have no reason whatsoever to think the contrary.

Suppose the Pope were now to issue a sentence of deposition against the King, and to publish an order directing the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland to inculcate upon the people that it was their duty in consequence of that deposition, to withdraw their allegiance from the King; which do you think would be the duty of the priests in that case—to obey the Pope or to resist him?—Should the Pope issue such a sentence, which I am confident he never will, I think it would be their duty to resist him.

Do you form that opinion in consequence of instructions which you received at the college, and from your general instruction as a Roman Catholic?—I do.

Have you any reason to believe or to suspect, that a contrary opinion is entertained by any persons at Maynooth?—I am confident that a contrary opinion is entertained by no one in the college.

Neither professors nor students?—Neither professors nor students.

Suppose the Pope were to threaten the clergy with an excommunication, if they did not obey the command which has been stated, would you conceive in that case that the excommunication was a lawful or an unlawful excommunication?—I should consider the excommunication to be unjust, and by no means obligatory or of any force whatsoever.

Are you in holy orders?—I am in full orders.

How long may you have been a priest?—Since last Pentecost.

What do you expect will be your next destination; are you to go out on the ministry?—Yes.

As a coadjutor?—Yes.

Have any alterations taken place since you were first acquainted with the college, with regard to the quantity of Scripture instruction, which is given to the junior part of the students?—I cannot give a precise answer to the question; I know that some change has taken place of late with regard to the Scripture class over which the Vice President presides, but I cannot give accurate information with regard to it.

When you commenced your course at Maynooth, did the lectures and study of the Scriptures occupy as large a portion of the week as they do at present in the class of theology?—They did.

Do you recollect the circulation of any pamphlet within these three or four years within the college, entitled the Letters of Hierophilos?—I do.

Can you state the circumstances under which that circulation took place?—I believe those letters were intended as a reply to certain persons, who maintained that the Scriptures without note or comment, should be put into the hands of the people at large.

They were made up into the form of a pamphlet, were they not?—They were.

Do you know by whose authority they were circulated, or in what manner they were circulated within the walls of the college?—They were purchased at the will of each individual.

By whom were they introduced within the college for the purpose of being so purchased?—I do not know by whom they were introduced into the college; I suppose by the ordinary booksellers.

Have you known other pamphlets to be sold in the same manner to the students in the college?—Exactly; booksellers frequently attend at the gate of the college, and the students purchase those pamphlets from them.

Was there any particular pains taken to attract the attention of the young men towards that pamphlet?—Not that I am aware of.

Were there any particular facilities given to the sale and purchase of that pamphlet in the college, that were not given to others?—Not that I am aware of.

Do you mean to say that other pamphlets are occasionally sold in the same manner in Maynooth?—Some pamphlets; there is a prohibition against the introduction of periodical publications; they are not countenanced in the college.

Was it a matter of notoriety at Maynooth, who was the author of the Letters of Hierophilos?—It was generally believed that it was the Right Reverend Doctor M'Hale.

Did any person doubt it?—For some time it was doubted, but afterwards it was believed universally that he was the author.

Is that the pamphlet to which you alluded (a pamphlet being shown to the witness)?—This is not the pamphlet to which I alluded; the pamphlet to which I alluded treated of the diffusion of the Bible without note or comment; this, I believe, regards Catholic emancipation.

Did you ever see that pamphlet which is now shewn to you, within the walls of Maynooth?—I did.

Was it sold and distributed in the same manner as the other?—I think it was.

Have you read it?—I have read part of it; I cannot say that I have read it through.

That is a letter addressed to Mr. Canning?—Yes.

Appendix, N^o. 52.Examination of Rev.Thomas Furlong,
2 November 1826.

Has it been very generally read in the college?—I think it has been read by several there.

Has it been the subject of much conversation amongst the students?—They have talked of it during their recreation hours.

Will you have the goodness to look at the book now shewn to you, entitled “Letters to the English people, by Hierophilos, on the Moral and Political State of Ireland, demonstrating the inefficacy of the remedies hitherto applied to its evils, through the means of Bible Societies;” is this the work which you referred to in your original answer, when you spoke of a work which was published as an answer to the persons who were circulating the Bible?—I referred to those letters that were addressed in reply to Bibliophilos.

Will you be so good as to state whether the young men in the college are allowed to purchase books according to their own will and discretion, or whether there is any rule or regulation according to which they may know what books they are permitted to purchase, and what not?—As I stated to the Commissioners, they are not allowed by any means to purchase works, whose principles may inculcate immorality or infidelity; the purchase of such works is entirely discountenanced, nor are our superiors partial to the purchasing of periodical works.

Is there any list of prohibited books?—Atheistical and immoral works, of course, are not allowed.

How is a student to find out what are atheistical works?—They are known by character; as, for example, the works of Voltaire and Rousseau.

Are you yourself possessed of any books as your own property?—I dare say I am possessed of about 160 volumes.

Will you have the goodness to state, generally, what they may consist of?—I am possessed of Bellarmine, Bergier on Religion, Milner’s End of Controversy, Letters to a Prebendary, Pontas’s Cases of Conscience, Wards’s Errata, &c.: I have Burke’s Works, Fox’s Speeches, Johnson’s Works, Milton, Thomson; I have Blackstone’s Commentaries; I have also Bourdaloue’s and Massillon’s Sermons; I have Gravison’s Works, Lingard’s Anglo-Saxon Church, and Bossuet’s Universal History.

Is a greater latitude allowed to the students in the Dunboyne class, with respect to the books they are allowed to read?—I think there is no objection on the part of our superiors to the Dunboyne class taking a greater latitude, confined however by prudence, because their judgment is more matured; and they are of course more fortified against dangerous impressions.

Do you know whether any of the other students happen to have Bacon’s works?—One of my fellow students, I think, has his Essays.

Are Locke’s works in the possession of any of the Dunboyne students?—I cannot answer.

Is Adam Smith’s Wealth of Nations in the possession of any of them?—Yes; I know it is in the possession of some one of them.

Are Bossuet’s works in the possession of any of the Dunboyne students?—Yes, they are.

Are the young men permitted to study the books in the library freely, or are they under any restriction as to the books they may select?—I do not know of any express restriction, but I am confident that the superiors who have the care of the morality of the students, would be very much averse to their reading certain works that are found in the library.

What works do you allude to?—Atheistical works; for example, certain parts of the Encyclopædia, &c.

Are those passages pointed out to you previously to your making use of the library, or is it only that if a student was observed reading them, he would be recommended not to do it?—I believe the assistant librarians sometimes caution the students against reading those works; they are themselves generally aware that they are not allowed.

How do they become aware that they are not allowed?—By communication with each other; they are also aware that the chief object of their admission to the library is, that they may improve themselves in ecclesiastical knowledge.

So that their reading is most frequently confined to that class of subjects?—It is expected that it should be so; however, if any gentleman find time to devote to other useful studies, he is not prohibited—on the contrary, he is exhorted to attend to them.

With regard to the general discipline of the college, are the rules with respect to silence, and those rules which impose restraints on the young men, found to be so restrictive as to be productive of material inconvenience either to their health or general habits?—I think not.

What is the nature of the institution in the college called the Sodality of the Sacred Heart?—Catholics are bound, in conformity to their religious creed, to believe that Christ is really present in the blessed eucharist; the object of the institution then is to make reparation, by reciting certain forms of prayer, for those instances of neglect and of contempt offered to Christ in this sacrament by tepid Catholics, or by those who differ from us in belief.

Is the sodality of the nature of a congregation, or of an order?—It is merely a society; the names are enrolled in a register kept in certain places—there is such a register, I believe, in the College of Maynooth; there is a certain formula of admission, upon a person becoming a member.

Is there any vow taken upon admission?—None.

Is any oath taken?—None.

Do you cease to be a member of the sodality, upon leaving college?—No.

You

You still remain so till the end of your life?—Yes; but you are not obliged to perform those exercises ordinarily performed by the members of the sodality.

Every member of the college is not a member of that sodality?—No.

Do you know what proportion of the students are members of that sodality?—I do not.

When you use the word "reparation," what sense do you attach to it?—To make some compensation for that neglect shewn by many Catholics to the blessed eucharist, and also for the irreverence that may be offered to this sacrament by persons differing from us in belief. I think I can illustrate it in this way: suppose an insult offered to a king by the members of a certain community; a part of that community make profession of allegiance, and perform certain acts of respectful homage towards the insulted prince in the name of all, and so compensate for the injury offered by all. I wish to remark, that although the sodality offer compensation to our Redeemer for the irreverence shewn him in the blessed eucharist, they do not think such compensation exempts the delinquent himself from making atonement in his own person.

Is there not a part of the day in which the young men, for the purposes of recreation and refreshment, walk in the grounds that are within the walls of the college?—Yes, there are certain parts of the day allotted to that purpose.

Will you state whether at such times, in the conversations that take place, it is customary for them, or it frequently happens, that they enter into political discussions?—Sometimes they do; at least those with whom I have been acquainted, have occasionally done so.

Do you believe that political subjects occupy any considerable portion of their thoughts?—I can answer generally, that they do not occupy a considerable portion of their thoughts; they converse on them occasionally during the recreation hours.

Have you ever heard the connection of Ireland with England, and the benefits or disadvantages of a separation from England, discussed?—I believe the idea of a separation is considered too chimerical to be treated of seriously, or to be entertained in any way.

Have you ever heard the idea of the overthrow of the Established church, and the entire re-establishment of the Catholic system, discussed?—No, I have not.

Do you believe it to be a settled object of wish on the part of any body of the students?—By no means.

Do discussions of that sort take place in the college; or when you say that political subjects are discussed, do you mean the general politics of Europe at large?—Political subjects in general are discussed, and among the rest, the politics of this country; perhaps discussed is too formal a word to use, they are talked of during the recreation hours.

Have you any reason to think that there exists on the part of the students, generally, at Maynooth, a settled dissatisfaction at the established order of things in this country?—I think they are not much pleased with it; that they share in the dissatisfaction of the rest of the Catholics of Ireland.

Do you mean that as quite general, or with regard to any one particular point; do you mean to confine it to the laws which impose political disabilities on Roman Catholics?—I think those are the chief causes of their dissatisfaction.

Does any thing else in particular occur to you?—I think that they are dissatisfied also with the distribution of ecclesiastical property, that is the church establishment; they think that the funds which are applied to the support of the church establishment, might be applied to a better purpose.

When you say a better purpose, what do you mean?—Some purpose that would conduce more to the benefit of the state at large.

Do your ideas go to this point, that they might be better applied by a transfer to the Catholic church?—They have no idea of that, I think.

Appendix, N° 53.

Examination of the Reverend William Delany; 2d November 1826.

Appendix, N° 53.

Examination of
Rev.William Delany,
2 November 1826.

HOW long have you been in the Dunboyne class?—Since the commencement of this academical year.

How long have you been in the College at Maynooth?—I entered in the year 1820, about September.

What class did you enter in?—In the first class of humanity.

What diocese did you come from?—From the diocese of Cork.

Where were you educated, before you came to Maynooth?—In the city of Cork; I was at different schools.

What degree of proficiency had you attained, before you entered Maynooth?—I read more than the course for entrance into Trinity College. The school at which I had been educated, was a school where persons intended for the University, principally were educated; I read the course for entrance into Trinity College, and I read other things besides; I read the twenty-four books of the Iliad of Homer, and the other things necessary for entrance as a pensioner; besides those other things in Latin, I read some of Livy; I cannot exactly recollect the number of books that I read; I read some of the Annals of Tacitus. In Greek, I read some of Demosthenes; before I came into college, I had read besides twelve books of the Æneid of Virgil; I had read the entire of the Eclogues, and I had read Juvenal.

Into what class were you admitted at Maynooth?—Into the first class of humanity.

Appendix, N^o 53.

Examination of
Rev.
William Delany,
2 November 1826.

How happened it that you were not placed higher?—Previous to my entrance, there was a regulation made by the Board of Trustees, that persons entering should read one year's humanity; that might be the reason of it, or it might be that I was not deemed qualified by the examiner to enter higher; but another reason was, though I believe it was not known to the superiors of the college, that I would not have been old enough at the time to enter a more advanced class, because I should not have been old enough to receive any holy orders when I would have completed my course.

Had you studied mathematics at all before you entered the college?—Very little mathematics; I read some of Elrington's Euclid, because at the school at which I was educated, at the latter part of the time previous to my entrance in Maynooth, it was the custom to teach them something that would be afterwards matter of examination in Trinity College.

Was the master of the school at which you were educated, a Protestant or a Roman Catholic?—He was a Protestant, a Mr. Maginn; and after his death, his son, Dr. Maginn, succeeded him.

Will you describe the course of your studies in the Dunboyne class?—The studies I have gone through as yet in the Dunboyne class, are trifling; I have only been in the class since September, and what we have read in the class during that time is some of the treatise De Religione, by Dr. Delahogue, and we have read some ecclesiastical history, and a small portion of canon law, besides which I have another class to attend in common with some of the students who attend it, that is the Hebrew class which we have once a week; in that class I have read a little of the Hebrew; hitherto I have gone through the first chapter of the Prophecy of Jonah.

Is Mr. Slevin the person who lectures to you?—He is; but Mr. Browne, professor of Scriptures, is also our professor of Hebrew.

Are your studies principally in class with Mr. Slevin, or privately by yourselves?—We have class with him three times in the week, and each time about an hour and a half; to prepare for this, we study by ourselves.

What hours of study have you, as preparatory for the class?—The hours of study in winter, and in summer, are not precisely the same, as we rise at different times; in summer we study from six o'clock till eight o'clock, we resume study at ten; on the days of class, we study till half past ten; there are two days in the week on which we have no class, and on which we are not obliged to study from morning study till night study, those are Wednesdays and Saturdays, but on Tuesday, when we have not class, we are obliged to study from ten o'clock till twelve; on the days on which we study, from ten till half past ten, we have a class of an hour and a half till twelve; after three quarters of an hour, we return to study again till a quarter before three; in the evening, we study from half past five till a quarter before eight. There is a little interruption in this course, owing to the Hebrew class, which upon Thursdays we have at twelve o'clock, it continues for an hour; three quarters of an hour after the expiration of that hour, we return again to study till the usual time.

Do you attend any lectures, in which the Sacred Scriptures are explained?—No; the students of the Dunboyne establishment do not, the other students in the theology class, do attend them.

You had attended those lectures before you became a member of the Dunboyne class?—Yes.

By whom were the lectures in Sacred Scripture given?—By Mr. Browne.

Were you possessed of a Bible, at the time you attended that class?—I do not think I had one of my own; but I had a great facility in getting the use of one to prepare for class.

By borrowing from some other person?—Yes.

Have you a Bible now?—Not in my possession; I have the use of a Hebrew Bible to study for the class.

Have you a New Testament?—I have it in Greek; not long since I had got a Bible, which I have not at present; when I went home at vacation, I left it at home.

Is that the Douay version?—Yes.

Is it the edition published by Coyne?—Yes.

Are you in possession of many books of your own?—Not very many.

Be so good as to describe generally what books you have of your own, what works on theology have you?—As for the books I have myself, I have not all of the tracts read in the theology class. I have not more than those, and not all of those.

You have others probably for your own private reading?—No, I have not other theology treatises. If I find it necessary to consult other authors, I have recourse to the library in which there is a good supply of them; I do not find it necessary to have them at present.

Have you any works on other than theological subjects?—I have a work called the British Classics, comprising the Guardian, the Adventurer and Rambler, with which are published Lord Littleton's Persian Letters; I have a Spanish Dictionary, and I have three small Spanish books, I have a Bossuet's Universal History, I have a Hebrew Grammar, by Yates, and I have the Elements of Hebrew reading, and some others.

Do you read Spanish?—Before I entered the college, I had read some; but since, having had no opportunity of practising and reading very little of it, even in private, I have forgotten a good deal of it; however, I still know a little.

Have you had any opportunity of acquiring the knowledge of the French language?—Before I entered the college, I knew it pretty well.

Have

Have you any knowledge of Italian?—No; I never could be said properly to study Italian.

Have you ever seen that volume at Maynooth?—[A copy of the Letter of Hierophilos to Mr. Canning, being handed to the Witness.—I have.

Have you seen several copies of it there?—I cannot say that I saw several. The number that I saw might be about three; but it is some time since.

Can you recollect on what occasion they were introduced at Maynooth?—I believe shortly after the publication of the letter.

Do you know in what manner they were introduced there?—Dr. M'Hale, was professor of theology at the time, and the students hearing of this being published, and being under the impression that he had written letters under the name of Hierophilos, were anxious to see this, so I believe it came in; I did not get one myself.

Was he himself instrumental in circulating it?—I never heard that he was.

Did he favour the circulation?—I have no reason to think that he did.

Was it not natural, however, that the students should wish to see what was written by their professor of theology?—It was natural that they should wish to see what they supposed was written by him.

Did any body doubt that he was the author of it?—It was believed generally pretty firmly that he was the author of it. I do not know what authority they had for it.

Has it ever been a subject of discussion among the students at Maynooth, in their familiar conversations, whether it is reasonable that the Established church of this country should be Protestant rather than Roman Catholic?—I do not remember having heard of such discussion.

You do not recollect that being a topic treated of among the students?—I do not recollect having heard it.

Have you ever heard the Established church mentioned at all in conversation?—The Established church is mentioned, because in our theological treatises it is natural that mention should be made of it; but as to the discussion of the reasonableness of the Established church being Protestant, I do not recollect such a discussion.

Or in other words, whether it was right and fitting, under all circumstances, that the Protestant should be the Established church, rather than the Roman Catholic?—I do not remember such a discussion.

The question is, not as to any particular discussion, but whether it was a topic that ever formed the subject of the conversations you have heard?—I do not think it was.

Have you ever heard any conversations as to the probability of the Established church continuing in this country?—As for these conversations they are things which I might have listened to carelessly, and not remember accurately; but I do not think it improbable, that I might have heard some person say, that in the course of time our religion, which is the true religion, as Catholics will say, will certainly become the religion of the state, that is to say that the state recognizing its truth, in time, will adopt it. Such things as that I should not deem it improbable to have been said; but I do not remember any particular conversation which I could point out as one in which it was said.

These questions do not refer to any particular instances of conversations, but rather as to whether you can say generally, that such have been the topics of conversation or have not?—I think in general such have not been the topics, at the same time I must remark, that I think it very difficult for any individual to say what were generally the topics of conversation; and I say so on account of the manner in which our time is spent, and our companions selected. It does not happen that we have a general range of companions through the whole body of students, for it is a custom that certain persons will walk together at certain hours of recreation, and that they continue so doing through the year; in consequence of that it appears to me that a person cannot have a good opportunity of knowing what is generally the conversation, as he must be limited to a few companions.

Is that practice enjoined by the superiors, or does it proceed from the voluntary act of the young men?—It is a custom from which they do not think of deviating; for which custom I do not believe there is any order given.

In what manner is it originally determined who is to be the companion of a particular young student?—They have free choice of the persons.

Have you ever known it to be the subject of conversation, whether the connection of the British Islands was advantageous or disadvantageous to Ireland?—I do not recollect any such conversation.

Do you belong to what is called the Sodality of the Sacred Heart?—I do not.

Do you know whether there is such a sodality at Maynooth?—There is such a sodality, of which some of the students of Maynooth are members.

Are there any other sodalities in the house, to your knowledge?—I do not know of any other.

Have you ever known of any teachers or preachers of any description, except the regular professors and teachers of the place, coming to Maynooth to visit the institution, and to give any instruction of any description to the students?—I was never present at any.

Did you ever hear of any such?—I happened to be rather late in my return from the vacation one year, and when I returned, I heard that the Retreat, which all the students perform at the beginning of each year, was conducted by Mr. Kenney; he is a Jesuit.

How long ago was that vacation of which you speak?—It is more than two years.

Appendix, N^o. 53.Examination of
Rev.William Delany,
2 November 1826.

Mr. Kenney had been Vice President at Maynooth?—So I heard.

What interval of time had elapsed between his ceasing to be Vice President, and returning to give those instructions?—I do not know the time at which he was Vice President; but I know that he had not been Vice President since I entered the college.

Did you ever hear of any other Jesuits repairing to Maynooth for the same purpose?—No.

Will you describe what you mean, by his conducting the Retreat?—Giving them lectures in morality, exhortations.

By them, do you mean the whole body of the students?—Yes; and some of the superiors attend occasionally.

Where are those lectures delivered?—Generally in the prayer hall, though of late in the chapel.

How long do those lectures last?—About half an hour each.

How often are they delivered?—Once a day.

For how many days together?—I believe the time is not invariable, but about four or five days.

Does not the office of conducting the Retreat include something else than delivering a lecture once a day?—Ordinarily the person who is said to conduct the Retreat does no more than give a lecture once a day. There are other things performed on the Retreat; there are other spiritual lectures read, but those are not the composition of the person who gives us the lectures in the pulpit; the other lectures are principally read from Massillon's charge to his clergy. I speak of Retreats as far as I have witnessed them.

When Mr. Kenney repaired to Maynooth, upon the occasion you speak of, to conduct the Retreat, did he do nothing else in the five days than lecture once a day for half an hour?—I was not present, and I do not know exactly what was done during that Retreat in that respect.

Have you any doubt that he acted as confessor, for instance?—I can have no reason to think that he did act so.

It is your present impression that he did nothing else but deliver those lectures?—It did not occur to me to inquire before, and I have no reason, pro or con.

When you speak of lecturing, do you refer to sermons or exhortations given in the pulpit?—Yes.

You do not mean such school lectures as are given by the professors?—No.

You have denominated them moral lectures?—Yes, they are exhortations to virtue and morality.

Were they in the nature of sermons?—Yes.

They were publicly delivered from the pulpit?—Yes.

Were they delivered in like manner as a sermon would be delivered by any clergyman ascending the pulpit for the purpose of delivering a sermon?—The person who delivered them did not put on a surplice such as other clergymen put on, though he wore a stole.

Who conducted the last Retreat?—The last Retreat was conducted by Mr. Dowley the dean.

Did he on that occasion give exhortations as is usual on these occasions?—He did.

Did he do nothing else but deliver a lecture once a day for half an hour?—At the end of the Retreat, like all the other professors of the college, I think he heard the confessions, but on the Retreat he did nothing else peculiar to the Retreat but give these lectures.

In point of fact could Mr. Kenney hear confession at Maynooth, unless he had special authority for so doing from the Board?—He could not, without authority from the bishop of the diocese.

But he might do it with such permission?—He might, but I have already stated that I do not know that he did any thing else, except what I heard that he conducted the Retreat.

Was it not a matter of perfect notoriety at Maynooth, and is it not so now that Mr. Kenney is a Jesuit?—It is generally believed.

Is that considered at Maynooth as a distinction, favourable or unfavourable, to the person to whom it belongs?—The body of Jesuits has been considered as a very learned body; and whatever honour will attach to a person for being a member of what is esteemed a very learned body, that honour attaches to Mr. Kenney on that account, but I do not know of any other.

The question has a reference to a popular prejudice, which we must all know exists amongst the uninformed, with respect to that society; in popular language the term often is understood to convey a certain degree of reproach; the question meant to elicit whether there is any feeling of that kind at Maynooth, or whether there is not the contrary feeling of considering it a badge of distinction?—As well as I know, for my own part, there is no disgrace whatever attached to a man for being a Jesuit; at the same time I do not know of any other honourable distinction being generally attached to it, except that which I have already mentioned of his being a member of a body esteemed for their learning.

And for their piety, perhaps?—And perhaps for their piety.

But, ceteris paribus, is not a person more respected at Maynooth for belonging to that order?—Whether he is more respected I do not know exactly; the secular clergy have also been very highly distinguished for their learning, so have the Benedictines; and though I admit that he would be esteemed on that account, yet that he would be esteemed for it more than the others now mentioned would, for belonging to their respective bodies, I do not know.

Observe

Observe the terms of the question, which are, whether, cæteris paribus, the belonging to that order is not considered an additional circumstance of honourable distinction?—I think not a more honourable distinction than the circumstance of his belonging, suppose to the Benedictines, or perhaps in the minds of some, to the secular clergy.

Is the circumstance of belonging to any religious order generally considered as a circumstance either derogatory or honourable, or a matter perfectly indifferent, with respect to the estimation in which the individual is to be held?—It is not held to be derogatory; we do not think the worse of a man for his belonging to a religious order.

Cæteris paribus, do you think the better of him?—That we think the better of him for his belonging to a religious order rather than belonging to the secular clergy, I am not prepared to assert; but it would be a circumstance that would make us think better of his virtue than of the generality of persons who are not leading what is termed a religious life.

By a religious life you mean the life of a regular?—Yes.

Have many of the students of Maynooth become regulars?—I know of some cases; I know of one who, after leaving Maynooth, I understood, without being promoted to orders, became a Franciscan friar.

Do you consider that as a very unusual circumstance?—It is unusual.

Is it extremely unusual?—It is very unusual.

Do you know enough of the rules and discipline of Maynooth to be able to state what permission it is necessary for a Jesuit to obtain, in order to be allowed to conduct a Retreat?—I never heard.

It is presumed that he cannot do it of his own mere motion, without obtaining the consent of the persons connected with the place?—At any rate the consent of the superiors of the college.

Are the Commissioners to understand from you, that the peculiar duty of the person who conducts the Retreat is simply to deliver discourses, in the nature of sermons, once a day during the Retreat?—That is what is generally done.

Are you aware of any other peculiar duty which he has to perform?—I mentioned before that I believe the dean, who, as far as my experience goes, conducts the Retreat, hears confessions at the end of the Retreat; besides which I do not think he performs any other duty.

Do not all the professors hear confessions at the end of the Retreat?—Yes.

Can you therefore consider the hearing of confession as the peculiar duty of the person who conducts the Retreat?—Certainly not in that view.

Then has the person who conducts the Retreat any duty to perform beyond the ordinary duties of a professor, except that one of delivering a daily discourse from the pulpit during the Retreat?—He has nothing else to perform, except his ordinary duties as dean, as well as I have known.

Do you know of any other?—I know of no other.

From your knowledge of Maynooth, is a person sought for to perform that duty through his character as a preacher?—From my knowledge of Maynooth, one person has generally conducted the Retreat; I say generally, because as well as I remember*, I know of only one exception, at which exception I was not present. Whether I am to consider that it was his character as a preacher that was the reason of it, I have no reason to assert positively.

Has not Mr. Kenney a high character as a preacher?—I understand he has.

Can you state to the Commissioners, whether or not a considerable number of the children of the Roman Catholic gentry of Ireland are educated under Mr. Kenney?—I understand they are.

Do you suppose those children are sent there on account of his being a Jesuit, or of his establishment having a high character as a public seminary of learning?—I cannot say that I am acquainted with any persons who send their children there, and as for the motives of the persons who send their children there, I cannot take upon me to answer.

Did you ever hear of any stranger, except Mr. Kenney, having conducted a Retreat at Maynooth?—No, I do not recollect hearing of any one besides Mr. Kenney.

Will you state how it happens, that you are not a member of the sodality of the Sacred Heart?—We are at liberty to become members or not.

What proportion of the students are members of the sodality?—That I cannot say.

Are the greater portion of them members of that sodality?—I cannot say.

Is there any time at which the members of that sodality are separated from the rest of the community, for the purpose of their private devotions, as connected with that sodality?—I never perceived that there was any.

Since you came to the college, has there been any period allotted for religious instruction to the students, as contradistinguished from their class studies, and the exercises in chapel; any thing in the way of lectures or sermons at stated times?—At the prayer in the morning, there are always some things read for meditation, that I may call religious instruction; besides this, we used occasionally to get some exhortations from the deans.

When did that take place?—I think it was before the last academical year that we had them,

[Subsequently added by the Witness.]

* Since I gave the above answer, I remember that once the junior and not the senior dean conducted the Retreat.

them, and since that, I do not recollect that we had any; besides those we get no religious instruction, unless you count as religious instruction, the sermons which the students preach every Sunday, but which are considered amongst us as a preparation for their preaching on the mission afterwards.

Are not those rather exercises for the students themselves, than instructions to the students?—They are so considered.

But the practice of exhortations by the deans, has not been pursued during the last academical year?—No.

Nor during the present one?—Not hitherto.

Examination of Mr. Anthony Reynolds: Monday, 13th November 1826.

Appendix, N° 54.

Examination of
Mr.

Anthony Reynolds,
13 November 1826.

THE Commissioners understand you are a student in the humanity class at Maynooth?—Yes.

That is the youngest class in the college?—Yes.

How long have you been a student?—Since the first of September.

From what diocese were you recommended?—The diocese of Kildare.

By the Bishop of Kildare?—Yes.

How is the selection of the persons who are to be sent to Maynooth made?—From merit.

How does the bishop ascertain the merit of the individuals?—Every ecclesiastical candidate belonging to his diocese, must remain a year in Carlow before he can be entitled to a free place in Maynooth; should he distinguish himself there, it is most likely that he will be sent to Maynooth if he makes application.

Did you go to the college at Carlow with a view to be educated as a priest?—No, it was not till I had been two years there that I determined to become a clergyman.

Did you obtain any distinction, either rewards or premiums?—I did.

What were they?—Every year I received a book as a premium.

What is your age?—I have attained my twentieth year.

Had you received any education previously to going to Carlow?—Not in the classics; merely in a course of mercantile education.

In what condition of life are your parents?—My father keeps a general shop in Kilcock, he also holds a considerable tract of land, something beyond two hundred acres.

Can you say at all what the average annual expense of your education at Carlow might be?—I should think about 50*l.* a year.

Did you live in the college at Carlow?—Yes.

Does that sum include all your expenses?—It includes, board, clothing, books, &c.

Do you know what expense you incurred upon first coming into the College at Maynooth?—As my parents live but a small distance from Maynooth, I can get every thing from home, and am therefore at little expense; but I should think if I were to buy my furniture, &c. it would come to about 35*l.* or thirty guineas.

Do you live in the college?—I do.

Have you a free place at Maynooth?—I have.

Will you state what studies you had gone through previously to your coming to Maynooth?—For the first two years I was at Carlow, my attention was chiefly confined to English. After that I properly commenced the Latin and Greek classics, I also read some French, Italian, and Hebrew, together with a considerable portion of natural philosophy, history and geography.

What classical authors had you read?—The last authors that I read in Carlow were in Greek, Euripides, Sophocles, and Plutarch; in Latin, Cicero de Oratore, Terence and Quintilian.

Setting aside any works in divinity, that you may have read, what other English authors might you have read before you came into Maynooth?—I have read Goldsmith's History of Rome, Greece, and England, also Robertson's History of Charles the Fifth, and of America, &c.

Was there any restriction upon the subjects that you read upon, or the works you read at Carlow?—Yes, we would not be allowed to read every publication in Carlow.

What was the rule that was given to you in that respect?—All immoral works were strictly prohibited.

With that exception, was there any other restriction upon you?—We were not generally allowed newspapers.

Had you access to any library?—Yes, the boys had a library into which I was admitted.

Have you at Maynooth any collection of books of your own?—I have.

In addition to those that are used in the class?—Yes, I have some English books.

Will you state what they are?—I have Bossuet's Universal History, the Histories of Greece and Rome; they are the only books that I have in the college at present, but I have some at home. I have Junius's Letters, a General History of the World, &c.

There is no objection to Junius's Letters being introduced into Maynooth?—No, we get a catalogue of the books that are allowed to be brought into the college, and that is mentioned in it.

Is that a printed catalogue?—No.

Did you take a copy of it?—I did not take a copy of it, but such as wished might.
When did you first see that catalogue?—A short time after our entrance, it was read by the professor in the class room.

By whom was it read?—By Mr. Boylan.

Was it a list of books that they preferred, or were all other books excluded?—All other books were not excluded, but the works mentioned in the catalogue were particularly recommended.

Have you a copy of the catalogue?—No.

In whose possession is it now?—Mr. Boylan's.

Does it comprehend a great many books?—It does a great number, most of the British classics; any book not of an immoral tendency would be permitted.

Are you in possession of a Bible or Testament?—I have both.

Had you a Bible at Carlow?—No.

Had you ever read any of the Bible or Testament before you came to Maynooth?—I had, but not under the guidance of an instructor,—we were taught at Carlow, Fleury's Catechism and Hornyhold's Exposition of the Creed.

Is it a Latin or an English Bible that you possess at present?—An English one.

Is it a rule in that class now, that every young man that comes in, is to possess himself of a Testament or Bible?—We are obliged to pay a certain sum at entrance, for which we receive books, and the Bible is one of them.

Have you that Bible in your own room?—I have.

Are you at liberty to read it as often as you please?—Yes.

Is the study of it encouraged?—Yes, we have a class in it twice a week.

Who is the person that gives you lectures in it?—Mr. Montague.

How long do those lectures last?—An hour is the appointed time.

What course of instruction does he give?—He expounds any thing that may be difficult in the lesson.

In what part are you reading?—It is Genesis that we are reading at present.

Have you had any lectures in the New Testament?—Not as yet.

Are your studies chiefly confined to Latin and Greek?—Mr. Boylan teaches us elocution, English composition, declamation and English grammar.

In what way does he teach you composition?—He proposes a theme upon which we write.

How often in the course of a week?—Once.

Will you describe as nearly as you can recollect, the three or four last subjects that have been set for you to compose upon?—One was upon the beauty and grandeur of the works of nature. Industry was proposed the last night, and before that we wrote letters, returning thanks for favours received.

Do you compose in Latin?—We do.

In prose or verse?—We at present compose in prose, but after Christmas we shall be exercised in verse composition.

Will you state what were the three or four last subjects in which you have composed in Latin?—We are at present translating Goldsmith's Roman History into Latin.

Are there any premiums given as rewards for the best compositions?—I was not there at the distribution of premiums, as I have been only two months in college, but I understand there will.

What Greek or Latin books are you now studying with the professor?—We are reading at present Xenophon's Anabasis and Cicero's Orations.

Have there been any other works read during the time that you have been a student in the humanity class?—No other.

Shall you continue to read those authors only during the whole time that you remain in that class?—No; we shall immediately begin Virgil, after Christmas, Homer, and we may perhaps read some of Juvenal and Epictetus.

Will you state as nearly as you can, what books you expect to have read both in Greek and Latin before you quit the humanity class?—I will have read Xenophon and Homer, then Cicero, Virgil, Horace, Livy, and if we have time, Juvenal and Epictetus.

You do not mean the whole of those works?—No, only a portion of them.

And in addition to this you will have studied under Mr. Montague a certain portion of the Old Testament, and you will also have studied elocution under Mr. Boylan?—Yes.

What works or what compositions will be comprehended under your study of elocution?—English composition and declamation are the subjects that come under it.

In what manner are you taught?—We are obliged to commit to memory a piece, on the delivery of which Mr. Boylan makes remarks, pointing out whatever may be good or bad in it.

From what books are the subjects of declamation usually taken?—We are at liberty to take them from any religious author we please, many however compose their own pieces.

Are they in English?—Yes.

In the hours of recreation are you allowed to associate freely with what companions you please?—We are; I know of no restriction.

Generally speaking, do you walk with the same persons at those times, or has it happened that you frequently change your companions?—That is according to each persons disposition.

You know of no rule or restraint upon the subject?—I know of no restriction, nor have I heard of any.

Appendix, N^o 54.

—
Examination of
Mr.
Anthony Reynolds,
13 November 1826.

You are not forbidden to select your acquaintance?—No.

Are not the freshmen separated from the students of older standing?—They are; all that are confined to the lay house are separated from the senior students; all that belong to the rhetoric and humanity classes, and some logicians that are freshmen, are not allowed at all to communicate with the others while they remain in the lay-house.

For how long does that separation continue?—After our first year, we are removed to the other house, to make room for the freshmen that succeed us.

Do you walk with them on the day on which the students are permitted to exercise themselves out of the walls of the college?—No, we take a different direction.

During the hour in which the students walk in the ground that is within the bounds of the college, in what way are you separated from them?—The lay-house is separated from the other part by a wall which entirely secludes us from them.

But among the inhabitants of the lay-college, your choice of society is unrestricted?—It is.

Was the restraint you were under during the time you were at Carlow, greater or less than that to which you are now subject at Maynooth?—The rules were the same in the lay-house in Carlow, but were not enforced with quite so much exactness as in Maynooth.

Was there any thing essentially different in the mode of instruction, or the mode of management?—No, except that more attention is given to composition in Maynooth.

Did you, upon your admission to Maynooth College, subscribe to the statutes?—No, I was not required to do so.

The Commissioners understand that the statutes are read, and that the particular clause is read, which is entitled, “Declarationes Alumnorum Collegii Romano-Catholici apud Maynooth”?—It is.

Is the rule with regard to silence enforced more strictly at Maynooth, than it is at Carlow?—Yes, somewhat more strictly.

Do the rules with respect to silence, which are observed in the college, generally apply to the freshmen in the lay-college, as well as to the others?—They do.

Appendix N^o 55.

Examination of Mr. Patrick Leahy; November 13th, 1826.

Appendix, N^o 55.

—
Examination of
Mr.
Patrick Leahy,
13 November 1826.

YOU are a student at Maynooth?—I am.

In the rhetoric or first humanity class?—Yes.

How long have you been in the college?—Between two and three months.

Do you live in the lay college?—I do.

Are there any persons in the rhetoric class that do not live in the lay house?—Yes; some of those that were in the lay house last year, who are seniors this year.

From what diocese were you recommended?—From the diocese of Cashel.

Are you a native of the county of Tipperary?—I am.

Can you state to what circumstance you owe your being recommended to Maynooth?—I cannot answer for the motives that induced my bishop to recommend me; I can state the circumstances connected with my application. I gave him to understand that I was anxious to become a clergyman; he did not give me a decisive answer immediately; he considered it for some time; he then, sending for me, acceded to my wishes.

Where had you been previously educated?—I received my education principally in Thurles; I was also at school in Clonmel not quite three months.

What seminary is there at Thurles?—I cannot say what seminary there may be in Thurles at present; I was educated at a classical day school.

Did you continue at that school till you entered Maynooth?—No, I lived in Clonmel latterly.

Did you prosecute your studies during the time you were in Clonmel under the superintendence of a master?—The time that I spent under the superintendence of a master in Clonmel would not amount entirely to three months.

What classical works had you read previous to coming to Maynooth?—I read the entrance course for Trinity College, and several other books not included in that course; I may say that I read a general course of classics.

What English works had you read?—I cannot exactly recollect.

Had you read many?—I had read some historical works; Goldsmith's Histories of Rome, Greece and England; Lingard's and Hume's Histories of England; Robertson's and Macintosh's History of America, the History of Ireland, &c.

Will you state, as nearly as you can, what might be the annual expense at which you were placed when you were at school at Thurles?—I think the general agreement was a guinea a quarter; it might for any thing that I know have been sometimes less, but that I think is what was generally paid. When commencing Latin and Greek, I was placed at a kind of preparatory grammar school, at which I think the charge was only half a guinea a quarter.

Where you a day scholar at Thurles?—I was.

In what condition of life are your parents?—My father is engaged in the surveying and engineering department.

Since you have been within the college, what has been the course of your studies?—Demosthenes and Quintilian constituted the course of Latin and Greek classics, which I read

I read since I came to college; this is the appointed business of every day in the classical department; we have English composition occasionally, and after Christmas, we shall have Longinus and the Art of Poetry of Horace, together with a supplemental Treatise on Rhetoric, written by Mr. Donovan, the professor of our class.

How often do those compositions occur?—We have Latin and Greek compositions for every day; occasionally our productions may not be called for, but it is the appointed business of each day.

Do you compose in Latin or Greek?—We have prose compositions in both; I understand that we shall have Latin composition in verse too after Christmas.

Will you state the last three or four subjects on which you composed?—The English composition in the rhetoric class is generally an abstract of the oration in Demosthenes that we last read. We write the substance of the principles and arguments of the orator in the best style we can; that generally constitutes the English composition in the rhetoric class; some of Cicero's Epistles are given in English, which we translate back into Latin, and we have Nelson's Exercises for Greek composition. There is another class also which is exclusively for English elocution. In this class we have composition once a week; a subject being appointed upon which we write. After these compositions have been submitted to the inspection of the professor, he generally selects the best and the worst of them, in order to make corrections in the latter, and to hold forth the former as specimens that might be useful to the class, and which, as exhibiting a degree of improvement in the writer, might operate as a stimulus on the minds of others. There is another exercise which is used to try the critical powers of the students; the professor writes down any blunders that he may have detected in these compositions, and he requires some individuals to rectify them. We have also declamation on every Friday, and the professor may ask any person by to pronounce his opinion on its merits, stating what he thinks may be its faults or its excellencies. It is discretionary with the person who declaims, to write the subject of his declamation, or to choose it out of a book that meets with the approbation of the professor. Lectures on the abstract principles of the English language in particular, and on philology in general, are delivered once a week. I know of nothing else connected with the immediate business of our class.

Do you attend any lectures on the sacred Scriptures?—Yes, twice a week, on Wednesday and Saturday.

Will you state what is the course of the lectures?—We generally have three chapters of Scripture each day, and a catechetical lecture.

What portion of the Scripture has lately been lectured upon?—I believe it is usual to begin the first book of the Bible, as one begins his academical year; accordingly the book of Genesis is the part of the Scriptures that has formed the subject of lecture since I came into the college.

What other class attend those lectures together with yours?—The second humanity class; there is also another class for divines distinct from ours.

Do you attend any lectures in the New Testament?—We go progressively through the Bible; hitherto we have had no lectures on the New Testament. But I should think we will, if we shall have read the Old Testament before the expiration of the year.

What catechism do you repeat?—Butler's catechism.

How often do you repeat it, and to whom?—We always have a certain portion of it on every Wednesday and Saturday, and are always interrogated in the words of the catechism by the Vice President, Mr. Montague.

Are you in possession of a Bible or Testament?—Of both.

Had you ever been possessed of a Bible or Testament before you came into college?—Sometimes I had, and at other times I had not.

Has it been an object of your study?—I have read a portion of the Bible attentively; the New Testament I made a particular object of study these two years back.

Are you encouraged to do so?—I am encouraged to do so at present; nay, I am under an imperative obligation to read and study the Scripture. Before I became a student of Maynooth College I was not discouraged to read the Bible; it was not disapproved of by any person.

Was it suggested to you by any body, or was it a matter of your own inclination?—It was my own inclination. From having read and been acquainted with the doctrine of our church on that head, I was convinced that it was not only not improper to do so, but on the contrary highly useful under certain salutary conditions.

In what edition have you read the New Testament, is it that lately published by Coyne?—No; I recollect when I was going to school, that I had an edition of I believe the Douay Testament, and a Greek copy, but I do not recollect to have had one since; I had the entire of the Bible together occasionally.

What edition of the Bible was it?—I recollect I once had a Protestant edition; I got it merely for the purpose of translating Greek into English; having been induced to buy it principally, if not entirely, on account of its cheapness, as it was sold for the small sum of ten-pence; I had a Douay Bible too at times; there was a prohibition issued against any Catholic retaining a Protestant edition of the Bible in his possession,—I immediately gave the one I had had to a Protestant friend of mine.

When did that occur?—About two years since; I had it but for a very short time.

What is the edition of the Bible that you now have?—The new edition of the Douay Bible, printed by Coyne in 1825.

Did you buy it upon your coming into Maynooth College?—I did.

Appendix, N^o 55.Examination of Mr.Patrick Leahy,
13 November 1826.

What is the amount of the deposit that you made upon being admitted into the college?—I think I paid about 14*l.* 18*s.* for every collegiate expense; that included both deposit and books.

What do you consider to be the application of that money?—I understand that a certain portion of it would be appropriated to the payment of a salary to a physician, who attends the college; that another part would be applied to the purchase of books, and that a third part constituted the deposit of a half year's pension.

Are you a free scholar?—No, I am a half pensioner.

Being only a half pensioner, what is the amount of the expense which falls upon yourself annually?—A person pays about 15*l.* at entrance; and I think I shall have to pay five guineas more at the term of half a year; then a person may purchase books at his own discretion; besides, at entrance into the college, one has to buy one's furniture, and I gave 5*l.* 10*s.* for mine.

Does the furniture you have bought continue your property, or is it left in the college when you leave it?—It is my property when I purchase it; I can dispose of it as I choose when leaving the college. I should think if I were to estimate every expense that a person is put to upon entering college, including clothes and every other item, it would amount to between forty and fifty pounds for the first year. This, I state as the probable expense under which a half pensioner would lie.

How old were you when you were admitted?—I was twenty years and a few months.

Are there any burses in the college connected with Cashel?—Not that I know, I should think there are not any.

Is there any thing of grievance or of complaint which the students wished you to communicate to the Commissioners?—The students have not expressed the least wish to communicate grievances of any sort through me. And to speak with regard to what has come under my personal knowledge, I can truly say, there are no complaints nor causes of complaint; on the contrary, I have heard some speak in the best possible terms of the treatment they have received since coming to the college.

Appendix, N^o 56.Examination of Mr. James William M'Gauley; 13th November 1826.Appendix, N^o 56.Examination of Mr.J. W. M'Gauley,
13 November 1826.

HOW long have you been a student at Maynooth?—This is my third year.

Were you in the rhetoric class?—I have read rhetoric; I am at present reading logic.

Where were you educated previously to your coming to Maynooth?—The last academy I was at was conducted by the Reverend Mr. Doyle, on Arran Quay; just before I entered Maynooth College I received instructions for three months from a gentleman at Trinity College at a guinea a month.

Were you a day scholar at Mr. Doyle's, or a boarder?—A day scholar.

Do your parents live in Dublin?—They live at Kilmainham, near Dublin.

Will you state in what situation of life they are?—They possess some houses in Kilmainham; my father undertakes to do the carpenter's work of buildings.

Have you any relations in the priesthood?—I have a second cousin who is a priest.

By whom were you recommended to Maynooth?—Immediately by Dr. Murray.

Can you tell what led to his recommending you?—I saw him before any person had recommended me to him, I believe.

Did you undergo any examination before him?—No, I did not.

Will you state what had been the course of your studies previously to your being admitted at Maynooth?—I read Latin grammar, syntax and prosody, part of Swain's Sentences, part of Cæsar, part of Virgil, part of Cicero, part of Justin, and I believe all Sallust; in Greek, part of the Greek Testament, the Greek grammar, I believe all the Cyropædia of Xenophon, a small portion of Homer, and some usual exercises in Greek and in Latin; I do not recollect any other classical works.

What age were you when you were admitted into Maynooth?—I believe I was very near sixteen years and a half old.

What examination did you undergo upon your admission?—I was examined in a part of the Cyropædia and in a part of Cicero.

By whom were you examined?—I do not exactly recollect the person.

Was it a strict examination?—It did not appear to me a very strict one.

Were you examined in the New Testament?—No; I was examined in the Catechism.

Were you examined in all the books that are stated in the card?—No; but I was liable to be examined in them; I had prepared all.

Were you admitted upon the establishment?—I entered a pensioner; in a short time I obtained a half place on the establishment, and just before vacation a whole one, on account of receiving the first premium in humanity.

What length of time were you a pensioner?—I had a half place at intervals until Easter; that is, when students from the diocese of Dublin, who were already on the establishment, were obliged, through sickness, to be absent from college; from Easter until the end of the year I enjoyed a permanent half place.

How long have you been upon the establishment?—Since the commencement of the first vacation after I entered the house.

You

You have described what books you read with your instructors previously to your coming to the college; what had you studied privately for your own amusement and instruction?—I had read the History of England and part of that of Ireland.

What History of Ireland did you read?—I had one volume of Crawford's History of Ireland, and part of Goldsmith's History of England; I do not at present recollect any thing else; I have read some French.

Had you studied French at all before your going into the college?—Yes.

Had you studied Italian at all?—For a short time.

What Scripture instruction have you received since you entered the college?—I believe we finished the Pentateuch in the two first years; I mean we read the same course in each year.

What course in the New Testament are you studying?—I am not studying any course at present.

Are you possessed of a Bible?—No; but I can have the use of one when I want it.

What instruction have you received in the New Testament?—None; I believe moral truths were explained after the instruction in the Bible, each day during the two first years; but I do not recollect that there was any instruction in the New Testament.

Do you repeat the catechism now?—No, it is not usual in the logic year.

What is the course of your study in the logic class?—I am reading the Logica Lugdunensis; we have not read any tract of ethics or metaphysics yet.

Does that comprehend the whole of your study?—I occasionally look into other tracts, which treat of the business of the class, when I think it is necessary; among others Burgersdicius, which I have.

Have you acquired a facility of expressing yourself in Latin when addressed by the professor in the class?—I think a tolerable proficiency, considering the shortness of the time that has elapsed since I began to do so.

How long have you endeavoured to do so?—Since the beginning of this academical year.

How long have you been in the class?—Since last September.

Do the greater part of the class express themselves in Latin with tolerable facility?—With as great a facility, I imagine, as can be expected.

Do one half of them?—I think more.

Do two-thirds?—I dare say full two-thirds.

Are you allowed to associate freely in the hours of recreation with any students that you please?—I do not know of any prohibition; of course it is usual to be more free with one person who is a particular friend than another who is not exactly so; the only restriction I know of is, that the junior are not allowed to have any communication, unless by special leave, with the senior students.

In the course of your studies at Maynooth, by how many different professors have you been lectured?—I have been lectured on the English language during the first year by one, and in the second class of humanity by another; during my second year I have been taught rhetoric by another, and this year logic by one and French by another; all different professors, except that the professor of French and English is the same.

Have you taken the oath of allegiance?—Yes.

Were you well aware of its nature and contents?—I think I was; at least I know the general tenor of it.

Are the terms and conditions of it well known at Maynooth?—I think they are.

What books are you now possessed of privately, not including class books?—I have but few.

Is not it the rule of the college that every student shall be possessed of a copy of the Bible?—I understand it is, since the beginning of last year, which was I believe the first in which such an obligation existed.

Does not that apply to the students that had been previously admitted?—Not that I am aware of; I have not been required to procure a copy of the Bible.

Were the Commissioners to understand you to say, that you have had no instruction in the New Testament since you came into the college?—I do not know that in the junior scripture class we have had any instruction in the New Testament.

Have you had it in any other way?—Besides by sermons, there is no regular mode of instruction that I recollect for the class to which I belong.

Appendix, N^o 57.

Examination of Mr. George Chapman; 13th November 1826.

YOU are a student in the College of Maynooth, and are now in the logic class?—I am.

How long have you been in the logic class?—Since the class commenced.

How long have you been in the college?—An academical year, and some months.

Into what class were you admitted?—The class of rhetoric.

Then you were never in the second humanity class?—No, I never was.

From what diocese were you recommended to Maynooth?—From the diocese of Ferns; I am a subject of Doctor Keating.

Did you undergo any examination before him previously to your being recommended to Maynooth?—I was a boarder in his seminary, and he prefers his subjects from that seminary in general; I underwent no particular examination, but the general examination held at Midsummer.

Appendix, N^o 57.

Examination of
Mr.

George Chapman,
13 November 1826.

Were you appointed upon any particular recommendation, or in consequence of distinction you had obtained in the school?—My coming to Maynooth was in the general way that any person is preferred; sometimes from interest, and sometimes from merit.

Had you obtained any premiums in the school?—I had some trifling premiums.

What seminary do you allude to?—The Catholic diocesan seminary in Wexford; its president is Mr. Murphy.

How long had you been there?—Three years and a quarter; previously to that I was in the College of Carlow.

How long were you in Carlow?—About two years and three quarters.

Will you state what you believe may have been the annual expense which you incurred during the time you were at the Roman Catholic diocesan school in Wexford?—When first I entered, there was a pension of 32*l.* a year; next there was a general reduction with regard to all the boarders of 2*l.*, making the pension 30*l.*; but the necessary articles I might require would make the expenditure amount to about 35*l.* or 36*l.*; as being near home, I had not much necessity for any large remittance from my friends.

In what situation of life are your parents?—My mother holds between 250 and 300 acres, under the Marquis of Ely, in the barony of Shelbourne.

What have been the course of your studies, during the time you were in the diocesan school at Wexford?—The course was generally that required for entrance into the three different classes in the College of Maynooth; that is, the humanity, rhetoric, and logic classes. I read those courses respectively; for entrance into logic, the Annals of Tacitus, the Georgics of Virgil, Longinus, and of course some other general requisites, to qualify me for English composition and declamation.

Had you read any English authors?—I had read a great many, for my own amusement.

Had you read any history?—Yes, I had read Roman and Grecian history in class; I had never attended a class of English history.

Had you read any English history privately?—Yes, as an amusement.

What English history had you read?—Goldsmith's History.

What examination did you undergo previously to your being admitted at Maynooth?—I was examined in Livy, in Longinus, and in Homer; and in some few general questions on the fundamental principles of Catholicity.

Is the Gospel of St. John part of the examination?—It is, I believe, for the humanity class; but it is a length of time since I read it.

Was it a strict examination that you underwent?—Yes.

How long might the examination continue?—I suppose between ten and fifteen minutes.

By whom were you examined?—By the superiors of the house, (the president was absent at the time,) the vice-president, the professor of logic, and the professor of humanity; I do not know of any others that assisted.

When you were first admitted, were you placed in the lay college?—Yes.

Do you still continue there?—No.

How long have you been admitted into the upper department?—Since my return after the vacation, on the first of September.

Are you on the establishment?—I believe I am at present.

When you were first admitted, were you on the list of pensioners?—As an half pensioner.

What expense did you incur during the first year that you were at Maynooth?—I state rather below the real sum when I say 35*l.*; I consider 40*l.* to be the sum.

What books are you possessed of, over and above those used in your class?—I have not an exact catalogue of them.

Have you many?—Not many; I have a few of the Classics, and a few volumes of the British Poets, and a few Catholic books of piety; they are works of Doctor Challenor's, the Vicar Apostolic of the Midland district in England.

Have you a Bible?—I have.

Were you possessed of it as soon as you came into the college?—I suppose about a fortnight after my entrance I got it; I did not bring one with me from home, as I understood they were furnished to the students by the house.

Had you a Bible in your possession previously to your coming to the college?—I had not one in my own immediate possession.

Have you attended the lectures delivered by Mr. Montague on the Sacred Scriptures?—I have.

Upon what portions of Scripture has he lectured?—The Pentateuch alone.

Have you attended any lectures on the New Testament?—No, I have not.

Have you read any portions of the New Testament privately to yourself, or under the guidance of others?—Never under the guidance of others.

Have you read any privately to yourself?—I might perhaps, in an idle mood, take up the volume, if it lay before me, and read merely to see the thing.

The Commissioners understand you to say, that you have only been in the logic class since the 12th September?—I do not know exactly the date, but since the beginning of September.

In the course of the business of that class, the professor addresses the students in Latin?—He does.

It is usual, also, for the students to return their answers in Latin, if they are capable of doing so, is it not?—Yes.

Will you state what portion of the class have, in the short time they have been in it, attained a proficiency in answering in Latin?—I should think there are not five students in the class that would not answer in Latin with perfect ease.

During

During the hours of recreation, are you at liberty to select what companions you please, or is it prescribed to you what persons you shall walk with?—It is not exactly prescribed with whom we are to walk, but custom has prevailed so far, that in the longest hours of recreation, we generally select persons from our own diocese.

In what way are you made aware of that custom; are you told that you should select persons from your own diocese?—No; but when a student enters college as a freshman, he naturally associates with his own diocesans; and it is not to be expected that he will be very much acquainted with others from a strange diocese, unless he is united to them by ties of consanguinity; and in that case the custom does not prevail.

Then you do not understand that you are restrained at all by your superiors as to that matter, but you are left entirely to your own discretion?—We are left to our own discretion; there are many that do select their associates from among persons of other dioceses.

If you happen to disagree, do you change your associates with the same ease as if you were not in the college?—I do not think that is the case; it is very seldom done, at least, because it is calculated to give something like scandal, if a person does not associate with another, where previous intimacy existed; there would be, perhaps, ill surmises made respecting the character of both individuals.

Must it not happen occasionally, that disagreements take place between persons who have been accustomed to associate together?—It must happen sometimes.

If it did happen, would not the result be the same as between any two individuals out of the college, that the intimacy would cease?—I do not think it would; I think religion would oblige them to make up the difference as soon as possible.

So that if a man embarks with a particular associate at the beginning of the year, he is to associate with him for the whole of that year at least?—There is no positive precept for it.

But the practice is so?—The practice is so; I would not, however, have it understood that such agreement, made in the commencement of the year, precludes the possibility of a separation before the year expires.

What is your understanding as to the books which may be brought by a student into the college; is a student at liberty to bring into his apartment, for his own use, whatever books he thinks proper, or is there any prohibition upon the subject, or any list of prohibited books?—I do not know if there be a list of prohibited books; but this I know, that every book is allowed in the house, unless it contains something that tends to bring morals into contempt, or expose them to danger.

Was there any catalogue read in your presence, when you entered college, of books that were particularly recommended to be read?—Yes, there was; but that catalogue, if I mistake not, was given to us to select good English class-books, calculated to form the taste of an English writer.

You do not mean, by class-books, those that were to be used in the lectures of your professors?—No.

Appendix, N° 58.

Examination of Mr. Edward Aylward; November 13th, 1826.

IN what class are you in the College of Maynooth?—In the class of mathematics and natural philosophy.

How long have you been at Maynooth?—An academical year and two months.

Were you admitted into the logic class?—I was.

What examination did you undergo upon your admission?—I was examined in Longinus and in Livy.

How long did your examination last?—I cannot tell the time exactly, I suppose about fifteen minutes.

By whom were you examined?—By one of the professors; and I must observe that there were many of the other superiors present upon the occasion.

Was the examination of such a description as really to put you to the proof of all that you knew; was it a strict examination?—It was strict enough.

Where were you educated previously to your entrance into Maynooth?—In the seminary in Kilkenny.

How long were you there?—For five years and more.

Will you describe the course of your education there?—I was initiated in the Latin language before I entered the seminary, and I then read all the authors, both Latin and Greek, that are required to be known by such as offer themselves for the logic class in the College of Maynooth; I also acquired a tolerable knowledge of French, and read Goldsmith's Greece and Rome, geography, and Reeve's History of the Bible; the mathematics formed a part of my studies, and I read some algebra, geometry and a part of trigonometry. There were many other minor exercises which it would be tedious to enumerate, and among the rest, our memory was exercised by reciting each week a certain number of lines taken from the poetical works of Pope; I must observe that the greatest attention was paid to declamation.

At that time had you any intention of entering the priesthood?—I had.

Did you read any portion of the Old or New Testament?—I read part of the New Testament, the Gospel of St. John.

Appendix, N^o 58.

Examination of
Mr.

Edward Aylward,
13 November 1826.

Did you read it in Greek?—I read it in Greek and in English too at Kilkenny; at one period it was required that each should commit it to memory.

What might be the annual expense you incurred while you were at Kilkenny?—Thirty-two pounds and more, not including clothes nor any other accidental extra expenses.

What was the expense you incurred the first year of your being at Maynooth?—I expended 48*l.*; but it must be known that I had provided myself, ere I left home, with as much clothes as would in all probability bear me out through the year.

Of what books are you possessed?—Two copies of the Holy Bible, the course of theology, of the mathematics and physics, logic, metaphysics and ethics, Johnson's works and the Spectator, Hervey's Meditations, Milton's Paradise Lost and his Paradise Regained, with several others which I cannot at this moment bring to my recollection. Burke's works were once in my private collection, but they are now the property of one who was instrumental in conducting me through the paths of learning, and whose friendship I deem it my highest glory to cultivate.

Have you purchased these since you came into the college?—All, save one copy of the Bible, and Burke, which was given me as a premium.

Are you under a very strict examination or controul as to the books you purchase, or are you at liberty to buy any, provided they have not an immoral tendency, or are not hostile to the doctrines of the Catholic religion?—I am at liberty to purchase as many as I please, provided they be not hostile to the Catholic religion, nor of an immoral tendency. The senior students I can learn are not under so strict a controul as those in my class and the classes below me.

What lectures have you attended besides those delivered by the professor of natural philosophy and of mathematics?—The mathematics and natural philosophy constitute my only study for this year; but in the last I read logic, metaphysics and ethics, besides attending a class of French and one of English rhetoric.

Have you attended any lectures, the object of which is to expound the Holy Scriptures?—No; French is taught during the hour that the Scriptures are expounded, and on this account I could not attend the lectures.

Of what age are you?—About twenty-two.

In what situation of life are your parents?—My father is a farmer.

In what part of Ireland?—In the county of Kilkenny.

Will you be so good as to describe the course of study in your class?—In arithmetic we read addition, subtraction, multiplication and division of whole numbers, vulgar and decimal fractions; we then passed into algebra, and there read addition, subtraction, multiplication and division of integral and fractional quantities, involution and evolution, simple and quadratic equations, ratios, proportions, progressions and variations, a few propositions in Surd's logarithms and some geometry.

Have you had time to go through the different things you describe since you have been in the class?—Yes.

How long have you been in it?—We began about the 20th of September in this year.

Have you already completed all you have mentioned in the two months that have since elapsed?—We have.

Has the whole class been carried forward through that course, or only a few of the persons of the best capacity in it?—The whole class has been carried through it.

Had you any previous acquaintance with those matters?—I read, ere I entered Maynooth, some algebra, a part of trigonometry and geometry.

How many does the class consist of?—About seventy-five.

How many of the seventy-five do you think have proceeded successfully through the course you have described?—I cannot define the number.

Do you conceive that the half of them have?—Were I to judge from appearances, I could say that the generality of them have a tolerable knowledge of the business that we have passed.

How many are called in a day to be examined?—We have no fixed number.

What is the usual number?—About two or three in an hour, very seldom four.

Are they called upon pretty regularly in succession, or are there any individuals that are principally selected for the purpose?—Each is called upon in his turn, but the precise time in which he may be called upon is ever uncertain.

Can you say how often you have been called yourself?—I was called three times.

Will you describe what instruction you receive in natural philosophy?—We have not commenced it yet.

When shall you begin to do so?—After Christmas.

Have you any books in your private collection upon the subject of logic or moral philosophy?—None save the tract which is read in class.

Have you access to the library?—No.

Is there any general feeling in the majority of the class of natural philosophy that the studies of that year are less connected than those of other years with their own immediate profession, and therefore perhaps are less attended to by them?—I cannot recollect that the remark was ever made.

According to your own observation do the students of that particular class attend as much and as sedulously to the business of that year as they do to the business of other years?—I think the physicians of this year are studying as intensely as they did last year, and perhaps some individuals more so.

Do the students at Maynooth pay the same degree of attention to the studies of the natural philosophy class as they do to the studies of the theology class?—I cannot speak for the the gentlemen of the theology class, but for myself I pay as much attention to my present studies as I have done to any in which I have been yet engaged.

The question is, whether as a general observation it is true, that the students of the mathematical and natural philosophy class consider that study an object to which they need not pay the same attention as they do to the studies of the other years?—I cannot speak the mind of the students generally.

Have you any reason to think that is the case?—Perhaps there may be a few individuals who, conscious of their narrow powers, consider themselves not bound to study those subjects as intensely as they would study theology.

Do you think, judging from your own observation, that the majority of the students in the mathematical class pay the same degree of attention to their studies in that class that the majority of the students in the theology class pay to their studies?—I have no communication with the theology class, and therefore can know nothing about it; for the gentlemen of my own class I can say that they are studying most closely, and there may perhaps be found among them some who are applying themselves more diligently to the business of this year than to that which immediately preceded it.

Have you studied French in the college?—Yes.

Do you study it now?—No; unless that I read some works occasionally for my amusement.

Had you any acquaintance with the French language before you entered the college?—I had; I acquired a tolerable knowledge of French at Kilkenny.

Have you any knowledge of Italian?—No.

Or of Spanish?—No.

Or of Hebrew?—No; that comes in a future part of the course.

How long have you been removed from that portion of the building that was formerly the lay college?—I never spent more than one night in the lay college, and know not why I was detained in it so long, unless it was that my superiors did not find it convenient to remove me immediately to the other house.

How happened it that you did not go to the lay house when you were a freshman?—I conceive it to be a mere matter of convenience.

Do you change rooms after you once get into an apartment on the side of the college in which you live now?—If I found a better room vacant I could have it by making application to the dean, provided my senior did not apply before me.

Is it understood that you subscribe to that declaration at the end of the Regula Pietatis, which is entitled, “Declarationes Alumnorum Collegii Romano-Catholici apud Maynooth?”—I did not subscribe it.

Is it read annually?—It is.

Is it understood that all the young men in the college are bound by that promise at the end of the Regula Pietatis?—I know not.

You were never called to subscribe it?—No.

Have you taken the oath of allegiance?—I have.

Are the statutes read aloud to the students at any period of the year?—They are.

Are the rules contained in the statutes well known to the students?—They are supposed to be acquainted with the rules contained in the Regula Pietatis, for each is obliged to get a copy of it.

But not of the statutes?—The statutes, I believe, are not so well known; the rule which obliges us to purchase the Regula Pietatis, does not extend to the statutes.

Appendix, N° 59.

Examination of Mr. Charles Cassidy; November 13th, 1826.

HOW long have you been a student at Maynooth?—I have completed my fifth year; I am entering on my sixth.

Have you been resident during that time in the house?—Yes, I believe I have been resident there, except, I think, about the space of three months in my first year's theology.

How long have you been in the divinity class?—This is my third year.

You have been elected freely by the students of the divinity class to come here on their part?—Yes; I consider the election to have been perfectly free.

Is there any thing particular relating to the Institution, that you would wish to communicate to the Commissioners, or which you believe that the class would wish you to communicate to them?—I have not been deputed by the class to communicate any thing particular relative to the Institution, and for my own part, I have no grievance to state.

The question did not relate particularly to grievances, but was quite general, as to whether it was your wish to offer any suggestion to the Commissioners respecting the College of Maynooth?—I confide too much in the judgment of my superiors, to think that I could suggest any thing that they would not have foreseen, with regard to the benefit of the establishment, or any thing of that kind.

How many spiritual Retreats have you witnessed since you came to Maynooth?—We are in the habit of performing two spiritual Retreats each year; I have stated before, that I was absent part of a year, and during my absence a spiritual Retreat was performed.

Then you have been present at nine spiritual Retreats?—Yes.

Can you state, upon recollection, by whom they were severally conducted?—They were

Appendix, N^o 59.Examination of Mr.Charles Cassidy,
13 November 1826.

all conducted by Mr. Dowley, with the exception of one of those Retreats, which was conducted by Mr. Kenney, the Jesuit.

How long ago is that one to which you now advert?—I think it was last September two years.

Will you state exactly what was done by Mr. Kenney upon the occasion of conducting that Retreat?—On that occasion, Mr. Kenney conducted the Retreat as Mr. Dowley is in the habit of doing; with this exception, that Mr. Kenney gave two spiritual lectures each day, whereas Mr. Dowley gives but one. The object of those Retreats is principally to afford us an opportunity of pious reflection, and preparation for confession; the confession being made at the conclusion of the Retreat.

How many spiritual lectures were given on each day?—Mr. Dowley is in the habit of giving a lecture when the Retreat commences; on each succeeding day we receive a lecture from him at twelve o'clock. There are several lectures read out of books in the course of the day, but not by Mr. Dowley. Mr. Kenney, as well as I can recollect, gave two spiritual lectures on each, as I have already stated.

That time is five days, is it not?—Either five or six.

Was the part assigned to Mr. Kenney nothing further than giving two lectures on each day?—Nothing more, that I am aware of.

Did he not hear confessions, for example?—Not that I was aware of.

Did he hold any particular examinations of the young men?—I know of none.

Do not such examinations regularly form a part of the spiritual Retreat?—At the end of the Retreat, we are supposed to make a confession, and to receive the blessed Sacrament afterwards; but, as far as I can recollect, I am nearly positive in asserting that Mr. Kenney has not heard the confessions of the students.

Is there not, independently of the lectures of which you have spoken, a suggestion of subjects of meditation upon the part of the person who conducts the Retreat?—Yes; the person who conducts the Retreat proposes certain matters for consideration, and the students are to meditate on those in silence afterwards. But this I consider to constitute part of the lecture.

Do you happen to be a member of the Sodality of the Sacred Heart, which, the Commissioners understand, exists at Maynooth?—No.

Can you give the Commissioners any information as to the nature of the rules of that sodality?—Not being a member, I know nothing concerning it; but if I could hazard an opinion, I think it is nothing more than a particular kind of devotion towards the Sacred Heart.

Do you know what determines any particular student to be or not to be a member of it?—I should think that a student, who becomes a member, is determined by a special devotion towards the Sacred Heart.

The question is, in what manner it is determined who shall belong to it, and who shall not?—It is announced, by one of the superiors, that there is such a society, and that any person who thinks proper may unite himself to that society; the superior at the same time declares, that the object of it is the promotion of piety in the college.

If so, should not one naturally suppose that that would be an effectual recommendation to every one in the college to belong to it?—A person would think so, were we to suppose that all are equally pious.

Upon what occasions do the superiors make the suggestion you have mentioned?—I have never heard them make it more than once.

Was that upon the occasion of a spiritual Retreat?—I do not think it was.

Have you any means of knowing how long that sodality has existed at Maynooth?—I know not.

Do you conceive that it existed there from the commencement of the institution?—I conceive that it has existed there before my entrance into the college.

Do you know how many members there are?—I am not aware of the number.

Have you admission to the library?—I have, during certain hours.

How many days in the week?—Every day in the week in which we have class, Wednesday excepted.

For how long?—I think from ten until two o'clock, unless during the hours of class.

The Commissioners understand that all the divinity class are permitted to have access to the library?—Yes.

Is that privilege very much taken advantage of by the students?—I think it is; I know that the generality of the students of the theology class are in the habit of frequenting the library, and are very anxious to do so.

Into what class were you originally admitted upon your entrance into the college?—Into the rhetoric class.

Where had you studied previously to your coming to Maynooth?—I am a native of the county Fermanagh; I had studied at a school, the proprietor of which was a Catholic.

Where was the school situated?—The school was held at M'Guire's Bridge.

How long were you there?—I had been at two different schools; at one, I dare say about three years, and at the other nearly the same, before my entrance into the college.

Were you a boarder at those schools?—No; they did not receive boarders.

What might have been the average annual expense of your education previously to your going to Maynooth?—I could not form a conjecture as to what the total annual expenses were, but I can state that the expense of paying my teacher was a guinea a quarter, and a guinea on entrance.

Can you recollect at all what books you had read before you entered Maynooth?—I had read the course which the generality of students intended for the situation of life which

I have

I have embraced, read; such as persons have read who enter Trinity College; I had read in classes with such persons.

Did you undergo a strict examination upon your admission into Maynooth?—It was tolerably strict.

How long did it last?—I think about the space of twenty minutes.

Is the examination such as really brings a boy's proficiency to the test, or is it likely that a person of very little previous knowledge of Greek and Latin could pass through it without disgrace?—I consider that the examination for the first class is such, that a person's proficiency will be pretty well tried; it is possible of course that they might be somewhat deceived; this may depend upon the authors which are placed in a young man's hands at entrance; if the authors are such as he has been well versed in, he may make a good examination, though he is not a perfect master of the Greek and Latin languages; but I should think they are generally very well able to ascertain from the examination the merits of each individual.

Are there instances of persons being refused admission to the college in consequence of not answering satisfactorily at the examination?—Some instances of it occur almost every year; I have known myself, I cannot say several instances of it, but I have known a few.

Will you have the goodness to state to what circumstance you owed the recommendation made by your bishop for your admission to Maynooth, was it as matter of favour, or for any personal merit of your own, which you showed upon examination?—I cannot suppose that my bishop would be influenced by such a motive in sending me, were he not aware that I was qualified for entering; whether he had a private motive I have not ascertained. My bishop was under the impression that I knew the course which was preparatory to that at college tolerably well, and that that was a recommendation I have no doubt.

Was he applied to on the subject?—Yes.

Is it the practice for the bishop to look out for young men, or do the friends of the young men who wish to be admitted apply to the bishop?—I should rather think the parents of the young men who are intended as candidates apply to the bishop.

Have the goodness to state in what situation of life your parents are?—I conceive my parents to belong to that state of life which we call the middle class of society; and with regard to the generality of the students of Maynooth, it is my opinion that their parents belong to the same order of persons; there may be some, who, perhaps, are not in so good a situation, but there are others that are above that order.

By the middling order, do you mean the agricultural order, or the commercial order?—I mean either; I mean persons who can live independently, and who, perhaps, could provide for their children a situation that would be more lucrative than the priesthood.

It is not unfrequent in Ireland to meet with persons who call themselves poor scholars, many of whom state, that they are educating themselves as well as they can in order to obtain admission into Maynooth College; will you state whether you have known any persons in Maynooth of that class?—If by poor scholars you mean those persons who go about begging their subsistence, I most positively answer that there are no such persons at Maynooth,—so far from it, if we advert to the expenses that attend necessarily upon a young man's entrance, I think it will appear that it is not only improbable, but altogether impossible that such a person should enter; my reason for saying so, will, I think, appear conclusive. I conceive the lowest average of the expenses of a person for his first year, even on the establishment, will be 50 l.; for myself, I can state, that having received an account from my father of the expenses of my first year, he has stated to me that they amounted to 70 l. though I entered on the establishment; under such circumstances it is very reasonable that a person should inquire how it is possible that a poor scholar could enter Maynooth; I think it is impossible.

Did you pass through the class of natural philosophy?—I have read the regular course from the rhetoric class up to the class I am now reading in, which is the third class of theology; of course I have read natural philosophy.

Had you any previous acquaintance with the subjects treated of in that class before you entered the college?—I cannot say that I had; I had studied privately; however, I had not acquired such knowledge as would qualify me for passing over that class without attending it in Maynooth.

During the time you were in it, were you able to acquire a competent knowledge of the subjects treated of in it, or is the time too short to enable the professor to give competent instruction upon those subjects?—I think the object of the professor is principally to lay the foundation for any perfect knowledge which a person may afterwards wish to acquire; I do not think that the professor of mathematics conceives that the generality of his class shall have that perfect knowledge of the mathematics which a person might be supposed to have; but I am certain, that any person of moderate talents, if he attends to his exposition, can, in the course of his life afterwards, if he wishes to study, acquire, perhaps, a perfect knowledge of that science.

Is not the study of the theology class of such a nature as to exclude all matters from it that do not strictly belong to the class; is not it impossible for a student, when once he has passed into the theology class, to give any time to the study of mathematics?—It is supposed that he should altogether disengage himself from any study in which he has been engaged heretofore in the college; he is supposed, during the years he has devoted to natural philosophy, logic and metaphysics, to have attained a sufficient knowledge of those subjects, and consequently, when he enters theology, he is supposed to devote his time to that study almost exclusively.

Have you acquired a competent knowledge of the French language?—I cannot say that I have

Appendix, N° 59.

Examination of
Mr.

Charles Cassidy.

13 November 1826.

I have acquired a competent knowledge of it; I think I have acquired a tolerably good knowledge, such a knowledge of it as will enable me hereafter, if I attend to it, to become perhaps perfect master of it.

That you have acquired in the college?—Yes.

Have you any acquaintance with the Italian language?—Not any.

The study of Hebrew is a part of the theological course, is it not?—Hebrew is a study attended to by the Dunboyne students, and the other persons that are reading theology who think that they can devote so much time to it from the study of theology.

Do you think that the expectation of being elected to the Dunboyne class acts at all as a stimulus upon the young men, and tends to encourage them to assiduity and good conduct?—In the present circumstances, I think the number who are emulous of entering the Dunboyne establishment is rather small; there might have been a greater number of candidates heretofore, but I am inclined to think that the number is greatly diminished.

To what circumstance do you attribute that?—The gentlemen of the Dunboyne establishment have been deprived of some privileges, which they heretofore enjoyed; I must of course suppose that the superiors acted conscientiously in doing so; but I conceive that the privation of those privileges has removed in a great measure that kind of emulation which they otherwise would have experienced previous to their entrance on that establishment.

Will you explain a little more fully what privileges you allude to?—Heretofore they enjoyed the privilege of having a fire in their room, in the same manner as the professors of the College of Maynooth; that privilege they have been deprived of, and in consequence of that they conceive themselves to be rather uncomfortable; they think, of course, that as having remained so long in college, and having spent that time in studying very closely, they ought to be entitled to something more than ordinary students.

Is there any thing else of which they have been deprived, which you think they feel the loss of?—I am not aware of any thing; some time ago there was not a professor to preside over them, and they were obliged to hold a public Thesis, I think once a year, to write on certain questions, and I believe this was the sum of their study during the year; but at present they have got as a professor, Mr. Slevin, and it is my opinion that the introduction of a professor there is a matter of great utility.

What is the doctrine that has been taught to you respecting the infallibility of the Pope?—Although I have not read the question in class, I must state, that the doctrine I have heard maintained by the persons who have read it there is, that the Pope at the head of the council is infallible; it is my opinion, that no student in the college maintains the individual infallibility of the Pope; that is, his infallibility in a private capacity.

The question relates merely to the Pope speaking, as the head of the church, upon a matter of faith, and of nothing else; but apart from the general council, have you heard his authority under such circumstances discussed?—I have never heard his authority discussed under such circumstances.

Will it not form a necessary part of your lectures, before you pass through the college, to consider how far the Pope may be infallible under the circumstances that have been suggested?—I have stated the general opinion regarding the infallibility of the Pope; he is considered by Catholics who discuss the matter to be infallible, speaking ex cathedra, on matters of doctrine, united with the church, that is, united with the bishops in council. With regard to other points, I have never heard it discussed, as I have been absent during the time it was treated.

Supposing the Pope ex cathedra, but without the bishops, to propound a matter purely of faith, can you state whether it is understood by the majority of the students of Maynooth, that he can err in stating that proposition?—I have stated before, that I have not heard the question discussed; but if I be allowed to offer a conjecture, his infallibility in this respect is a mere matter of opinion.

Have you ever heard the merit of undertaking pilgrimages to holy places discussed at Maynooth, either in class or elsewhere?—Never.

Do not you conceive that that question naturally belongs to some period of the course of divinity in which you are engaged?—I have not read any to which I should think it essentially belonged.

Would it not belong, for instance, to the doctrine of penance?—No; when we talk of penance, we do not talk of the particular external mode of penance; we speak of it more particularly as a sincere sorrow for our past sins, without which contrition or sorrow we consider it impossible such sins could be remitted.

Examination of Mr. William Rogers; November 13th, 1826.

Appendix, N° 60.

Examination of
Mr.

William Rogers,

13 November 1826.

HOW long have you been a student at Maynooth?—Upwards of five years.

Into what class were you admitted?—The logic class.

What examination did you undergo at your admission?—I underwent an examination at the commencement of the eighth book of the Iliad of Homer, in Longinus, in Cicero pro Milone, I think, and in catechism; I do not recollect what else.

How long did your examination last?—I suppose something about half an hour.

By whom were you examined?—I do not recollect; most of the professors were present, I believe, as I entered late in the year.

Will

Will you state where you had studied before you were admitted into Maynooth?—I had studied principally in two schools; they were the two last in which I had studied, one of them was the Protestant diocesan school of Cork, conducted by the Reverend Doctor Lee, the other was Clongowes Wood College.

How long were you in each of those schools?—I was not more than I believe fifteen months at the Protestant diocesan school; I was about four years and a half at Clongowes Wood.

What might be the annual expense of your education at Cork?—I think, including French, it must have amounted to about three or four guineas a quarter at least.

Were you a daily scholar?—Yes.

Are your parents resident in Cork?—They are.

In what situation of life are they?—My father is a woollen draper and an army contractor for men's necessities and accoutrements on a large scale.

What may be the average yearly expense of the education of a scholar at Clongowes?—For persons under twelve, 50*l.* a year, besides several extras; for persons over twelve, fifty guineas a year and extras, that generally made it amount to about sixty guineas a year.

Were you early destined to the priesthood?—No.

Were you determined in your own mind when at Clongowes to enter into the priesthood?—I formed a determination during my course at Clongowes to enter it.

Did it arise spontaneously in your own mind?—It arose spontaneously.

When you went first to Clongowes, did you intend to enter into the priesthood?—No.

Can you recollect at what period of the four years and a half you spent there, you came to the resolution to do so?—I cannot recollect; I think it was about the middle of my course.

Had you obtained any distinctions as rewards of merit at Clongowes before you thought of entering into the priesthood?—I did obtain distinctions during my course there.

Will you describe the course of your study at Clongowes?—It was a general course of classics, French, arithmetic, and some algebra; I learned some Italian there, also poetry or humanity, and rhetoric.

Did your reading extend beyond the necessary studies for the classes that you went through at Clongowes?—Yes.

Were you left at discretion to read pretty much as you chose, provided that immoral books were excluded, or books that controverted the truth of the Roman Catholic religion?—Rather so; in fact I may be allowed to state, that with regard to that, we had an establishment called the Boys' Library, to which we contributed so much per month out of our pocket money, and to which books were given by some of the students at the commencement; it was a library containing general reading.

Were the books in various languages?—Chiefly in English.

As far as your memory will enable you to do so, will you state the principal books that were there?—I recollect there were some English poets; there were some of the prose works which are considered best calculated for the improvement of young minds, such as all of Miss Edgeworth's works; there were works of history I believe, and there were generally some of the first English productions; I think we had in it Sheridan's speeches, and the classic orators of the English language.

Had you yourself time and inclination to read much, excepting what was the subject matter of your study in class?—Yes.

Can you call to recollection what books you read while you were at Clongowes?—I read a good deal there; I read most of the English classics, and several portions of the Greek and Latin classics, which were not included in the class business, but in which I stood a second examination, called the Academics, which were public.

Did you study mathematics at all at Clongowes?—I studied a portion of algebra.

What theological instruction had you at Clongowes?—We studied Butler's catechism, and a larger catechism, which was very full of texts or references rather to Scripture.

What is it called?—The title page did not contain any particular author's name by which I can distinguish it.

Is it in use at Maynooth?—No.

Did you ever see it any where else than at Clongowes?—Never, to the best of my recollection.

[A book was handed to the witness, entitled, An Abridgment of the Christian Doctrine, with Proofs of Scripture for points controverted, by way of Question and Answer.]

Is that the book to which you refer?—I am almost certain this is the book.

Did you ever read any portion of the New or Old Testament when you were at Clongowes?—I did.

Did it form a regular part of your study, or was it only part of your own private study?—The reading of the Bible I do not immediately recollect to have formed a regular portion of our studies; I do not think it did; but we had very often passages of the Bible, that is, certain facts selected for the purpose of writing in praise of them, for instance, certain great exploits in the Old Testament.

Had you a Bible of your own at Clongowes?—No.

Would you have been allowed one if you had wished to have had one?—I suppose I would.

Did you know any student who had one?—I do not immediately recollect any.

Are not the larger portion of the students at Clongowes lay students?—All of those that had read as far as I read.

Was your education, you being destined for the priesthood, at all different from that of the lay students?—After I had destined myself for the priesthood, my education did not differ in the slightest degree from that of the lay students.

Appendix, N° 60.

Examination of
Mr.

William Rogers,
13 November 1826.

Did any subjects of a political character form a part of the instruction given to you at Clongowes?—They never formed a part of any public instruction given to us at Clongowes, nor of any regular instruction; and I believe I may say there was never any thing with which I could be dissatisfied as a person paying allegiance to the government of this country, even in general conversation.

Was any doctrine whatever respecting the infallibility of the Pope taught at Clongowes?—I heard it spoken of there.

The question does not refer to conversation, but to the matter of instruction given?—As a matter of instruction to the students I have not heard it inculcated.

Were the opinions held upon that subject at Clongowes similar to those entertained at Maynooth?—As I was a mere boy when at Clongowes, I do not think that I was competent to form a judgment on such a subject; I believe the free opinions of some of the superiors of Clongowes were not perfectly the same on that subject as those which I afterwards had reason to believe to be held by the superiors of Maynooth; I speak of spiritual individual infallibility. I do not mean to speak at all at present of the Pope's temporal power, which the superiors of Clongowes reject.

Will you point out in what respect you believe they differed?—I believe that some of the conductors of Clongowes, they being perfectly at liberty to hold either side of the question, paid more deference to the opinion of the Pope's individual spiritual infallibility, as far as I could understand their private opinions, than I afterwards had reason to believe the professors of Maynooth paid.

You have spoken of the conductors of Clongowes, whom do you mean by that expression?—The persons who conduct the establishment, and the professors of it.

How many are they in number?—I do not know.

How many were they in number in your time?—I do not precisely recollect; I am sure they exceeded ten, at least I think so.

Was it understood that all or any of those persons belonged to any particular order of regulars?—I think they did.

The Commissioners are not asking as to your own private belief at present, but as to what may have been the general supposition among the students upon that subject?—The opinion among the students was, that they did belong to a particular religious order.

All the ten?—Whatever superiors were there,—the number was about ten.

That order was the Society of Jesus?—We supposed them to be Jesuits.

Was it merely Mr. Kenney that belonged to that order, or were both he and all his assistants, Jesuits?—We understood that the superiors who were there were attached in one way or other to the order of Jesuits.

Did you ever receive any information or communication from them, or from any of them, upon that particular point?—I did.

Was it a subject that they were inclined to mention, or one upon which they were generally silent?—There was nothing remarkable that I could perceive about either their silence or their speaking upon the subject; it was an understood thing between us that they were Jesuits.

You say you had some particular communication upon that subject, would you have any objection to state the nature of it?—I have heard them to the best of my recollection acknowledge it.

Was there ever any sort of communication held with yourself, that you conceive either directly or indirectly to have had for its object to attach you individually to that society?—In consequence of a desire on my own part to join the society, I had some conversations with the superiors on the subject.

Can you now, upon recollection, trace back any circumstances that may have led to that desire on your part?—I think I can attribute it chiefly to the reading the lives of the great saints in our church, whom that society produced, and to admiration for the virtues which it seemed to me the nature of that society must have produced in those and other men.

What were the books in which you read those lives?—The ordinary books that are open to every person, the English lives of St. Francis Xavier, and of some other saints.

Had you ever seen those books before you went to Clongowes?—I am not quite certain; I might easily have seen them, for they are rather common amongst Roman Catholics.

Were the books to which you now refer put into your hands by the superiors of Clongowes?—I do not recollect that they were put into my hands.

Was it not in Clongowes that you read them?—I read them there, as I did the lives of many other saints in our church.

Will you state what took place upon the subject of your making that communication to the superiors?—Upon the occasion on which I made the communication to Mr. Kenney, he seemed satisfied, and expressed his approbation, but he declined receiving me unless I should obtain my parents consent.

How did the matter end?—My parents refused their consent, and after I had been some time at home I changed my mind, and resolved to enter the secular priesthood.

For what profession did you destine yourself when you first went to Clongowes?—I do not recollect that I then destined myself for any particular profession.

You had not the object of becoming a clergyman, either regular or secular?—In my own mind I had made no determination on the subject to the best of my recollection.

Do you conceive that there are many persons who have been educated at Clongowes, who are now in the Roman Catholic priesthood, or who are now at Maynooth in their way to being ordained?—To the best of my belief they are very few; there are at present in Maynooth

Maynooth only three persons who, I believe, completed their education so far as the end of rhetoric, or near it, at Clongowes; and there is one person who was there for a short time.

Altogether then there are only four persons at present at Maynooth who were at Clongowes?—Altogether, to the best of my knowledge, there are only four at Maynooth who were educated at Clongowes; I am speaking of any persons who were educated at Clongowes so far as my information goes.

Were any opinions on the subject of the Pope's infallibility in spiritual concerns ever communicated to you in any way that you can now recollect by any of the superiors at Clongowes?—The only thing I can recollect with regard to that is, that I believe I heard them say that many persons of their order (which is scattered over various countries) held freely and voluntarily, they being at liberty on the subject, opinions favourable to the Pope's individual spiritual infallibility.

Did you ever hear any discussion among them to which it was intended you should be a party, as to the relative merits of the secular and regular clergy?—To the best of my belief never.

Which do you consider most strict, the discipline you were subjected to at Clongowes, or that which exists at Maynooth?—There was such a difference between the ages at which I was at Clongowes and at Maynooth, that I can scarcely think myself competent to form a sufficiently accurate comparison.

Can you state in which you think the degree of superintendence that was exercised over the actions of the students was greatest?—I think that the difference was not very great.

Were there any particular courses resorted to at Clongowes for keeping the students under perpetual observation?—Nothing more than the strict personal vigilance of all the superiors, as well as I can recollect.

You have stated that there was no public or regular instruction of a political nature, did that answer mean to imply that there was instruction of any other nature than public or regular upon that subject?—No, nothing further than the inculcation of the duty of allegiance to the established government, which was usually inculcated amongst the moral duties.

In describing the library that was open to the students at Clongowes, you mentioned works of history, could you specify any works of English history that were contained in that library?—I cannot immediately charge my memory with recollecting them, but I will state one fact, that to the best of my recollection, Robertson's History of Charles the Fifth was read publicly in the refectory to the students, or at least a portion of it.

You spoke of the English classics being also in the library, do you mean a large collection of them, or could you specify any particular works that you refer to more immediately?—There were Sir Walter Scott's poems, there were Burke's works, the usual collection of British Essayists, and many other works which I cannot now call to mind.

Was there any sodality or confraternity established among the young men at Clongowes?—There was.

Will you mention the name of it?—The Sodality of the Blessed Virgin.

Did you belong to it?—I did.

Is there any sodality established at Maynooth amongst the young men?—There is.

Will you name it?—The Sodality of the Sacred Heart.

Do you belong to it?—I do.

In what manner is it determined at Maynooth which of the students shall belong to that sodality and which shall not?—Any person that wishes it is perfectly free to enter it or not; so much so, that the superiors declared, when about its foundation, that a person's belonging to or not belonging to it would never influence them in the slightest degree in forming a judgment concerning him.

You have spoken of the period of its foundation at Maynooth, can you mention the date of that period?—I cannot precisely recollect.

Was it during your time?—It was during my time.

Is the Sodality of the Sacred Heart in any manner brought under the observation of the students by the superiors; is allusion ever made to it?—Since its foundation I have never heard any allusion made to it by the superiors.

Do you know by whom it was founded in the college?—I believe by the Archbishop of Dublin and the superiors.

Are there any books connected with that sodality which you used at Maynooth?—There is a small book connected with the sodality which is used at Maynooth, and which may be purchased from Mr. Young, of Harold's Cross; it has been printed publicly by Mr. Coyne, and can be had, I believe, of any Catholic bookseller in Ireland.

Does that contain all the rules connected with that sodality?—All of them, as far as I know them.

Have you read the rules of the society in that book?—I believe I have.

Who is understood to be the head or superior of the whole order?—I really do not know that there is any head or superior of that sodality.

Did you make any vow or any profession upon entering into the society?—No; upon entering the sodality we do nothing more than give in our names, to be enrolled in the register of the sodality, and saying a short prayer; it induces no obligation further than that we voluntarily undertake to say a few prayers and practise a few devotions, which it is not any sin, even a venial sin, to omit.

Does the institution connect itself in any way with the memory of St. Francis Xavier?—In no way that I know of.

Do you conceive that it has any connection whatever with the society of the Jesuits?—None whatsoever that I know of.

Appendix, N^o 60.

Examination of
Mr.

William Rogers,
13 November 1826.

In a book now shown to you, entitled, "The Mass of the Sacred Heart of our Lord Jesus Christ," the Commissioners observe, at page 126, a Novena to St. Francis Xavierius, which occupies the eleven following pages, and commences with this sentence: "This Novena commences on the 4th of March, and continues nine days, that is, to the 12th March; upon which day, in the year 1622, Pope Gregory the 15th canonized St. Francis Xavierius:" will you look at the book, and see whether it does not appear that there is some connection between the sodality and that saint—(the book being handed to the Witness)?—I think the tenor of the book itself will be sufficient to indicate that there is not.

Was he not, in fact, one of the most celebrated individuals that the order of Jesuits has produced?—He was.

Will you explain in what way the book indicates that there is no connection of the sort mentioned?—It is separated completely from the Mass of the Sacred Heart of Jesus by an article, entitled, "The Devotion to the Sacred Heart of Mary;" which last is totally distinct and different from the Novena to St. Francis Xavier, and from the Mass of the Sacred Heart.

Is it not, in fact, a part of the volume which is entitled, in the title page, "The Mass of the Sacred Heart of our Lord Jesus Christ?"—It is bound up under the same cover; it is part of the same volume; but a Novena is not a mass, nor a part of a mass.

Do not the pages run throughout?—It seems to be so; but there is no connection between that and the Sodality of the Sacred Heart, in my mind.

Have you been present at any spiritual Retreat at Maynooth, that was conducted by Mr. Kenney?—No.

The Commissioners have been informed that he did conduct such a Retreat during the period in which you have been a student at Maynooth?—I was absent for a considerable time from Maynooth since I commenced my theological studies.

Have you any reason to believe that it is somewhat less an object now than it was heretofore to the students at Maynooth, to be elected to the Dunboyne class?—I have.

Will you have the goodness to state what those reasons are?—They have been deprived of fires in their rooms, and I believe there may be some other reasons also.

Have you any reason to think there are other reasons; if so, will you have the goodness to state them?—I believe they are under more restraints than they were; I am not certain of the latter being a motive, but I am certain of the former.

Can you say to what country the superiors in Clongowes belong; are they any of them Irishmen?—When I was there, to the best of my recollection, with the exception of two, they were all Irishmen.

To what country did those two belong?—One of them was a native of Scotland, and the other a Frenchman.

Is Mr. Kenney an Irishman?—He is.

Can you say whether any of the students in Clongowes have at any time since its institution attached themselves to the order of the Jesuits, and become members of it?—I believe they have; as far as my knowledge goes, they have.

Are there any of the individuals whom you knew, or your fellow-students at Clongowes, whom you have now reason to suppose belong to the society, and are members of it?—Yes, there are.

Can you state about how many may fall within that description?—Out of my own class, two.

How many classes were there at Clongowes during the period you were there?—I believe there were about five.

Do those two individuals at present live at Clongowes?—I do not know; my communication with them at present is not frequent.

Have you any means, either of knowledge or of reasonable supposition, as to the entire number of the students at Clongowes that may at any time have joined the Society of the Jesuits since its commencement?—I could not say precisely by any means, but I do not think they were numerous.

Were the gentlemen who were the superiors of Clongowes, at the time you were there, educated, so far as you know, at Stonyhurst in England?—Several of them were, as far as I could ascertain.

Was there any particular book, connected with theology, that was put into the hands of the students at Clongowes, other than the Catechism?—Further than the usual books of Catholic piety, I do not recollect any particular one.

Did the superiors of Clongowes wear any particular dress that designated them to belong to the Society of Jesus?—As far as I heard of what the habit of the society was, they did not wear the habit of the society; the only particular dress I have seen on them was a cap resembling that usually worn by priests within doors, very similar to our Dunboyne cap, and a large cloak, I suppose to keep them comfortable.

Was there any regulation at Clongowes as to the number of times that the students were to attend confession?—To the best of my recollection, it was about once a month.

Was it the superiors who acted as confessors?—Some of the superiors.

Were the students at liberty to choose their confessors?—Certainly.

Was there any spiritual Retreat at Clongowes, of the same nature as that which exists at Maynooth?—Yes.

How often did it occur?—Once a year, to the best of my recollection.

Did it continue for the same time, namely, five days?—Very nearly.

Was there any thing particular that distinguished it in any way from that which is observed at Maynooth?—Nothing very remarkable.

Will

Will you mention any circumstance that distinguished it?—There might have been a little difference in the arrangement of the duties, but the duties were all of the same general tenor.

Have you ever taken the oath of allegiance?—I have.

Are the principles of the oath of allegiance inculcated at Maynooth, or otherwise?—They are inculcated most strongly at Maynooth.

What is your feeling as to the binding obligation of that oath, as being an oath taken to a Protestant sovereign?—My feeling, consistently with what is inculcated at Maynooth, and taught by the Catholic religion, is, that I am bound, even previously to that oath, by the word of God, to pay strict allegiance to whatever government I live under; of course, to the present government, as I live under it; and the oath adds the solemn sanction of an appeal to God upon the subject.

Will you have the goodness to look at this book—(a book intitled "True Piety" being handed to the Witness)—is that book in use at Maynooth?—I believe it is; there is a book, called "True Piety," in use at Maynooth: the only difference I perceive is, that the name of Doctor Coppinger is attached to this; I do not recollect whether that is attached to the one in use at Maynooth.

Will you have the goodness to look at page 109 of that book, and say whether the principles of Roman Catholics set forth are, according to your view, correct?—All the part that I have read, I hold to be the true principles of Roman Catholics, and consequently of the Jesuits.

Your attention is now particularly requested to page 88 of the book, intitled, "The Devotion of the Sacred Heart of Jesus," in which the Commissioners find these words: "Letters Patent of Aggregation: We, Brother Francis of S. Reginald, Prior of the Venerable archconfraternity of the Sacred Heart of Jesus at Rome, To our beloved in Christ, the Associates of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, the faithful of either sex, who are any ways British subjects, or descend from them, wheresoever they dwell; greeting, in our Lord:" And in the recital to those Letters Patent of Aggregation is contained the following paragraph: "And whereas a confraternity of the Sacred Heart, erected in the church or domestic chapel of the English Fathers of the Society of Jesus at Bruges, has applied to us, through its solicitor in Rome, Signior Joseph Monionelli, in order to obtain leave to be thus associated to ours, and to share in all its privileges and grants; we have thought fit, considering the many good works of piety, penance and charity, performed in that confraternity at Bruges (which as to all essentials is modelled upon the same plan as ours), to unite and associate it to our arch-confraternity, pursuant to the power given us for this purpose by the Holy See; and we grant to it and its members all the indulgences and particular favours mentioned in the Pope's briefs, still keeping within the terms of the decree of Clement the Eighth, which directs such associations and communications of spiritual treasures." When you take into your consideration the passage that has been read to you, do you still retain a doubt as to the sodality at Maynooth being connected with the Society of the Jesuits?—The thing being quite new to me, I should wish to read the book before I answer the question.

Suppose there happens to be a Sodality of the Sacred Heart, of which Jesuits are members, so far as that sodality goes, will not those Jesuits who are members of that sodality, and the members of that sodality at Maynooth, have a spiritual connection and communion with each other?—There would be a spiritual connection and communion between that sodality and every other which was aggregated to the general Sodality of the Sacred Heart.

The connection between the members would be a connection by virtue of their belonging to the general sodality?—Yes; a mere participation in the benefits of each other's prayers.

Do you know whether any Sodality of the Sacred Heart has been established at Clongowes?—While I was there, I never knew of one being established.

Appendix, N° 61.

Examination of the Reverend John Marmion; 15th November 1826.

HOW long have you been at Maynooth?—Six years, last September.

Are you aware of any desire existing, upon the part of any portion of the students, to have an opportunity of making any communications to the Commissioners upon the subject of the internal discipline of the house?—I am not aware of any.

Would you yourself be desirous of taking this opportunity of making any suggestion to the Commissioners upon the subject of the discipline of the house, as affecting yourself or your fellow-students?—No, I would not.

Then the Commissioners are to understand that it is not your wish to take this opportunity of making any suggestion with reference to the College of Maynooth?—They are.

Do you happen to be a member of the Sodality of the Sacred Heart?—I am.

What do you understand to be the nature of that sodality?—Its object is, the promotion of piety—to the saying of a certain number of prayers on each day; there is an indulgence attached. These prayers may be said or not said, at the option of the person; to the omission of them there is no guilt attached.

Does it operate as any particular bond of union amongst the persons that belong to that sodality?

sodality?—No, they are quite unconnected; I cannot say that I know two in the college that are members of it.

The prayers are not offered up together, but by each person separately?—By each person separately.

In the chapel, or in his private room?—In either.

Is there any mark or sign by which the members know each other?—No.

Is there any oath taken to any ecclesiastical or other superior by those who enter into the sodality?—No oath or promise whatever.

Whom do you consider the head of it in your college?—I do not conceive that we have got any head to it.

Who keeps the register?—The dean, Mr. Dowley.

Were you at the college when the institution was first introduced into Maynooth?—I was.

By whom was it introduced?—It was announced, as all religious duties are, by the dean.

In what way did he announce it?—Immediately after morning prayer, he mentioned that such a sodality was to be established in the college; that it was optional with each person to be a member of it or not; and explained the conditions to be observed by the members.

Did he tell you under what approbation, or at whose proposition, the institution was introduced into Maynooth?—I do not recollect whether he did or not.

Have you ever heard any other superior of Maynooth address any observations to you upon the subject of the Sodality of the Sacred Heart?—Never.

Is it a subject that has been referred to in the lectures given at the seasons of spiritual Retreat?—I do not recollect to have heard it mentioned in any of the Retreats.

Is there any occasion on which the members of the sodality have met together in the college?—None.

Do you conceive that the duty of keeping the register devolves upon Mr. Dowley, in virtue of his situation as dean, or is it a voluntary act on his part; do you conceive, in short, that the dean for the time being will necessarily be the person to keep the register?—I conceive that it is in the quality of dean he keeps the register, as his province is to direct the spiritual exercises of the college.

Does he himself belong to the sodality?—I do not know.

Have you a little book that you use as connected with the exercises of the sodality?—There is a book used.

Is each of you supplied with a book?—Yes, if he choose to purchase it.

You stated that there were a set of prayers prescribed to you as belonging to the sodality; by whom were they prescribed?—Mr. Dowley, at the time he mentioned that such an institution was about to be introduced into the college, desired any person that wished for further information on the subject to go to him; he told the persons that went to him the prayers that were to be said, and that to the saying of these prayers this indulgence was attached, and to the non-saying of them there was no guilt attached.

Where do you purchase the books that contain the prayers you have referred to?—They were on sale at the Sacristy; there have been a number of copies brought down to the college; any person that wished for a copy could have it by purchasing it.

Do you recollect who brought them there?—I do not.

What description of persons brought them?—They were lodged with one of the students, and every person that wished to get a copy of them had recourse to him.

Do you know who lodged them with that student?—I cannot say.

Was it a tradesman, or one of the superiors?—I presume it was Mr. Dowley, or some other with his permission.

Did you receive any writing or certificate to show that you had been enrolled a member of the sodality?—None.

What do you consider are the privileges or the benefits conferred upon those that belong to the sodality?—To those who belong to the sodality, and comply with the conditions required of the members of it, there is an indulgence granted.

What is the nature of the indulgence?—The common definition that we have of an indulgence, is the remission of a temporal punishment, which is due to sin after the guilt of the sin has been forgiven. The indulgence granted to the members of the Sodality of the Sacred Heart are numerous; they are either plenary or particular, and all fall under the general definition I have given of an indulgence; they are to be found in every book relating to the order of the Sacred Heart.

From what temporal punishment will this release you?—From the punishment which is due to sin after the guilt of the sin has been forgiven, whatever the nature of that punishment may be.

According to the discipline of the Roman Catholic church, are not penances to be imposed as punishments for sins, after the person merits pardon for his offence against God through sincere contrition?—They are.

If these penances be not performed in this life, is it not the doctrine of the church that the person must be purged for his offence by punishment in the next in purgatory?—Yes, it is.

Is not the meaning of an indulgence, that the church releases the party from the temporal punishment which it would otherwise impose upon him for his offence?—It is.

Do you conceive that your performance of the duties prescribed to you under this institution may be beneficial to others as well as to yourself, in remitting the temporal punishments of other members of the sodality, or of other Catholics?—Yes; I conceive that it can be applied to the relief of the souls suffering in purgatory.

Appendix, N° 62.

Examination of Mr. Richard Coyne; Tuesday, 19th December 1826.

YOU are we understand bookseller and publisher to the College of Maynooth?—I am.
 Since what time?—Since 1821.

Who held the situation originally?—Mr. Hugh Fitz-Patrick.

How long had Mr. Fitz-Patrick held that situation?—Shortly after the college was first established down to the time of his death.

Were you appointed on his death?—No; I presume I would have been, but I withdrew my memorial in consequence of the orphans of the late Mr. Fitz-Patrick stating that they should continue the business.

But it was death that occasioned the vacancy?—Yes.

Have you brought with you your ledger that contains the account with the college?—I have.

Be so good as to produce it?—This is it, [producing a book lettered on the back "Ledger."]

Does that commence the account?—Yes; I had printed a work for them before I was appointed.

Pray when the College of Maynooth print a book, is it through you that they do it?—Yes.

Has it been always through a bookseller that they have printed any books that they have published?—Yes.

Have the goodness to enumerate any books they have printed since you were appointed their bookseller?—I printed a tract on the Trinity, also a tract on the Incarnation, another on Religion, one on Penance, and Cabassutius on Canon Law; I have likewise printed the Memorial of a Christian Life, a devotional book to be read by the students.

Any thing further?—Theses, that are published every year, sustained by the Dunboyne doctors.

Can you recollect any thing further?—No.

Did they not print a Bible?—No, certainly not.

There was a new edition of the Bible edited by you last year, was there not?—The year before.

By whose authority or in what manner was that work brought out?—By my authority and under my controul; when I had completed that book I mentioned to the Most Rev. Dr. Murray and some of the trustees the great expense and outlay upon the work; they desired that I should put in a memorial to the trustees of Maynooth College, upon which five hundred copies of the work were ordered at fourteen shillings a copy.

Do you, in the way of your trade, often publish books connected with the Roman Catholic religion other than those which the college may desire?—Yes, I publish nothing else but Catholic works, nor sell any thing but Catholic books.

The question rather was, do you publish many Catholic works on your own account?—Yes.

Are you in the habit of obtaining the approbation of the ordinary of the diocese for all or any of the works you publish?—I do in general; it is either implied or it is written; sometimes there may be an exception with reference to those old approved works, which having been a long time before the public, are known to contain good doctrine; there is never any necessity to ask the bishop permission for the republication of such works.

Do you consider that there is an implied approbation of those works?—I do.

Should you feel yourself at liberty to publish any new work, in any way connected with the Roman Catholic Religion, without obtaining the approbation of the ordinary?—In the case of a Missal, Breviary or Bible, I would not, but in other cases much would depend on the character of the writer; if he were a person of station, it is very likely I should.

We observe that you obtained the approbation of the ordinary for the publication of Cabassutius, it is so expressed in the title page?—I was ordered to procure a hundred copies of that book, as it was necessary to have some work on canon law, but no orders to print it; the work could not be had in France, and I proposed to the President, the Very Rev. Doctor Crotty, and to the Most Rev. Doctor Murray, to print a small edition of it, in which proposal I had their perfect concurrence.

But the work appears to have been printed by you in 1824, and Doctor Murray was not President since 1814?—I mentioned to the President, who gave me the order, that I could not procure the book, and then proposed to Doctor Murray as one of the trustees, and with his concurrence and the concurrence of the President, I printed a small edition of the book.

Look at the title page, and say whether it is not as ordinary, and not in the character of trustee of the college, that you obtained his approbation, in his character of Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, the words being, "cum approbatione ordinarii?"—I suppose that this is merely a reprint from the original title page; from the French edition precisely.

Are we to understand that you do not conceive that the words "cum approbatione ordinarii," mentioned in the title page, to refer to Doctor Murray as the ordinary?—I do not; and if I did, it would be in this way, I would call for his written approbation and place it on the back of the title page, which is the usual way in which Catholic bishops express their approbation of Catholic books.

Can you recollect in what year it was that you obtained the approbation of the President at Maynooth for reprinting Cabassutius?—It must have been in 1824.

Who was the editor of the work?—I may say I was the editor and the publisher; the proofs were all read in my own house.

Appendix, N° 62.

Examination of
Mr.

Richard Coyne,
19 December 1826.

You observe there is at least one page in the work which is not a reprint of the French edition, namely, the dedication?—Yes; it is a dedication to the Most Rev. Doctor Curtis.

Who wrote it?—I wrote it in English, and it was translated into Latin by my son-in law Doctor Spillan.

Will you explain the nature of the situation that Blenkinsop held as stationer to the college as distinguished from that of publisher, which you hold?—That he furnished them with writing paper for the use of the college, as also with pens and ink.

Was not Blenkinsop a Roman Catholic publisher as well as you?—I believe he published some small books; very trifling indeed; but not for the College of Maynooth.

Where is Mr. Blenkinsop at present?—In America.

How long is it since he left this country?—I think about four months.

Who is the present stationer to the College of Maynooth?—There is no one appointed.

Do you recollect publishing one or more pamphlets for Dr. M'Hale, who was professor of dogmatic theology at Maynooth?—I do.

When did you publish them?—I think it was in 1824 that I published the last for him.

Were you aware of any number of those pamphlets having been sold in the College of Maynooth?—Yes.

Pray state the circumstances attending that sale?—I went to Maynooth for the purpose of procuring a copy of Cabassutius, and the pamphlet of Dr. M'Hale being just published, I took with me about a hundred and fifty copies; I left them in the front parlour where there were Doctor M'Hale and some of his friends. Doctor M'Hale did not interest himself in promoting the sale of them, and when I was about to depart I found that there were twenty-six copies sold. I was requested to leave some copies behind, which I declined.

By whom were they sold?—The Rev. Mr. Boylan bought six, and the Rev. Mr. O'Sullivan I believe sold the remaining twenty.

The Rev. Mr. Boylan was one of the professors, was he not?—He was.

In what manner was Mr. O'Sullivan connected with the college?—A student at that time. A Dunboyne student?—I do not think he was.

When you left the 150 copies in the parlour, were you aware that those two gentlemen were to undertake to distribute any portion for sale?—Doctor M'Hale led me to suppose that it would have a considerable sale at Maynooth; I did not concern myself about what individual had undertaken the sale.

Was it on your account, or on Doctor M'Hale's, that the work was published?—On my own account.

Then you were to receive any profit that might accrue from its publication?—Yes.

Did you buy the copyright of it?—I did; I gave him 20*l.* for writing the pamphlet.

Was it intended to answer any particular work, in writing that pamphlet?—Yes; to serve as a defence of Doctor Doyle in reply to Mr. Phelan and to Mr. O'Sullivan.

You applied to Dr. M'Hale to do it?—I did.

We presume you intended it as a reply to Mr Phelan's work, and to Declan?—It was intended as a reply to Mr. Phelan, who was reputed to be the author of the pamphlet signed "Declan," and to Mr. O'Sullivan.

Are you aware that neither Mr. Phelan's nor Mr. O'Sullivan's names are mentioned once in the whole pamphlet, and Declan but twice, and no one of the three mentioned in the title page?—I am not aware of it; but I was disappointed in not having a direct answer, and if I had known that it had not been so, I would not have published it.

Do you consider it as an answer to Mr. Phelan or to Mr. O'Sullivan?—Certainly not.

Do you mean not a perfect answer?—I did not think it an answer such as I contemplated.

Have you ever sold any other pamphlets or books of the same, or of any description in the same sort of way, at Maynooth, except that pamphlet?—I do not think I have.

Would you feel at liberty to take any new publication and sell it at Maynooth without the sanction of some of the superiors of the place?—I would not feel that any superior could sanction me to do it, save the President or the Vice President.

Did you conceive you had the President's sanction for the sale of that book?—The President was at breakfast in the parlour when I brought in the books.

Did you conceive that you had his permission?—As much so as the author to write it.

Do you mean to say that you had any grounds to suppose that the author had his permission?—I thought he had, but subsequently I discovered he had not.

Was there any conversation or any circumstance to warrant you in concluding that you had the permission of the President to sell that work?—There was.

State it?—I mentioned to the President that I had engaged Dr. M'Hale to write a defence of Dr. Doyle, previous to the publication of the work.

When did you mention that to the President?—On the day I engaged Dr. M'Hale at Maynooth.

What was the reply; was there any particular reply made to that observation by Doctor Crotty?—No.

The preceding question rather was meant to inquire whether you had any communication with the President on the day you sold the work?—Not a word.

But you say you brought it into the room where he was at breakfast?—Where all the professors were at breakfast.

Was there any conversation upon the subject of the work that you brought to Maynooth?—Not a word.

Have you any reason to know, after the work was published, whether it was approved of or not at Maynooth?—I have reason to know that it was not approved of.

State what the reason was?—In conversation with the President, he mentioned that there were some passages of which he did not approve at all, and more particularly that he was dissatisfied with Dr. M'Hale for having published the pamphlet without first submitting it to him.

Pray look at the book now shown to you, entitled, "The Devotion and Office of the Sacred Heart of our Lord Jesus Christ, with its nature, origin, progress, &c. including the Devotion to the Sacred Heart of the Blessed Virgin Mary, &c. &c. &c. Also, Exercises for the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass of the Sacred Heart, to which is prefixed, the recommendatory Pastoral Letter of the Lord Bishop of Boulogne. A new edition. Dublin, N. Clarke, 50, Great Britain Street. Price 3s. 3d. plain bound." Can you state whether, in the course of your trade, you have had any acquaintance with that book?—Not with this edition of the work, I may say none.

Have you any acquaintance with the English edition, of which that is a reprint?—Yes.

Have you ever sold any of it?—A great number.

From whom did you procure it?—From the house of Keating and Brown.

When did they publish it?—I think the book was on sale about 1807, the edition from which this is a reprint.

The Irish reprint?—Yes.

Has Mr. Clarke, who reprinted it, an extensive dealing in the sale of Roman Catholic books?—No; he took up that work to employ his men, and he offered it then to the Catholic trade at the price of paper and print, or something a little over; I would not sell the book unless there was some necessity for it, not knowing how far it was approved, nor did I purchase any or take any from him.

Would you look over the book now before you, and say whether you have any reason to believe that it is an inaccurate reprint of the English work, further than casual misprints?—No, I should think not; he is a man of character in the trade.

Is there any apparent design of departure from the English edition?—I think he said there was something added to that edition, which is not to be found in the English edition.

Could you supply us with a copy of the English edition?—I think so, I have them in sheets.

What is the price of the English edition?—Three shillings.

Can you state the circumstances under which that publication took place in England originally, namely, in the year 1807?—I cannot; indeed I had seen a York edition of it before I saw the London edition.

Earlier in date?—Yes.

Have you any reason to suppose whether that work was originally compiled in England, or whether it was reprinted or translated into English from some continental work?—I dare say it was compiled originally in England.

Have you any reason to know, or to form a reasonable belief, whether that work was originally compiled at Stonyhurst?—I never heard that it was.

Have you ever examined the original work so edited by Keating which you have sold?—No.

Have you ever examined its contents particularly?—No, I have not; I always relied upon their accuracy; they are very particular with regard to their books.

The question is rather, whether you are acquainted with the contents of the book as matter of literary curiosity, or other cause?—I am not; indeed I never paid much attention to it.

Did you ever pay sufficient attention to it to observe, that there are mixed with the devotion peculiar to the Sacred Heart, a number of litanies and prayers, addressed to Saint Ignatius of Loyola, St. Francis Xavier, St. Aloysius Gonzaga, and other saints of the order of the Jesuits, and to no other saints except of that order?—Yes, I believe that to be the case.

Is there any mode in which you can account for that peculiarity?—Nothing more, than that it is a devotional book with those connected with the Jesuits, more than it is with any other class of Catholics.

Have you ever seen another book, entitled, "The Devotion of the Sacred Heart," by Blenkinsop?—I have.

Can you state any circumstances connected with it?—I cannot; he first published a certain portion of it, and then the Mass of the Sacred Heart, approved of and sanctioned in this diocese.

Did you ever sell any work published by Blenkinsop, and approved of?—I did; but not his book entitled "The Sacred Heart."

Do you happen to know how far it is an abridgment of the work shown to you?—I always thought it was a sort of abridgment of the work shown to me.

Have the goodness to state whether there is any person whom you consider as the book-seller to Clongowes Wood establishment?—I do not know of any.

Was Blenkinsop in the habit of supplying books to that institution?—At the commencement he was.

Have you any reason to know under whose direction Blenkinsop prepared that publication which we have alluded to, "The Devotions of the Sacred Heart," which appears to be abridged from the book before us?—I have not.

Do you happen to know whether there are any institutions in Dublin, amongst which this Devotion of the Sacred Heart is particularly circulated?—Yes, there are.

Have the goodness to say what they are?—George's Hill Nunnery, the Sisters of Charity, the Monks of Townshend-street, at Harolds Cross; I do not know whether in the nunnery that it is a devotion, but it is in the village.

Is the work that you have alluded to circulated only amongst the members of those establishments,

Appendix, N° 62.

Examination of

establishments, or have you any reason to believe that pains are taken to circulate and disseminate the Devotions of the Sacred Heart among others than those who are members?—I believe there are by some, with a view merely to promote piety, and in that case, that they may be more zealous than others.

Have the goodness to state whether, from what you have observed with regard to this work, you have any reason to think that it is particularly supported by or connected with the body of the Jesuits?—I have no particular reason to know that it is supported by them, but I have heard that, with reference to the doctrine, they approve more of it than any other body of the Roman Catholic clergy.

Are those religious societies, to which you have alluded particularly, under the superintendence or connected with the order of Jesuits?—No.

Not the nuns of St. George's Hill?—No; they are under the jurisdiction of the archbishop.

Have you any means of knowing when the sodality or confraternity of the Sacred Heart of our Lord Jesus Christ first became pretty general in Ireland?—It was long in use antecedent to the establishment of any Jesuit College; the late Right Reverend Doctor Moylan, of Cork, was particularly attached to that devotion himself.

Have you any grounds for believing or knowing whether that sodality has of late years been extending itself more rapidly than it used to do in Ireland?—I think it has; so have all other sodalities, in proportion.

Has the sodality of Christian Doctrine prevailed much more in Ireland of late than it did formerly?—Considerably.

The sodality for teaching the Catechism is that to which the question referred?—Yes.

Have you any reason to know that the Sodality of the Sacred Heart exists in Maynooth?—I have heard that it does.

Do you know any circumstances that lead you to come to that conclusion, beyond mere conversation?—I do not.

Have you heard that any other sodality exists in Maynooth, except the one of the Sacred Heart?—I have not.

We have seen a little tract of the Devotion of the Sacred Heart, that has been introduced at Maynooth; was that tract published by you?—No.

Do you know by whom it was published?—It was published by a man of the name of Coyne, in Cook-street.

Has it been sold by you at Maynooth?—I never sold a copy of it.

Do you know how it happened that the work was published by any other person than yourself, in your character of their bookseller and publisher?—I am certain that he was not called upon by any member of the college to publish that book, all books published for the use of the college being ordered by the trustees; but the book being on sale with him, who is very much connected with confraternities and sodalities, some private individuals of the college bought a certain number from him.

Is it published by him exclusively for the use of the college at Maynooth, or for the use of the sodality, wherever it may be?—It was published by many persons in Dublin, as well as by him, for the use of the sodality, wherever it may be.

Appendix, N° 63.

Examination of Alexander Knox,
Esq.

7 November 1826.

THE Commissioners understand that you hold the situation of agent to the College Maynooth?—I do.

Were you appointed to that situation at the original foundation of the college?—No, I was not; but I happened to know something of the transactions of that time from my acquaintance with my predecessor in office.

Who was your predecessor?—Mr. Robert Marshall, who was private secretary to Lord Chichester, then Mr. Pelham; Mr. Pelham was the person by whom the institution was completed if not originated; he therefore had the arrangement of the offices, and he formed one for his private secretary, Mr. Marshall, who probably had some trouble with the institution in the first stage of its establishment. I make this supposition, because when Mr. Marshall was afterwards private secretary to Lord Castlereagh, and his lordship chose to have me as his additional private secretary, I had an opportunity of remarking Mr. Marshall's frequent intercourse with the Rev. Dr. Dunn, who was secretary to the Board of Trustees, and as such managed the external business of the college.

Can you say how long Mr. Marshall held the office?—Mr. Marshall held it from the time it commenced till I think the spring of 1799, when, on Mr. John Claudius Beresford giving up a place in the Custom House, Lord Castlereagh gave that place to my colleague, Mr. Marshall, and he then gave the agency of Maynooth to me.

You have held it from that period to the present?—I have.

What is the amount of your salary?—Three hundred pounds a year, Irish.

Was that the amount which was enjoyed by your predecessor?—Yes.

Will you be so good as to state whether there are any, and if any, what duties attached to the situation?—I never was called upon to perform a duty but once, and that was by Mr. Abbot, now Lord Colchester. There was a lay college built within the precincts of the Royal College Maynooth of for the sons of Roman Catholic gentlemen. This was represented sented to government as an abuse, or as carrying the institution beyond its original purpose. Mr. Abbot therefore sent for me, in order to notify through me, to the trustees, the determination of government that the lay college should be suppressed.

Was the lay college, in point of fact, suppressed in consequence of the instructions you then gave?—It was.

Is the only occasion on which you have had any thing to do with the college that which you have just stated?—The only occasion on which I had any thing to do officially, at one particular time; afterwards, a wish was expressed to me by the secretary of the Board of Trustees, Dr. Dunn, whom I have already mentioned, and who always took an active interest in the concerns of the college, that I should write to Lord Castlereagh to state to him their wish that something additional should be given, to be added to a legacy (or a compromise with the heirs) of Lord Dunboyne, in order to establish a fund for educating professors, which was thought a very important object. Dr. Dunn said he had written to Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald, then Chancellor of the Irish Exchequer, but had as yet received no assurance of success; he therefore wished me to mention the matter to Lord Castlereagh. I accordingly wrote to Lord Castlereagh, and the thing was done; but I by no means take upon me to say, that it was done through my application. This was, however, the only instance in which I have had it in my power to do any service to the College of Maynooth.

Were you at all consulted upon the foundation of the college by Mr. Pelham?—I was not in habits of intercourse with government at that time.

Mr. Marshall is dead, is not he?—He is.

In point of fact, the Commissioners collect from you, that there are no regular duties that fall to the lot of the agent to discharge?—Certainly not; I have always considered my situation as a sinecure, given to me by Lord Castlereagh from motives of personal friendship, and perhaps I ought to add, in consideration of some exertions which I was thought by the Irish government to have made for the service of the country.

Appendix, N° 67.

A LIST of the WORKS recommended by the Professors of the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth, for the perusal of the Students, or referred to by them in the course of their Lectures.

Appendix, N° 67.

By the Professor of the Dunboyne Establishment:

Theology:—Tournelly, Bailly, Du Voisin, Hook, Le Grand, Drouen, Collet, Deux Conferences D'Angers.

Canon Law:—Van Espen, Devoti, Pichler, Cavallario, Reiffensteuil.

Church History:—Fleury, Natalis, Alexander, Du Pin, Reeve.

By the Professor of Dogmatic Theology:

As Mr. Higgins has been in Maynooth but a few months, and has hitherto given lectures exclusively on the Treatise on Religion, the following are the only works which he has either quoted or recommended on the different questions which he has had occasion to discuss:

Bailly, Du Voisin, Hook, Houteville, Lettres de quelques Juifs, &c. par Guenet, Lettres Provins. Philos. Par Barruel, Dictionnaire theologique de Bergier, Grotius, Clarke on the existence of God and the truth of the Christian Religion.

By the Professor of Moral Theology:

Les Conferences D'Angers, Les Conferences de Paris, Le Continueur de Tournelly, La Morale D'Antoine, La Morale du Noel Alexander.

By the Professor of Sacred Scripture:

On Genesis:—Commentarii Pererii, Commentaires de Calmet, D° de Chaies, Synopsis Criticorum Poli, L'Histoire Universelle de Bossuet.

On the Gospels:—Commentarii Cornelii a Lapide, D° Maldonati, Meditations, &c. de Bossuet, Bible d'Avignon.

On the Epistles:—Commentarii Sanctæ Thomæ, D° Estii, D° Cornelii a Lapide, Analyse de Maudit, Bossuet.

On the Prolegomena:—Dissertations de Calmet, Prolegomena Waltoni, Dissertatio generalis Kennicott, De verbo Dei, Bellarminus.

By the Professor of Logic, Metaphysics and Moral Philosophy:

St. Thomas Aquinas (Secunda Secundæ), Hook de Religione, Bossuet's Discourse on Universal History, The Art of Thinking, Philosophical Works of Cicero, Clarke on the Being and Attributes of God, Cartesius de Methodo, Malebranche's Search after Truth, Locke on the Understanding, Beattie on Truth, Reid on the Human Mind, Stuart's Philosophy of the Mind and Moral Philosophy, Blackstone's Commentaries, Paley's Natural Theology and Moral Philosophy. Some of the writers mentioned are noticed by the Professor, when confuting the opinions maintained in their works.

By the Professor of Rhetoric:

Aristotle's Rhetoric, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Cicero de Oratore, Dialogue on Oratory, Greek and Latin Orators, Rollin's Belles Lettres, Gibert L'Jay, Fenelon, Maury, Massillon, Bourdeloue, Blair, Lord Kaimes' Elements of Criticism, Burke on the Sublime, Addison on the Sources of the Beautiful and Sublime, Austin's, Chironomy, Spalding, English Orators, British Classics.

By the Professor of Humanity:

Rollin's Ancient History, D° Belles Lettres, Port Royal Greek Grammar, D° Latin Grammar.

By the Professor of English Rhetoric:

The Works of Johnson, Burke, Addison, Junius, Swift's Drapiers Letters, Gulliver's Travels; The Guardian, Tatler, Spectator, Adventurer, Mirror, Lounger, &c.; Freethink's Letters, Clio on Taste, Knox's Essays, Select portions of Pope, Milton, Dryden and Goldsmith; and more particularly for the immediate subject of lecture, Blair's Lectures, Lawson on Oratory, Fenelon on Pulpit Eloquence, Rollin's Belles Lettres, Allison on Taste, M'Dermott D°, &c. For declamation (for such as do not compose their own pieces), the Sermons of Kirwan, Blair, Allison, approved Catholic Sermons, Massillon's Conferences (Translation of the Rev. C. Boylan.)

For the use of the students in mathematics and natural philosophy (as they are not allowed access to the public library), a collection of works on those subjects has been kept in their hall for many years past. They amount to more than one hundred, most of them in the English and French languages; some in Latin. The greater part are the property of the President; others were taken, with his permission, from the College Library. When the the late professor was leaving the college, he returned those works, but they are still forthcoming for the use of the students, should it be deemed more conducive to their improvement to allow them access to those works, than to confine them exclusively to their text book, the Cambridge course.

It may not be amiss to observe, that the students in general find abundance of employment in making themselves masters of the contents of their class-books; and that the shortness of the time allowed them for the study of theology, will not admit of their reading the entire of the works mentioned in the above catalogue. They refer to them only on particular points, which they are supposed to treat more at large, or more correctly than the class-books.

Dunboyne estate is not appropriated to any specific object, either by Act of Parliament or by bequest. The trustees are bound to apply it to the Dunboyne Institution, only inas-much as they declare that intention in their annual estimates. That intention they had from its commencement, but have been prevented from carrying it into effect by the cir-cumstances of the country—the want of priests, particularly in the province of Ulster.

Arrangements, however, have been made by the bishops of that province, which will enable them to allow their subjects, in future, to enjoy the benefits of the Dunboyne course.

NINTH REPORT
OF
THE COMMISSIONERS
OF
IRISH EDUCATION INQUIRY.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MAJESTY:

WE, the undersigned Commissioners, nominated and appointed by a Commission under the Great Seal, bearing date the Fourteenth day of June, One thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, beg leave humbly to report, as follows:—

WE submitted in our First Report a statement of the opinions we had formed as to the Education of Children of the lower orders in Ireland; and at the same time we communicated the result of our inquiries into the Charter and Parochial Schools, the Schools of the Association for discountenancing Vice, the Society for the Education of the Poor, together with an account of various other Institutions and Establishments for general Instruction.

We have also, from time to time, reported the results of our examinations into the Foundling Hospital, the Diocesan Schools, the Hibernian Military, and Marine Schools, the Orphan House, the Academical Institution at Belfast, the Cork Institution, and the Roman Catholic College at Maynooth; and we have suggested such alterations in the regulation and management of some of these Institutions as appeared to us to be likely to contribute to their respective improvement.

During the progress of our inquiries into these Institutions, we were requested by his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant to submit to the test of actual experiment the Plan of Education recommended in our First Report; and in order to enable us as well to effect this, as to complete the inquiries in which we were already engaged, Your Majesty was graciously pleased to extend for a year the period originally allotted for the duration of our Commission.

It has therefore become our duty to represent to Your Majesty, that, in our attempt to effect that object, we have experienced difficulties, which have not only prevented us from establishing Schools in which the experiment might have been fully tried, but have induced us to desist altogether from any further proceedings in that undertaking; and having laid before his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant a detailed account of the course pursued by us, we now beg leave to submit to Your Majesty the following copy of that Report.

To the Most Noble Richard Marquess Wellesley, &c. &c. &c. Lord Lieutenant-General, and General Governor of Ireland.

Report of the Commissioners of Irish Education Inquiry.

May it please your Excellency,

WE, the undersigned Commissioners, appointed by letters patent dated 14th June 1824, for inquiring into the nature and extent of the Instruction afforded by the several Institutions in Ireland for the purpose of Education, having, in obedience to your Excellency's desire, undertaken to try the experiment of establishing a certain number of Schools in Ireland upon the plan recommended in our First Report to His Majesty, now beg leave to communicate to your Excellency the particulars of the course which we have pursued.

Before entering on this detail, we feel it necessary to lay before your Excellency the letter which we received from Mr. Goulburn, in consequence of which we undertook this duty.

(1.) Letter from the Right Honourable Henry Goulburn to the Commissioners of Education Inquiry; dated Dublin Castle, 28th November 1825.

Gentlemen,

The Lord Lieutenant having had under his consideration that part of your First Report which relates to the establishment of Schools for the general education of the people, has commanded me to avail myself of the opportunity afforded by your re-assembly in Dublin, to submit to your consideration the manner in which he considers it most expedient to proceed with respect to that Report.

The minute inquiry which you have made into all matters connected with the subject of general Education, and the ability and industry with which it has been conducted, give his Excellency every confidence in the justice of the opinions expressed by you; and his Excellency hopes that the ultimate result of your labours may be in the establishment of a more perfect and satisfactory system for the education of the poor, than any which has yet been in operation in Ireland. It appears to his Excellency, however, that that result may be much facilitated by the establishment, in the first instance, of a certain number of Schools, on the principles laid down in your Report. One main advantage of such a proceeding will be, the opportunity which it will afford you of observing the practical effect in different parts of the country of the regulations which you have suggested.

Parliament has placed at his Excellency's disposal what are considered to be ample funds for the commencement of such an experiment; and there can be little doubt of their readiness, during the next Session, to add to the means already granted whatever further sum may be judged requisite. Applications for assistance to Schools already established, or for grants for the establishment of new Schools, have been sufficiently numerous, and have, since the publication of your Report, been reserved expressly for future consideration. The only obstacle therefore which exists to giving immediate effect to your recommendation, to the extent which has been suggested, is the want of a body qualified to undertake the task of framing regulations for the conduct of such Schools, and the enforcement of their due observance. The difficulty of selecting individuals properly qualified for such a duty would at all times be considerable, and it would be almost hopeless to expect that any persons now to be chosen, could at once, or at an early period, be so fully in possession of the plans and principles detailed in your Report, as to be qualified to give complete effect to them; his Excellency therefore has commanded me to express the great importance which he attaches to your consenting, for a limited period, to undertake the duties of superintendence, to select from the numerous applications the places in which Schools on the new system should be established, and to lay down and enforce the regulations under which they should be conducted, and the mode in which grants of money should be made to them.

The Lord Lieutenant indeed is sensible that your acquiescence in his wishes must impose upon you additional labour, and may to a degree interfere with other inquiries which may either be actually in progress, or which it may be your intention to institute; but, nevertheless, his Excellency considers that no inquiry can be more

more important or more consonant to the views which led to your appointment as Commissioners, than a practical illustration, under your superintendence, of the merits of the plan upon which you have suggested that the education of the people in this country should in future be conducted. His Excellency trusts, therefore, that you will not feel any difficulty in undertaking this charge; and I am authorized to assure you, that, as far as lies in his Excellency's power, every assistance shall be afforded to you, which can either alleviate the burthen which it may be calculated to impose upon you, or which can enable you to conduct the experiment with effect.

I have the honour to be, Gentlemen,
Your most obedient humble servant,
Henry Goulburn.

Commissioners of Education Inquiry,
&c. &c. &c.

Upon the receipt of the foregoing letter, we had the honour of communicating to your Excellency our readiness to use our best endeavours to give effect to the wishes which it expressed.

Previous to the actual establishment of any of the Schools which had been recommended in our Report to His Majesty, it became indispensably necessary, in the first instance, to arrange the Books, the use of which formed an essential part of the plan so recommended. Until this preliminary step should be secured, it would have been obviously premature to appoint masters, or provide school-houses.

We beg leave to recal to your Excellency's recollection the particulars of a Minute of Conference held between our Board and the four Roman Catholic Archbishops on this subject, bearing date the 8th January 1825, and which, so far as relates to the works in question, was as follows:—

“ In these suggestions, for uniting Protestant and Roman Catholic children in literary, and separating them only for religious instruction, Dr. Murray expressed his concurrence.

“ The Commissioners then observed, that separate religious instruction should not commence until the difference of religious belief should make it impossible for instruction any longer to be received in common; and they inquired, whether it would be objected to, on the part of the Roman Catholic Clergy, that the more advanced of the Protestant and Roman Catholic children should, at certain times, during school hours, read portions of the Holy Scriptures together, and in the same classes, but out of their respective versions, subject to proper regulations, and in the presence of their respective Protestant and Roman Catholic teachers, suggesting, at the same time, that opportunities might be afforded to the teachers of each persuasion to explain to the children separately the portions so read?

“ Dr. Murray answered, that serious difficulties would exist in the way of such an arrangement, and in lieu of it he proposed, that the Holy Scriptures should be used only when the Roman Catholic children should be taken apart for the purpose of receiving religious instruction; and he said that there could be no possible objection to the Roman Catholic children then reading out of the sacred Volume itself the Gospels and Epistles of the week; he added, that no objection would be made to a harmony of the Gospels being used in the general education which the children should receive in common, nor to a volume containing extracts from the Psalms, Proverbs, and Book of Ecclesiasticus, nor to a volume containing the history of the Creation, of the Deluge, of the Patriarchs, of Joseph, and of the deliverance of the Israelites, extracted from the Old Testament, and that he was satisfied no difficulties in arranging the details of such works would arise on the part of the Roman Catholic Clergy.

“ The Commissioners then stated, that they considered it of the utmost moment that no books or catechisms should be admitted, either in the course of the literary or religious instruction, containing matter calculated to excite contempt, hatred, or any uncharitable feeling, in any class, towards persons of a different religious persuasion.”

“ To this Dr. Murray cordially assented.”

[See First Report of the Commissioners, page 96.]

In pursuance of the principles laid down in the Minute above referred to, we expressed ourselves in the following terms in the concluding part of our First Report, (page 97.)

“ We think it necessary that means should be provided for supplying Testaments according to the authorized version for the Protestant children. With respect to the Roman Catholic children, an edition of the New Testament for their use has been submitted to us by the Roman Catholic Prelates. The text of this edition is the Douay version—almost all the notes, however, originally annexed to that version have been omitted; we find, in fact, that there are only sixty-three notes altogether to the four Gospels, and these, with the exception of an inconsiderable number, have no peculiar reference to the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church, as distinguished from those of the Protestant Churches; and such as have this peculiar reference are expressed in a manner which ought not, we think, to be offensive to any description of persons. The Summaries prefixed to the different chapters are in like manner, as it appears to us, unobjectionable. To this edition is also annexed a table of the Epistles and Gospels throughout the year, specifying the portions of the Scriptures appointed to be read for those purposes by the Roman Catholic Church.

“ Deeply impressed with the importance and necessity of introducing the Scriptures into all Institutions for the education of the people, as a fundamental part of the instruction, we recommend that copies of this edition of the Testament, omitting the address thereto prefixed, but retaining the notes, should be furnished for the religious instruction of the Roman Catholic children in every school established upon the system proposed. It will be for the Roman Catholic Clergy to supply such other books for the purpose of religious instruction as they may desire. We would suggest, however, that many forms of catechisms are now in use amongst the Roman Catholics in the different districts of Ireland, and that it would be expedient that some one or two should be selected or compiled for general use.

“ It will be necessary, also, to provide a volume compiled from the four Gospels, in the manner adverted to in our conference with the Roman Catholic Archbishops. Such a book, together with the Book of Proverbs, and the work containing the history of the Creation, the Deluge, and other important events extracted from the Pentateuch, may be profitably used in the schools during the period of united and general instruction. We by no means intend such works as substitutes for the Holy Scriptures, although we propose that the reading of the Scriptures themselves should be reserved for the time of separate religious instruction.”

The following statement was added in a note referring to the proposed compilation from the four Gospels. (see First Report of the Commissioners, page 98.)

“ A work of this description, entitled ‘ An Evangelical Life of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, forming a Harmony of the four Gospels,’ sanctioned by the Roman Catholic Prelates, has been examined by us. It consists of the text of the four Gospels, according to the Douay version, interwoven into one consecutive narration. The order pursued is chronological. Where any particular occurs in one Gospel that is not to be found in the others, it is inserted. Where the same particulars are stated in two or more, the statement is inserted from that Gospel in which it is the most full.”

It became necessary for us, therefore, in the first instance, to provide, for the use of the Roman Catholic children, an edition of the Testament in the Douay version, corresponding with the copy which had been submitted to us by the Roman Catholic Prelates.

On examining the notes which were contained in the copy above referred to, one or two expressions were found which appeared to us to be at variance with the principle laid down by us, that “ no books or catechisms should be admitted, either in the course of the literary or religious instruction, containing matter calculated to excite contempt, hatred, or any uncharitable feeling, in any class, towards persons of a different religious persuasion.” On our application, Dr. Murray readily consented to the omission of those passages, and all matter having been removed from the the notes which could be offensive on the ground now stated, the edition was sent to the press, and published with the approbation of the Roman Catholic Archbishops, in the month of April 1826.

Our next step was to endeavour to provide a work compiled from the four Gospels, in the manner alluded to in our conference with the Roman Catholic Archbishops. Our attention had been called to a translation of the Harmony of the Gospels, entitled "White's Diatessaron," in the language of the authorized version, and which we understood was in use in England, with the general approbation of the Authorities of the Established Church. We therefore, as our first step, brought it under the consideration of the four Archbishops of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, for the purpose of ascertaining whether it would meet their approbation, or whether they could suggest any alterations in it which we might submit to the Authorities of the Established Church for their consideration. We had a conference during two days with the Roman Catholic Archbishops on the subject: it will be found at large in the Appendix, and contains not merely a full exposition of the objections which they felt to the Diatessaron, but of the views which they entertain as to the construction of any such works as were the objects of our search.

Being led by this conference to the conclusion that no selection from the Scriptures which we had seen would answer the proposed end, we applied to the Archbishop of Dublin, with whom we had previously communicated on the subject, and having explained to his Grace the general character of the compilation we sought for, and the difficulties which existed in the arrangement of it, we expressed our earnest wish that it should be prepared in the first instance under the direction and superintendence of the Authorities of the Established Church.

Vide Evidence,
(Report 1, p. 759.)

His Grace having obligingly undertaken to communicate on the subject with his Grace the Lord Primate and the Archbishops of Cashel and Tuam, a letter, of which the following is a copy, was addressed to the Lord Primate and the Archbishops of Cashel and Tuam by the Chairman of our Board.

(2.) Letter from Thomas Frankland Lewis, Esq. to his Grace the Lord Primate and the Archbishops of Cashel and Tuam; dated Dublin, January 18th, 1826.

My Lord,

At the desire of his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, the Commissioners of Education Inquiry have undertaken to superintend, for a limited period, the establishment of a certain number of Schools, in which the plan for the general education of children of the lower classes, recommended by them in their Report, may be submitted to the test of actual experiment.

In order to carry this object into effect, it is necessary that the works mentioned in the ninety-sixth page of this Report should be provided; and the Commissioners are fully aware that such works cannot be properly arranged, excepting with the approbation and under the superintendence of the Authorities in the Established Church.

The Commissioners have thought it their duty to avail themselves of an opportunity of communicating with the Archbishop of Dublin, to whom they have explained themselves fully upon the subject. His Grace has been pleased to express his readiness to assist in effecting this important object, and we trust that your Grace will be so obliging as to take into your consideration in what manner it can best be accomplished.

We abstain from troubling your Grace with any detailed statement, thinking it better that the communication should proceed through his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin, who is in possession of our general views, and who has been so good as to undertake to consult with your Grace.

I have the honour to be,

Your Grace's most obedient servant,
T. Frankland Lewis.

To his Grace the Lord Primate,
and

The Lords Archbishops of Cashel and Tuam.

In the course of the ensuing week, the Commissioners received from Doctor Murray the following letter :—

(3.) Letter from the Most Reverend Dr. Murray to the Commissioners of Education Inquiry; dated 41, North Cumberland-street, 23d Jan. 1826.

Doctor Murray presents his compliments to the Commissioners of Education Inquiry; he is desired by the Catholic Archbishops and Bishops, now assembled in Dublin, to submit to them the enclosed Resolutions relative to the system of Education proposed for the poor of Ireland. He is further prayed to state, that it would be highly gratifying to the Prelates to be informed, at the earliest convenience of the Commissioners, whether a system of general Education, founded on the principles embodied in those Resolutions, would be likely to meet their views and receive their approbation.

Commissioners of Education Inquiry,
&c. &c. &c.

The Resolutions enclosed in this letter were as follows :—

“ At a Meeting of the Catholic Archbishops and Bishops of Ireland, held on “ the 21st of January 1826, at the house of the Most Reverend Dr. Murray,
“ the following Resolutions on the subject of National Education were unani“ mously adopted :

“ 1. Resolved,—That the admission of Protestants and Roman Catholics into
“ the same schools, for the purpose of literary instruction, may, under existing cir“ cumstances, be allowed, provided sufficient care be taken to protect the religion “ of the Roman Catholic children, and to furnish them with adequate means of “ religious instruction.

“ 2. Resolved,—That in order to secure sufficient protection to the religion of “ Roman Catholic children under such a system of education, we deem it neces“ sary that the master of each school, in which the majority of the pupils profess
“ the Roman Catholic faith, be a Roman Catholic; and that in schools in which “ the Roman Catholic children form only a minority, a permanent Roman Catholic “ assistant be employed, and that such master and assistant be appointed upon
“ the recommendation or with the express approval of the Roman Catholic Bishop “ of the diocese in which they are to be employed; and further, that they, or “ either of them, be removed upon the representation of such Bishop. The same “ rule to be observed for the appointment or dismissal of mistresses and assistants “ in female schools.

“ 3. Resolved,—That we consider it improper that masters and mistresses, in“ tended for the religious instruction of the Roman Catholic youth, should be “ trained or educated by, or under the control of, persons professing a different “ faith; and that we conceive it most desirable, that a male and female model “ school shall be established in each province in Ireland, to be supported at the “ public expense, for the purpose of qualifying such masters and mistresses for
“ the important duties which they shall be appointed to discharge.

“ 4. Resolved,—That in conformity with the principles of protecting the religion
“ of the Roman Catholic children, the books intended for their particular instruc“ tion in religion shall be selected or approved by the Roman Catholic Prelates,
“ and that no book or tract for common instruction in literature shall be introduced “ into any school in which Roman Catholic children are educated, which book or “ tract may be objected to on religious grounds by the Roman Catholic Bishop of “ the diocese in which such school is established.

“ 5. Resolved,—That a transfer of the property in several schools which now “ exist, or may hereafter exist, in Ireland, may be utterly impracticable from the “ nature of the tenure by which they are or shall hereafter be held, and from the “ number of persons having a legal interest in them, as well as from a variety of “ other causes, and that in our opinion any regulation which should require such “ transfer to be made, as a necessary condition for receiving Parliamentary support, “ would operate to the exclusion of many useful schools from all participation in “ the public bounty.

“ 6. Resolved,

“ 6. Resolved,—That appointed as we have been by Divine Providence to watch over and preserve the deposit of Catholic faith in Ireland, and responsible as we are to God for the souls of our flocks, we will, in our respective dioceses, withhold our concurrence and support from any system of Education which will not fully accord with the principles expressed in the foregoing Resolutions.”

To this letter from Dr. Murray, the Commissioners returned the following answer :—

(4.) Letter from the Commissioners of Education Inquiry to the Most Reverend Dr. Murray; dated Merrion-street, 26th January 1826.

The Commissioners of Education Inquiry present their compliments to Dr. Murray, and have to acknowledge the receipt of his letter of the 23d instant, enclosing a copy of the Resolutions entered into by the Roman Catholic Archbishops and Bishops of Ireland, at his house, on the 21st instant, and stating “ that it would be highly gratifying to the Prelates to be informed, at the earliest convenience of the Commissioners, whether a system of general Education founded on the principles embodied in those Resolutions, would be likely to meet their views, and receive their approbation.”

As it is the duty of the Commissioners to report their views only to His Majesty, they must abstain from any expression of opinion on the subjects contained in the Resolutions which Dr. Murray has transmitted to them.

The Most Reverend Doctor Murray.

Shortly afterwards, the Commissioners received the following communication from his Grace the Lord Primate, in reply to their letter of the 18th January 1826.

(5.) Letter from his Grace the Lord Primate to T. Frankland Lewis, Esquire, Chairman of the Commissioners of Irish Education Inquiry; dated Armagh, January 31st, 1826.

Sir,

I have to acknowledge the receipt of your favour of the 18th instant, which reached me in the regular course. Its brevity, and the hope it held out of a more detailed communication from the Archbishop of Dublin, led me to conclude that you did not look for an immediate answer. In a few days after I received a short letter from the Archbishop of Dublin. It informed me, that the Commissioners desired to have a harmony of the Gospels which might meet the approbation, both of the heads of the Established Church, and of the Roman Catholic Hierarchy; it expressed his Grace's fears that such a work was impracticable, but at the same time his readiness to give his assistance should a trial be deemed necessary; with these exceptions, his Grace's letter contained nothing more than those leading facts of which your communication had already put me in possession. Knowing that your attention, as well as that of his Grace, must be occupied at present by a variety of important objects, I thought it right to abstain from engaging either party in an explanatory correspondence, and to collect the general views of the Commissioners, as well as I could, from their printed Report and its Appendix.

I now proceed to state the impression which the examination has left upon my mind; and if in any instance I have fallen into a misconception, you will please to recollect that my conclusions are in a great measure conjectural.

It appears to me then to be the purpose of the Commissioners to secure to the lower classes of all denominations such a portion of moral and religious knowledge as may fit them to discharge their duties as members of a Christian society, and in those conditions of life to which it may please God to call them.

This being a matter in which the State has a great and immediate interest, I quite concur in the principle upon which the Commissioners have acted in their Report,—that it should be open to legislative regulation. The details of this regulation may be classed into two general topics; the persons to whose superintendence the education of the poor should be entrusted, and the books to be used in the schools. As to the former, I find that in the judgment of the Commissioners, (Report, page 94), it was the intention of the State, by the statutes of Henry VIII. and William III. to commit this important charge to the Established Clergy. I am happy to express my concurrence in this opinion; it appears to me, that such is not only the true interpretation of the statutes referred to, but the obvious nature of the thing; if the superintendence of a national system of moral education be considered as a duty, the obligation naturally devolves upon the Established Clergy; if, on the other hand, it be regarded as a privilege, and a mark of public confidence, they seem best entitled to receive such a distinction. But, as the present unhappy jealousies would render it inexpedient to insist scrupulously upon these considerations, I agree further with the Commissioners, that some circumstantial changes may be proper subjects of experiment. Though alarmed for the issue of some of the details in the plan proposed by the Commissioners, I am consoled by the persuasion, that they have adopted the spirit of the Acts of Henry and William. The desire which they have expressed in the case now before me for the co-operation of the Authorities of the Established Church, is to me a sufficient pledge that a similar good understanding will be cultivated in other instances; I accept it as such with much pleasure, and, on the part of the Church, I think it but my duty to say, in return, that its conduct hitherto is an unequivocal proof of the moderation of its principles, and of its cordial alacrity in coming into any measures which may promote peace and general edification.

Upon the subject of Books, I was gratified to find the Commissioners stating, (Report, page 98), that they were "deeply impressed with the importance of introducing the Scriptures into all institutions for the education of the people, as a fundamental part of the instruction."

The Harmony mentioned in the Archbishop of Dublin's letter is, I conclude, the same work which is described by the Commissioners in the 98th page of the Report, and the 764th and the two following pages of the Appendix; it is there represented as a book which might possibly be "adapted to the use of children of both persuasions in schools, as a part of their common instruction, but not as a substitute for the Scriptures, which should still be used for the separate instruction of the children, both Protestant and Roman Catholic, on two days of the week."

It is the wish of the Commissioners, as I understand from the Archbishop of Dublin, to obtain a work of this nature, which shall be acceptable to the hierarchy of both Churches.

Various circumstances combine to check the hope that this can be accomplished, yet I will not allow myself to despair.

The good which may arise, if by any means charity could be promoted and practical instruction diffused, without constraining either party to sacrifice what it believes to be the truth of the Gospel, cannot be calculated; and I feel that it is peculiarly befitting the place and character of the Established Church to labour for the attainment of so great a blessing. Under this impression I would recommend, as the Archbishop of Dublin has done in a case somewhat similar, (Appendix, page 761), that a committee of Divines be appointed by the heads of the Church to prepare a Harmony of the Gospels, formed principally from the authorized version, yet not so exclusively as to reject always the language of the Douay Bible, if it afford an apt and instructive meaning. This committee should report within a limited time; and when their work, if they should succeed in compiling one, had been revised by a committee of the Episcopal Bench, it should be presented to the Commissioners to be laid before the Roman Catholic Hierarchy.

I have now given you my thoughts upon mature consideration, and, as far as I believe, it was the purpose of your letter to consult me. Should any other occasion arise in which my opinion or co-operation may appear to the Commissioners to be desirable, I shall be happy to give their communication the best attention in my power.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Frankland Lewis, Esq.
&c. &c.

Your obedient servant,

John G. Armagh.

In the beginning of the month of July the Commissioners received from his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin the volume prepared by the Committee of Clergymen of the Established Church, referred to in the preceding letter, and which had received the sanction of the Prelates of the Established Church. The nature and principle of the work was at the same time described by his Grace in the following letter.

(6.) Letter from his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin to T. Frankland Lewis, Esq.; dated Palace, Dublin, July 8th, 1826.

My dear Sir,

In pursuance of the desire of the Commissioners of the Education Inquiry, that the sanction of the Bishops of the Irish branch of the United Church should be obtained for some work in the nature of a selection from the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles, to be used as a common reading-book in poor schools for children of different Christian denominations, a scheme of Scripture lessons is herewith sent for the consideration of your Board.

It is an extract from the English edition of a work which was compiled at Petersburg for the use of schools, and which, under the command of the late Emperor, has been in use throughout the schools of the Russian empire since the year 1819.

This work, which has been in high repute, and in widely-extended circulation, not only through Russia and England, but through the different countries of Europe, in their several languages, it was thought prudent to adopt as a groundwork for the selection to be formed, not only on account of its great celebrity as a scriptural school-book, but still more on account of the unsuspiciousness of its origin, having been first framed for the instruction of children of the Greek Church, which the Roman Catholics profess to consider as partaking more of the character of the Roman than of the Reformed Church. At the same time, lest any thing either in the subjects or the language of the portion selected from this work should throw impediments in the way of its adoption for general use, a Committee of five learned and judicious clergymen was appointed for a careful examination of its several parts, and for the special purpose of omitting whatever might be at variance in sense with the translations of Scripture in use amongst the Roman Catholics of this country.

The Scripture lessons thus formed have not yet been submitted to the Bishops at large, nor can their judgment as a body be collected until the time of their assembling at the First Fruits Meeting in October. But I hold myself authorized to say, that I entertain no doubt of their giving their consent to the use of this book for a common reading-book, in mixed schools, should the Commissioners approve it. I should do injustice, however, to many (perhaps I might say all) of my brethen, as well as to myself, were I to leave the Commissioners under the impression that in our opinion any abstract from the New Testament can be a sufficient substitute for the New Testament itself as a reading-book in a Christian school.

This Tract is sent merely at the request of the Commissioners, as one which, if any modification of Scripture must be used in schools, may be considered as little objectionable as any other.

I beg leave to add, that if any change of this Tract, in the way of mere omission, be thought advisable by the Commissioners, I have little doubt of its being acceded to by the Bishops.

I have the honour to be, my dear Sir,

Your faithful and obedient servant,

T. Frankland Lewis, Esq.

W. Dublin.

Immediately upon the receipt of the volume prepared by the Committee of Clergymen of the Established Church, the Chairman of the Board lost no time in communicating it to Dr. Murray, the other Roman Catholic Archbishops not being then in Dublin. The Chairman at the same time requested Dr. Murray to be so good as to inform the Commissioners whether he should think himself called upon to discourage the attendance of Roman Catholic children in any Schools within the district under his immediate charge, in which the use of that compilation should be required; and if so, whether any, and what alterations could render it in his view unobjectionable.

The work was afterwards returned to the Chairman by Dr. Murray, with the following note:—

(7.) Note from the Most Reverend Doctor Murray to T. Frankland Lewis, Esq.; dated Cumberland-street, 17th July 1826.

My dear Sir,

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 8th instant, which, owing to my absence from town, only reached me this morning.

As the work which you have had the goodness to send me is a compilation taken exclusively and verbatim from the Protestant version of the New Testament, I think it would be open to the objections already stated by the Catholic Archbishops to the Commissioners with reference to a similar work. Allow me, however, to observe, that those objections might, in my opinion, be removed, if the matter of the work were abstracted both from the Catholic and Protestant versions, where they substantially agree, without the words being taken throughout literatim from either, according to the principles explained by us to the Commissioners, when last we had the honour of an interview with them.

I have the honour to be, with very sincere respect,

My dear Sir, your's most faithfully,

Thomas Frankland Lewis, Esq.

D. Murray.

&c. &c. &c.

Pending the foregoing correspondence, a work entitled "Christian Lessons," chiefly extracted from the New Testament, and prepared by an individual Commissioner of the Board, was laid before us, under circumstances which induced us to believe that it would not be unlikely to meet with the approbation of the Roman Catholic Clergy, a belief which afterwards proved to be well founded, as the Roman Catholic Prelates, in the sequel, themselves proposed the work to us, after they had introduced into it some corrections.

The work entitled "Christian Lessons" was then submitted to the consideration of his Grace the Lord Primate by the Chairman of our Board; but it is very necessary here to observe, that we felt the time was not yet arrived when it would become our duty to express any judgment of our own on the admissibility or inadmissibility of any of the volumes that had been under consideration. We did not mean to imply any approbation of the principle on which either of the two last-mentioned books was constructed, or on the details of their execution. On the contrary, while we felt it right to supply every facility of communication through our Board to the Prelates of the respective Churches, we meant to confine ourselves to that course, without expressing, in that stage of the proceedings, any opinion of our own, either collectively or individually. In order to mark distinctly such an intention on our part, expressions were introduced into the following letter, which accompanied the transmission of the Christian Lessons to his Grace the Lord Primate, which we had trusted were sufficient for that purpose.

(8.) Letter from T. Frankland Lewis, Esq. to his Grace the Lord Primate; dated Merrion-street, Dublin, 18th July 1826.

My Lord,

The Commissioners of Education Inquiry, in pursuance of the desire of his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, have been for some time engaged in preparing to try practically the plan of Education recommended by their Report, in a certain number of Schools to be established for the purpose.

Your Grace will excuse me for recalling to your recollection, that according to this plan the children of the different religious persuasions, though united for the purpose of receiving general literary instruction, are to be separated for the purpose of reading the Holy Scriptures, and being taught the principles of the Christian religion according to the forms in which they are respectively desirous of receiving it. With a view, however, to increase their opportunities of obtaining religious information, it has been thought necessary, in their united general instruction, to require require the use of a volume of scriptural extracts, arranged, if possible, in such a way as not to be objectionable to any denomination of Christians, whatever may be their religious tenets.

Your Grace will immediately perceive that the arrangement of such a work is a matter of very considerable difficulty. After a good deal of preparatory examination into the nature of the difficulties which were to be overcome, and under the strongest sense of our duty not to recommend any work which should appear to be objectionable on the part of the Established Church, we applied, in the month of February last, to the Archbishop of Dublin, and under the direction and assistance of his Grace, we have lately been furnished with a copious selection from the authorized version of the New Testament, combined in such a manner as (in the view of the reverend gentlemen to whose labours we are indebted for the compilation) to be as little likely as may be to give rise to objections on the ground of religious distinctions.

It has been my duty to submit this collection to the inspection of Dr. Murray, one of the Archbishops of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, with a view to learn whether he should think it his duty to discourage (within the district under his charge) the attendance of Roman Catholic children in Schools in which that selection should be used? I learn from him in reply, that as the work is "taken exclusively and verbatim from the Protestant version of the New Testament, he thinks it would be open to the objections already stated by the Catholic Archbishops to the Commissioners with reference to a similar work; that those objections might, in his opinion, be removed, if the matter of the work were abstracted both from the Catholic and Protestant versions, where they substantially agree, without the words being taken throughout literatim from either, according to the principles explained by them to the Commissioners, when last they had the honour of an interview with them."

Under these circumstances our attention has been called to a selection lately submitted to the consideration of the Board, and a copy of which I have the honour to transmit.

We have reason to think the work would be less likely to meet with objection on the part of the Roman Catholic Clergy.

Your Grace will see that it contains, printed in Italics, some few sentences of introductory and explanatory matter, which are added to the extracts from the Scriptures.

It will also occur to your notice, that throughout the work, the authorized version has not been invariably followed, the text being in part taken from that of the Douay.

In some instances too, the sense is expressed in words, which, though intended to be a faithful translation of the original, are not in the precise language of either version. Your Grace will observe also, that a few of the lessons have been put together with a view to inculcate particular Christian duties, the texts composing which have been selected from various parts of the New Testament, according to the discretion of the compiler. The remainder of the work appears not to differ very materially from the selection submitted to our notice by the direction of the Archbishop of Dublin; and it has been submitted to us under the idea that it might (if at all admissible) be much improved and enlarged by the introduction of some extracts, as well from the Old Testament as from the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles.

Your Grace will naturally believe, that in considering of the execution of a work of this nature, we have been strongly impressed with the conviction, that no opinions of ours, on a theological ground, could carry with them any weight whatever; I take the liberty therefore, with reference to the opinions of the Established Church, to apply myself with much anxiety to your Grace.

Our duty to the Lord Lieutenant makes it necessary for us to proceed with the experiment with as little delay as may be; and we are desirous of ascertaining from your Grace, whether the work I transmit appears on the principles on which it is constructed, or in its details, to be liable to any serious or irremediable objection.

I have the honour to be,

Your Grace's most obedient servant,

To his Grace the Lord Primate,

T. Frankland Lewis,

To the above letter we received the following reply :—

(9.) Letter from his Grace the Lord Primate to Thomas Frankland Lewis, Esq. ; dated Armagh, 28th August 1826.

Sir,

Your letter of the 18th of July, reached this, accompanied by a note from Mr. Pauncefote, dated the 29th, explaining the cause of the delay of its transmission. When it arrived here, I had been called away by an affliction with which it pleased God to visit my family, and since my return I have been occupied in the visitation of this province, according to previous arrangements with my suffragans.

Before I enter upon the subject to which you have now called my attention, allow me to place before you some particulars of our former correspondence. In your letter of the 18th January, you were so good as to assure me, that “ the Commissioners were fully aware that the books recommended in their Report “ could not be properly arranged, except with the approbation and under the superintendence of the Authorities in the Established Church.” My answer was written in the expectation that the Commissioners would continue to act under this impression. I stated the opinion, which, after mature deliberation, I had been induced to form of their general design in the plan they had proposed ; while I acknowledged my alarm at some particular measures, I declared myself consoled by the persuasion that they had adopted the principle of the Statutes of Henry the Eighth and William the Third, which commit National Education to the Established Clergy, and without passing beyond the question upon which it appeared to be their intention to consult me, I endeavoured throughout to express myself in language which, had I fallen into a misconception of their views, might elicit an explanation. From the frankness of my statement, and the silence with which it continued to be received for more than half a year, I became every day more and more assured that my hopes had been well founded.

Your recent communication, however, has considerably weakened this assurance. I will state the impression it has made upon me, with the same freedom which I used in my former letter, and with an anxious desire to be undeceived if I have fallen into error.

The Commissioners have rejected the volume of Scripture Lessons which had been prepared according to their own desire, “ with the approbation and under the superintendence” of the Archbishop of Dublin and myself, and by a Committee appointed at a very full meeting of the Bishops. This step is not accounted for in your letter by any objections to particular words or passages, and, indeed, it could not be so accounted for, because, had the difficulties been of that nature, it could not escape your discernment, that the obvious course would be to point them out, with a view to their removal or modification. The book was condemned by Dr. Murray, as you mention, upon this general ground, that “ being taken exclusively “ and verbatim from the Protestant version, it is open to the objections already “ stated to the Commissioners by the Catholic Archbishops.” You have not informed me what the objections are, but it appears that your Board acquiesces in them as conclusive. In the place of the compilation thus rejected, you propose a book to me which you say the Commissioners have reason to think would be less likely to meet with objection on the part of the Roman Catholic Clergy. This work is sent printed ; and I learn from Mr. Pauncefote, that it was some delay in obtaining it from the press which occasioned the detention of your letter in Dublin. From all these circumstances, I am obliged to conclude, that the relation in which the Commissioners expressed themselves desirous of standing with the Established Church has been seriously altered. Instead of that superintending co-operation in the arrangement of a system of national instruction which your former letter taught me to expect, we are now reduced to a simple negative upon the proceedings of your Board. Possibly, indeed, even this privilege is more than I am strictly warranted in inferring from your last communication.

The immediate purpose of your letter is to learn “ whether there be any serious “ or irremediable objection to your printed volume.” I cannot refrain from avowing my deep concern that this question has not been pressed upon the Roman Catholic Hierarchy, with respect to the compilation prepared under the directions of the Archbishop of Dublin and myself. Had the Commissioners delayed the rejection of it until they had discovered the particular objections to which it was liable, weighed weighed their importance, and, if serious, ascertained our inability or unwillingness to provide a remedy, they would have done no more than what was consistent with their own declarations, and the reasonable claims of the Established Church. At present, the only objection which appears against it is, that it is a Protestant version. You inform me, that the "Commissioners are strongly impressed with the conviction, that, in considering the execution of a work of this nature, no opinions of theirs, on a theological ground, could carry with them any weight whatever." I am quite persuaded of the correctness of this conviction, yet I trust that the Commissioners will find no difficulty in comprehending the few observations of that nature, which it will be my duty to lay before them. There are no more than two verses in our compilation which suggest a sense different from that in the Douay, (St. Matthew, 26—28, and St. Luke, 11—14,) and of these, the former only can be imagined to have a controversial bearing. Now, although the substituted volume does not contain this verse, it contains the parallel one of St. Luke, and gives the disputed words according to the authorised version thus :—

Rejected words of St. Matthew—"This is my blood of the New Testament which is shed for many."

Adopted clause in St. Luke—"This cup is the New Testament in my blood which is shed for you."

The question which arises here between the Churches is, whether is shed, or shall be shed, be the true interpretation. It must be obvious to your Board, from this statement, that the ground of opposition to our volume is, that it is a version made by Protestants, and implying the existence of a Protestant Church and Government.

I am now to inform the Commissioners what objections can be made, on the part of the Established Church, to the volume which they have substituted. To me it appears, that the point at issue between the two volumes is no less than that great question between the Churches of Rome and England, "what is the rule of Faith?" The Church of Rome gives authority, the Church of England gives evidence, as the basis of Christianity: the latter appears as a faithful witness of the sacred records, and of the interpretation which has been put upon them by the first believers: the former, as an infallible teacher, drawing her doctrines and institutions from herself, or from a secret store of tradition, which is independent of the written word, and the key of which has been committed to her custody by the great founder of our religion. In our system, the Church is nothing without the Scriptures; in that of Rome, its powers and doctrines might have been as they are, had the New Testament never been written. This irreconcilable difference between the two Churches appears upon the first inspection of the volume now before me. The work which we prepared is provided with references to the sacred writers, so that every reader may satisfy himself of the fidelity of the quotation, and, if he be competent to such inquiries, of the correctness of the original reading, and accuracy of the version. There are no references in the printed work. The Church delivers her "Christian Lessons," as they are styled, but without any intimation that they are derived from an higher authority. There is nothing wherein a child or a peasant could conjecture that there was such a book as the New Testament in existence. This omission you will perceive to be of vital importance. Should Government or the Legislature determine on insisting upon the circulation of the work, it will be our duty to submit; but we could not express our consent, and still less give our active support to the measure, without withdrawing our protest against the assumptions of the Church of Rome.

This is all that I feel it necessary to state upon the theological aspect of your question; there is another view of it, which the Commissioners are better prepared to appreciate. I have already expressed an opinion in my former letter, and I do not think it too much to repeat it now, that the State, particularly a State like ours, in which so much depends upon public feeling, has an immediate interest in the moral and social principles of all its members; that this interest gives it a right, or rather imposes upon it an obligation, of providing a system of national instruction; and that the trust of superintending this system is most consistently reposed in an Established Clergy. Circumstances would guide me in determining the degree in which the Clergy should be ostensibly engaged in this superintendence; but no circumstances could induce me to sacrifice the rights of the Church, or the future prospects of the Nation, by an entire surrender of it. I should therefore feel it my duty to object to any plan of national education in which the co-operation of the Clergy in preparing books, visiting schools, and overseeing the teachers, was pointedly excluded. I have seen many reasons to believe that the Roman Catholic Hierarchy have similar views of the rights of their order, and that they claim to themselves, as the true Church, what I consider due to the Established Church from its union with the State. One of these reasons I take the liberty of laying before you, as it is derived from a document connected with the subject of your letter, and the general functions of your Board. A few days after I had answered your former letter, I met with a series of Resolutions adopted by the Roman Catholic Prelates, and published in a paper dated the 25th of January. The following are those to which I wish particularly to call your attention:—

“ First Resolution.

“ Having considered attentively a plan of National Education which has been submitted to us,—Resolved, that the admission of Protestants and Roman Catholics into the same School for the purpose of literary instruction may, under existing circumstances, be allowed, provided sufficient care be taken to protect the religion of the Roman Catholic children, and to furnish them with adequate means of religious instruction.

“ Second Resolution.

“ That in order to secure sufficient protection to the religion of the Roman Catholic children, under such a system of education, we deem it necessary that the Master of each school in which the majority of the pupils profess the Roman Catholic faith, be a Roman Catholic; and that in schools in which the Roman Catholic children form only a minority, a permanent Roman Catholic Assistant be employed, and that such Master and Assistant be appointed upon the recommendation, or with the express approval of the Roman Catholic Bishop of the diocese in which they are to be employed; and further that they, or either of them, be removed upon the representation of such Bishop.

“ Fourth Resolution.

“ That in conformity with the principle of protecting the religion of the Roman Catholic children, the Books intended for their particular instruction in religion shall be selected or approved by the Roman Catholic Prelates; no book or tract for common instruction in literature shall be introduced into any school in which Roman Catholic children are educated, which book or tract may be objected to, on religious grounds, by the Roman Catholic Bishop of the diocese in which such school is established.

“ Sixth Resolution.

“ That appointed as we have been by Divine Providence to watch over and preserve the deposit of Catholic faith in Ireland, and responsible as we are to God for the souls of our flocks, we will, in our respective dioceses, withhold our concurrence and support from any system of Education which will not fully accord with the principles expressed in the foregoing Resolutions.”

Various misgivings are awakened in my mind by these Resolutions; the sum of them is, that the source of the present difficulty lies out of the power of the Commissioners. Give me leave to suggest a very easy mode of submitting the justness of this opinion to experiment. One of the objects of the Commissioners, and I presume the chief one, in recommending Schools of general instruction, was, that the kindly sympathies of our nature, being aided by habits of youthful companionship, as well as the benign precepts of the Gospel, might be matured, as life advanced, into the charities of Christian neighbourhood. It is obvious, however, that the success of this endeavour will entirely depend on the care with which sinister influences are excluded from the minds of the children during the seasons set apart for their separate instruction in the tenets of their respective religions.

The Roman Catholic Catechism, which will of course be used on these occasions for the children of that communion, contains the following questions and answers:—

Q. Is there but one true Church?—A. Although there be many sects, there is but one true religion, and one true Church.

Q. Why is there but one true Church?—A. As there is but one true God, there can be but one true Church.

Q. How

- Q. How do you call the true Church?—A. The Roman Catholic Church.
 Q. Are all obliged to be of that true Church?—A. Yes.
 Q. Why are all obliged to be of that true Church?—A. Because no one can be saved out of it.
 Q. How many ways are there of sinning against Faith?—A. Chiefly three.
 Q. What are these three ways?—A. First, by not seeking to know what God has taught; secondly, by not believing what God has taught, &c.
 Q. Who are they who do not believe what God has taught?—A. Heretics and infidels.

The Commissioners will surely agree with me in thinking that it would be desirable to have these passages expunged; that as long as they shall continue to be privately inculcated upon the Roman Catholic children by their religious instructors, any other lessons they may receive will teach them dissimulation rather than cordial good feeling. The same wise and benevolent motives which make the Commissioners desirous to discover a religious book which might be common to all parties, must inspire the anxiety that what is peculiar in religion should be conveyed to the youthful mind without poisoning or drying up the fountain of those sentiments which, next to the love of God, it is the great business of the Gospel to feed and purify,—“peace on earth, good-will towards man.” Let them then endeavour to remove these questions and answers. Should they succeed, the appointment of their Board will indeed be an auspicious era in the history of this country. But if they fail, or if it should be their feeling that they ought not to try,—that these matters are beyond their sphere, that they relate so exclusively to religion as not to be approached without invading the rights of conscience, I can no longer elude the desponding conviction, that their wishes will be disappointed and their labours ineffectual.

I trust, Sir, that you will see sufficient reasons for the length of this letter in the station which I occupy, and the high and important commission with which your Board is invested.

I am, Sir, with much consideration,

Your obedient servant,

To Frankland Lewis, Esq.
 &c. &c. &c.

John G. Armagh.

To this letter the following reply was addressed to his Grace:—

(10.) Letter from T. Frankland Lewis, Esq. to his Grace the Lord Primate; dated Merrion-street, Dublin, 16th September 1826.

My Lord,

I have refrained from acknowledging the receipt of your Grace's communication of the 28th ultimo, having been desirous of submitting it to the consideration of a full Board of the Commissioners, which I had not an opportunity of doing until yesterday.

It is now my duty to offer to your Grace our thanks for the attention you have been so good as to pay to the several points which we have thought it incumbent upon us to refer to your Grace, and we are desirous at the same time of offering some explanation on parts of your Grace's letter, which lead the Commissioners to apprehend that the course they have pursued, and the views and opinions entertained by them, have been in some points materially misunderstood.

The Commissioners, having been called on by the Government to try the experiment of establishing a certain number of Schools on the principles recommended in their First Report, determined in the first instance upon attempting to obtain the Works, connected with religious information, proposed to be used in Schools of general instruction.

In my first communication with your Grace, I had the honour of stating, that the Commissioners were fully aware that the books in question “could not be properly arranged excepting with the approbation and under the superintendence of the Authorities of the Established Church,” and in the course they have pursued they have never ceased to act under that impression.

The Commissioners however, upon the receipt of your Grace's answer of the 31st January 1826, abstained from entering on a discussion of the several points alluded to in it, connected with their general plan of Education, under the impression, that according to the constitution of their Board, and the duties entrusted to them, they are precluded from so doing, except in a Report to the Crown, or to the Lord Lieutenant. They request, however, that it may not be inferred from their silence, that the observations offered to their notice by your Grace have not met with the consideration to which they are so highly entitled.

With respect to the compilation from the New Testament, arranged by a Committee of Clergymen of the Established Church, under the direction of your Grace and the Archbishop of Dublin, the Commissioners beg leave to assure your Grace, that so far from having rejected it, they have never even discussed such a proposition; nor have they ever come to any decision, approving either of the principle or of the details of the other work, which I had lately the honour of transmitting to your Grace under the title of "Christian Lessons."

In my letter to your Grace of the 18th July last, I stated that it was the object of the Commissioners to procure a volume of "Scriptural Extracts, arranged, " if possible, in such a way as not to be objectionable to any denomination of " Christians, whatever may be their religious tenets." It therefore became our necessary duty, when we received the volume sanctioned by your Grace, to ascertain the sentiments entertained respecting it by the persons who from their stations are most influential in the several religious communities which exist in this country. In the course of our proceedings, the opinions of the four Roman Catholic Archbishops with respect to the construction of any book of this nature had been very fully elicited by the Commissioners, particularly in reference to a translation, in the words of the authorized version, of the well known harmony of the Gospels entitled "White's Diatessaron," which had been the subject of much investigation on the part of the Commissioners. Finding afterwards from Dr. Murray's letter, that he considered the objections which the Roman Catholic Archbishops had strongly urged against the Diatessaron would apply also to the work prepared by the Committee of Clergymen of the Established Church, and the work entitled "Christian Lessons" having been laid before the Board under circumstances which justified a belief that there would be much less objection to it on the part of the Roman Catholic Archbishops, I felt it my duty to submit that volume to your Grace; but so far from the Commissioners having come to any decision for the adoption of the work, in my letter addressed to your Grace upon that occasion, I studiously used the words "if at all admissible," in speaking of that work, to mark our anxiety to obtain your Grace's opinion upon that point.

In taking this course, it was the express object of the Commissioners to leave to the Established Church the fullest opportunity of altering or arranging the details of the work itself, if any such alteration or arrangement would make it admissible in their view.

In the same letter I had further the honour of stating, that the Commissioners applied themselves with much anxiety to your Grace, for the purpose of obtaining the opinions of the Established Church, and I concluded with a request to be informed, whether this work appeared, "on the principles on which it is constructed, " or in its details, to be liable to any serious or irremediable objection."

The printed form in which it was transmitted to your Grace, and which seems to have conveyed an idea of its having been sanctioned by the Commissioners, was adopted solely with a view to facilitate its inspection. We are desirous, also, to point out to your Grace that the work is obviously in an incomplete form; and that in sending it, I took occasion to state that it was communicated to us under the idea that "it might be much improved and enlarged by the introduction of some " extracts, as well from the Old Testament as from the Acts of the Apostles and " the Epistles."

Amongst the alterations and additions to be made in it, a preface, stating that the lessons were abstracted from the New Testament, and an accurate table of reference to the different passages of Scripture, from which the text was drawn, would necessarily have been included, as soon as the passages to which the index should refer had been first decided upon, a circumstance which the Commissioners are gratified in observing would have removed a strong objection urged in your Grace's letter.

I cannot conclude this letter without assuring your Grace, that every matter connected with the subject of the general Education of the lower orders in Ireland, which which your Grace has brought under the consideration of the Commissioners, continues to engage their most anxious attention.

I have the honour to be,
Your Grace's most obedient servant,
To his Grace the Lord Primate. T. Frankland Lewis.

To this letter the Commissioners received the following answer:—

(11.) Letter from his Grace the Lord Primate to T. Frankland Lewis, Esq.; dated Armagh, 30th September 1826.

Sir,

I have great pleasure in acknowledging the receipt of your letter of the 16th instant. In entering into those explanations which I felt it my duty to make in my former letters, it was by no means my desire, either to invite discussion, or to elicit any of that information which the Commissioners, in the discharge of their high trust, might judge it more suitable to reserve for His Majesty or the Lord Lieutenant. I acted solely under the impression, that upon a subject so important in itself, and so extensive and complicated in its relations as that upon which your Board is now engaged, it is impossible to give a safe or satisfactory answer to a specific question, without some general view of its bearing upon connected topics. As this view was not afforded me by the Commissioners, I found it necessary to trace for myself an outline of those circumstances by which my answers to their inquiries were regulated and defined. I am happy to be undeceived as to the volume of "Christian Lessons;" my mistake respecting it did not arise merely from its being printed, but in a great measure from Mr. Pauncefote's note of the 29th July, in which he says, that your letter of the 16th "had been detained at the office of the Commissioners, in consequence of the work therein referred to, and now enclosed, not having been received from the printer until this day." I inferred from this, that particular importance was attached to its appearance in a printed form, and that otherwise it would have been sent at once in manuscript.

The same expression of Mr. Pauncefote misled me into the apprehension that the work was complete, as then received from the printer, an apprehension from which I am also indebted to you for relieving me. You will however, I trust, excuse me for expressing that I am not satisfied of the value of that index of reference which you have described in your last letter. I cannot conclude without expressing my acknowledgments for the manner in which you have been so good as to receive my communications, and beg to assure you of the respect with which I am

Your obedient servant,
Frankland Lewis, Esq. John G. Armagh.

After receiving this letter from his Grace the Lord Primate, our next proceeding was to bring the work suggested on the part of the Established Church again under the consideration of Dr. Murray, with a request that he would cause such a modification of the work to be prepared as might remove the objections which he had contemplated in his letter of the 17th July 1826, and which might render it in his view, and in that of the other Prelates of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, admissible in Schools of general instruction. The following correspondence took place on the subject:—

(12.) Letter from T. Frankland Lewis, Esq. to the Most Reverend Doctor Murray; dated Merrion-street, Dublin, 30th November 1826.

Most Reverend Sir,

I had the honour to submit to your notice in the month of July last a compilation from the New Testament, which had been arranged under the sanction of the Dignitaries of the Established Church at the request of the Commissioners of Education Inquiry, with a view to its being used in the Schools of general instruction, which were recommended in our first Report to His Majesty. At the same time, I requested you would have the goodness to inform me whether you would think yourself called upon to discourage the attendance of children of the Roman Catholic faith in any school within the district under your immediate charge, in which the use of that compilation might be required, as the Commissioners were desirous of ascertaining that point before they took the work into their further consideration.

In reply to that inquiry, you were so good as to state, that as the selection was taken exclusively and verbatim from the Protestant version of the New Testament, you thought it would be open to the objections already stated by the Roman Catholic Archbishops to the Commissioners with reference to a similar work.

At the same time, you stated, that those objections might in your opinion be removed, if the matter of the work were abstracted from the Catholic and Protestant versions, where they substantially agree, without the words being taken throughout literatim from either.

In consequence of that suggestion, I beg leave now to request, which I should earlier have done if I had not learnt that you were detained in England by indisposition, that you will be good enough to cause to be prepared such a modification of the work above referred to, as would remove the objections which you contemplated in that letter, and which would render it in your view, and in that of the other Prelates of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, admissible in schools of general instruction.

Any expense which may be incurred, will be readily provided for by the Commissioners.

I have the honour to be, most Reverend Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

The Most Reverend Doctor Murray.

T. Frankland Lewis.

To the foregoing letter we received the following answer:—

(13.) Letter from the Most Reverend Doctor Murray to T. Frankland Lewis, Esq.; dated North Cumberland-street, 20th December 1826.

Sir,

I have laid before a meeting of the Roman Catholic Prelates of Ireland, the letter which you had the goodness to address to me, under date of the 30th November last, and I have now the honour to communicate to you their sentiments on the subject of it.

All the Prelates fully agree in the propriety of the objection urged by the Roman Catholic Archbishops, against putting into the hands of Catholic children as Scripture, any book which is not conformable to their own authorized translation; and it is satisfactory to them to observe, that the validity of this objection is supported by the testimony of his Grace the Protestant Archbishop of Dublin, as appears in your Report of his Grace's examination before your Board, on the 11th of January 1825. In his Grace's answer to the question N^o 52, put on that occasion, the mischievous consequences to be apprehended from putting before a child as scripture, a book of any form, which should not be exactly conformable to the translation approved by his Church, are stated so much at large, that it would be quite superfluous to add a word to the train of reasoning pursued by his Grace.

On this principle, which seems to be common to Roman Catholics and Protestants, we feel it our reluctant duty to declare, that the work which you did me the honour to submit to my perusal cannot, unless the plan on which it is constructed be wholly changed, obtain our sanction as a book of general instruction to be used in schools, wherein Catholic children receive their education. It purports to present to Catholic children the inspired word of God, and yet it differs from the translation which those children are taught to consider authentic. There is evidence before your Board, that the Prelates of the Protestant Church would object to a similar work, if constructed solely from the Douay version, and the Commissioners will not, I trust, deem it unreasonable, that we should, on the same grounds, entertain a conscientious objection to the work in question.

A work, however, abstracted substantially from the Scripture, but not purporting to be the words of Holy Writ (such as that to which I had the honour to allude in my letter of July last), would not be liable to the same objection; and in this view of the subject, the Prelate already referred to seems to coincide. For in his Grace's answer to the question of the Commissioners, N^o 59, the admissibility of such a book appears to be recognized, provided it "be not put forward as the Scriptures, but as an historical view of what is found in the Scriptures."

Here

Here then perhaps a point of union may be found, and the only practicable way can be come at, whereby the Prelates of the Roman Catholic and of the Protestant Church may, without a sacrifice of principle, be led to agree in the adoption of a book, such as the Commissioners desire, for the purpose of general instruction.

The Roman Catholic Prelates have seen a book entitled "Christian Lessons," which is a compilation of this latter description. It contains nearly the whole matter of the former work, taken from the Roman Catholic and Protestant translations, where they substantially agree; but it gives the matter as an historical statement, rather than as a transcript of Scripture. I have made some trifling alterations in this book (an amended copy of which I have the honour to send herewith), and though it is not yet all that we could wish, I am instructed to say, that the Roman Catholic Prelates would not think themselves called on to discourage the attendance of children of the Roman Catholic faith in any school in which the use of this compilation so amended might be required, provided the regulations of said school were in accordance with the Resolutions of the Roman Catholic Prelates, which I had the honour to transmit to the Commissioners on the 23d of January last.

I have the honour to remain, Sir,

T. Frankland Lewis, Esq.
&c. &c. &c.

Your most obedient servant,
D. Murray.

The above letter from Dr. Murray, together with the work so transmitted by him, was then communicated by us to his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin, with the following letter:—

(14.) Letter from T. Frankland Lewis, Esq. to his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin; dated Merrion-street, 22d of December 1826.

My Lord,

Your Grace has been good enough on several occasions to allow me to communicate through you with the Authorities of the Established Church in Ireland, on the subject of the Work which the Commissioners are desirous of procuring for the use of Schools.

Permit me now to enclose to your Grace a copy of a letter addressed by me on the 30th of November last to Dr. Murray, for the purpose of again drawing his attention to the selections from the New Testament, which the Lord Primate and your Grace were good enough to cause to be prepared for our inspection, and with respect to which, Dr. Murray had stated to me in his letter of the 17th July last, that the objections of the Roman Catholic Bishops "might, in his opinion, be removed, if the matter of the work were abstracted from the Catholic and Protestant versions, where they substantially agree, without the words being taken throughout literatim from either." In consequence of this communication, I thought it right to request, that he would be good enough to cause to be prepared for consideration such a modification of that work as would remove the objections contemplated by him,

In compliance with this request, Dr. Murray appears to have conferred upon the subject with the Bishops of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, and has conveyed to me the result of that conference in a letter of the 20th instant, a copy of which I have the honour to transmit, together with the work then communicated to me by him; and with respect to which, your Grace will observe, that Dr. Murray has stated, that "though it is not yet all that they could wish, he is instructed to say, that the Roman Catholic Prelates would not think themselves called on to discourage the attendance of children of the Roman Catholic faith in any school in which the use of this compilation, so amended, might be required, provided the regulations of said school were in accordance with the Resolutions of the Roman Catholic Prelates, transmitted to the Commissioners on the 23d of January last."

The Commissioners in transmitting this volume to your Grace, for the purpose of learning the opinion of the Prelates of the Established Church in reference to it, beg leave to be understood as not implying any opinion whatever of their own upon the subject.

Your Grace will observe, at the conclusion of Dr. Murray's letter, an allusion to certain resolutions of the Roman Catholic Prelates, a copy of which was transmitted to the Commissioners when they were made public in January last. I think it right to explain, that the Commissioners have not in any way complied with, or acquiesced in, these resolutions, and, on that account, they have not thought it necessary to transmit a copy of them to your Grace. In the course they have adopted, they have wished to separate from all other matter the consideration and the arrangement of the work they have been endeavouring to obtain, and they will be prepared hereafter to discuss any objections which may arise, or difficulties which may impede the experiment which they have been directed to try on the plan recommended by them in their First Report; they have determined, therefore, to postpone any expression of their opinion of the possible bearing of the resolutions above alluded to, until they have finally ascertained, whether any such work as they are desirous of obtaining can be agreed on.

I have the honour to be,
Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,
T. Frankland Lewis.

To his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin.

On the 7th March 1827, we received from the Lord Primate the following answer:—

(15.) Letter from the Lord Primate, in the name of the Archbishops and Bishops of the Established Church in Ireland, to T. Frankland Lewis, Esq.; dated 22d February 1827.

Sir,

The purpose of the letter which you addressed to his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin, is to learn the opinion of the Prelates of the Established Church in reference to a volume, entitled "Christian Lessons," which appears to have been recommended by the Roman Catholic Bishops as the book of scriptural instruction to be used in the general education which the children should receive in common in the proposed National Schools.

In reply to this letter, we have the honour to state, that our attention was some months ago drawn to this volume by his Grace the Lord Primate, to whose consideration it had been submitted by the Commissioners. His Grace was at the same time good enough to lay before us the answer which he had returned upon the subject; and we beg to say, that in the particular objection therein urged against the book, as well as in the general view taken of the important topics which are involved in the question of its adoption, his Grace's letter met with our entire concurrence. Without permitting ourselves to enlarge further on the degree of deference, which we conceive to have been due to the Authorities of a National Church, in a proposed system of National Education, we proceed impartially to consider the sole ground of objection taken by the Roman Catholic Hierarchy, as furnishing a reason for rejecting those selections from the New Testament, which had been prepared at the request of the Commissioners, under the direction of the Lord Primate and the Archbishop of Dublin, with our sanction. The objection is thus stated by Dr. Murray: "The book purports to present to Catholic children the inspired Word of God, and yet it differs from the translation which those children are taught to consider as authentic." In confirmation of this objection, Dr. Murray refers to some remarks made by the Archbishop of Dublin in his examination before the Commissioners. In his Grace's answer to the question N° 52, put on that occasion, Dr. Murray says, "That the mischievous consequences to be apprehended from putting before a child as Scripture, a book of any form, which should not be exactly conformable to the translation approved by his Church, are stated so much at large, that it would be quite superfluous to add a word to the train of reasoning pursued by his Grace." The Commissioners will here permit us to observe, that should the Roman Catholic Prelates, agreeably to the inference which they seem to draw from this insulated part of the Archbishop of Dublin's evidence (whether correctly or not, it is needless for us now to inquire,) persist in resisting every selection from the Scriptures that is not "exactly conformable to the translation approved by their own Church," every hope of accommodation must be necessarily and at once excluded. It is obvious, however, that the two Churches are very differently circumstanced with respect to their translations in general use, and that the Archbishop of Dublin's remarks may be justly applicable to the case of the one Church, although not equally so to the case of the other; for it it is to be kept in mind, that our Church possesses an authorized English version, whilst the Roman Catholic Church has, strictly speaking, none. From the time of James the First to the present day, our version has uniformly exhibited the same text, whereas the text of the Roman Catholic version has varied in almost every successive impression. A clergyman of the Established Church (whose printed letter to Dr. Murray we have the honour of transmitting with this letter, in support of our assertion) has shown, from a collation of six Roman Catholic editions of the New Testament in the English tongue, all of them sanctioned by high official authority, that the Church of Rome possesses no standard English text. Four of these editions have been printed in Dublin since the year 1802,—two of them under the immediate superintendence of Dr. Murray; and it appears from the various readings which they exhibit, that successive prelates scruple not to exercise a discretionary power of altering the text of the English version, unrestricted by the critical judgment of their predecessors; so that even some parts of the English translation, which were condemned by their controversial writers “as heretical corruptions,” have been without fear received into the recent Roman Catholic edition*. It is presumed, therefore, that in adopting the text of the selection prepared by the Protestant Authorities, the Roman Catholic Bishops would not offend the religious prepossessions of the children of their own communion, since no objection has been raised to the impartiality with which our volume has been compiled; and since the version adopted by us, as to the selected passages, does not, it is probable, differ more widely from the present Roman Catholic text, as to the same passages, than that text differs from the Rhemish version. It may not, however, be useless for us here to remark, for the information of your Board, that in the work submitted by us to the Commissioners, the authorized version of the Bible has been adopted, because it is the authorized version; and because as such, it is the medium through which we consider ourselves bound to convey scriptural information to the people. We have also adopted that version, from a well-founded belief of its accuracy; still, if the objections to our compilation are confined to its having been taken exclusively and verbatim from the Protestant version, and to the possibility thence arising of passages being found in it at variance with the authentic version of the Romish Church (whatever may be the import of the term “authentic,”) we are disposed, so far as our obligations as Ministers of the Established Church, responsible to the supreme authority of the State, will permit us, to meet such objections with the utmost candour, and with the largest allowances. You will be pleased to observe, that the point on which we mainly insist, is an adequate representation of revealed Truth being exhibited to the youthful mind in the way of national instruction; a representation not resting for its basis on the declaration of any particular Church, or set of men, but on the warrant of the written word of God. This, sir, is the ground taken by the Bishops of the Established Church. These are the fundamental principles upon which alone can be formed a compilation of scriptural instruction worthy of being adopted in a system of National Education, which the Lord Primate seems to have endeavoured to enforce in his letter of the 28th of August 1826. Entertaining these sentiments, and deeply impressed with a sense of our responsibility as the guardians of the national religion, and superintendents of national instruction, we suggest to your Board the propriety of obtaining from the Roman Catholic Prelates, previous to the reception of any new proposal, an explicit answer as to their willingness or unwillingness to recommend the use of our compilation in the National Schools, with such modifications as may be agreed upon. But it must be obvious to every unbiassed mind, that until the principles upon which our book is formed have been recognized, it will be a mere waste of time to enter into a detailed discussion respecting particular alterations. In the mean time, we have no hesitation in frankly stating the opinion we entertain of the Tract again submitted to us with very slight alterations; our unanimous judgment is, that it is unfit to be adopted as the book of scriptural instruction, “to be used in the general education which the children would receive in common,” in the proposed National Schools. It purports not, in the form in which we have seen it, to rest its authority on the basis of the written Word of God; it is merely a course of Christian Lessons, which, from any thing that appears, might have been derived from a source different from that of the Holy Scriptures.

* The edition here referred to is that printed in 1826 by our direction, with the concurrence of Dr. Murray, as stated in the early part of this Report.

(Note by the Commissioners.)

Scriptures. Considered even as what from its title it professes to be, it is meagre and incomplete in its exposition of scriptural facts, precepts and doctrines; it is, moreover, compiled with a manifest want of that fairness of selection which we are fully persuaded characterizes our compilation. It is not necessary on the present occasion to enter more fully into the comparative merits or demerits of the two works now before you, although we are far from feeling any disinclination to point out more particularly our objections to the Roman Catholic work. We consider it, however, sufficient for the information of your Board, and all that the Commissioners expect from us at present, most earnestly, but respectfully, to represent, that we should consider it as a dereliction of our duty, and a betraying of the solemn trust reposed in us, to sanction the use of "the Christian Lessons," or of any tract composed on similar principles, as an adequate means of conveying the scriptural information necessary to be acquired by the children of both Churches on a common system of National Education. Throughout the correspondence which the Lord Primate has held with your Board upon this subject, there has been manifested a disposition, in which we cordially participate, to fulfil the benign intentions of the Legislature, and to co-operate, as far as a sense of duty will permit, with the laborious endeavours of the Commissioners; but we are compelled to remark, that whilst your Board are devoting their attention to the great object which they have in view, and before the result of their exertions is known, the Roman Catholic Prelates in Ireland have not scrupled to enter into resolutions which take the power of arrangement out of your hands, and preclude all hope of establishing any system of National Education, except one that shall be in accordance with their own pretensions; for it is but too apparent, that the resolutions which the Lord Primate quoted in his letter of the 28th of August 1826, and to which it is therefore sufficient for us to allude, would, if carried into practice, entirely change the relative situation of the two Churches, by transferring to the Roman Catholic Clergy that superintendence over National Education, which is now by law committed to the Clergy of the Established Church. In your letter to the Archbishop of Dublin, we perceive, indeed, that you are desirous that Dr. Murray's tract should be taken into consideration, independently of all regard to the resolutions in question; but in our view of the subject, we are under the necessity of expressing to you our conviction, that, as has been strongly stated by the Lord Primate, these resolutions oppose an effectual barrier to the attainment of the object for which your Board has been constituted. The Established Church, it is true, may be cast down from that station of pre-eminence to which she has been raised by the wisdom and piety of our ancestors, but her Clergy will never consent, by an acquiescence in these resolutions of the Roman Catholic Bishops, to become the instruments of her degradation.

Sir,—I have the honour to sign the within answer to your letter in the name, and at the request, of the Archbishops and Bishops of the Established Church in Ireland, assembled in Dublin on this 22d day of February 1827, and to subscribe myself your obedient servant,

John G. Armagh.

Frankland Lewis, Esq.

In pursuance of the suggestion contained in the foregoing letter, we felt it right to bring the subject once more under the consideration of the Roman Catholic Prelates, and for that purpose the following letter was addressed to the Most Reverend Doctor Murray by the Chairman of the Board:—

(16.) Letter from T. Frankland Lewis, Esq. to the Most Reverend Doctor Murray; dated St. James's-place, London, 14th April 1827.

Most Reverend Sir,

On the receipt of the letter which you did me the honour of addressing to me on the 20th of December last, the Commissioners transmitted a copy of it (together with the work which had accompanied it, called "Christian Lessons," to the Prelates of the Established Church.

The Commissioners have since received, through the Lord Primate, a communication from the Prelates of the Established Church, in which, amongst other matter, they express themselves as follows:—We suggest to your Board "the propriety of obtaining from the Roman Catholic Prelates, previous to the reception of any new " proposal,

1225

“ proposal, an explicit answer as to their willingness or unwillingness to recommend the use of our compilation in the National Schools, with such modifications as may be agreed upon.”

The Commissioners, feeling it to be their duty to leave nothing undone which could enable them to effect the object they have been so desirous of accomplishing, beg leave to submit to you the question thus suggested to them by his Grace, for the reply of the Roman Catholic Prelates; and in order to enable you clearly to understand the points towards which they are particularly desirous of drawing your attention, they beg leave to enclose an extract* from the communication from the Lord Primate, to which they have referred.

I have the honour to be, Most Reverend Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

The Most Reverend Doctor Murray.

* Extract from the Letter of his Grace the Lord Primate, on behalf of the Archbishops and Bishops of the Established Church in Ireland, addressed to Frankland Lewis, Esq.; dated 22d February 1827.

To the foregoing letter Doctor Murray returned the following answer :—

(17.) Letter from the Most Reverend Doctor Murray to T. Frankland Lewis, Esq. ; dated Dublin, 19th April 1827.

Dear Sir,

I have been honoured with your letter of the 14th instant, intimating a wish to receive an answer to the suggestion contained in the following communication, addressed to your Board by the Prelates of the Established Church : “ We suggest “ to your Board the propriety of obtaining from the Roman Catholic Prelates, “ previous to the reception of any new proposal, an explicit answer as to their “ willingness or unwillingness to recommend the use of our compilation in the “ National Schools, with such modifications as may be agreed upon.”

On the subject of this communication I did hope that you would be saved the trouble of making further inquiry, as all reasonable ground of doubt appeared to me to be removed by my letter of the 17th July and 26th December of last year. I can, however, have no difficulty in stating anew, in terms, if possible, more explicit than I did before, that the Roman Catholic Prelates objected to the compilation in question, on the ground that it is composed of passages taken exclusively and verbatim from the Protestant translation of the New Testament ; and that so long as it shall continue to retain that character, they will not recommend the use of it in the National Schools, under any modification which it can assume.

I will avail myself of this opportunity to express an opinion, which you will not, I am sure, consider at variance with that respect which I sincerely entertain for the Board of Education Inquiry ; it is, that the Board has created for itself a very needless difficulty, by requiring, as a matter of necessity, any scriptural compilation to be used in Schools for the purpose of general instruction. Were the religious instruction of the children confided wholly to the care of their respective pastors, what appears to be the only remaining ground of disagreement would be removed ; and the rest of the plan suggested by the Commissioners might, without any difficulty, be carried into immediate and extensive operation.

I pray you to accept the assurance of that perfect esteem with which I have the honour to be,

Dear Sir,

Your's very faithfully,

D. Murray.

T. Frankland Lewis, Esq.
&c. &c. &c.

Under all the circumstances detailed in the preceding statement, we feel ourselves at length under the necessity of reporting to your Excellency, that we are unable to carry into effect that experiment on the plan of Education recommended in our First Report to His Majesty, which your Excellency had been pleased to confide of the term ‘ authentic, ’) we are disposed, so far as our obligations as Ministers of the Established Church, responsible to the supreme authority of the State, will permit us, to meet such objections with the utmost candour, and with the largest allowances. You will be pleased to observe, that the point on which we mainly insist is an adequate representation of revealed Truth being exhibited to the youthful mind in the way of national instruction ; a representation not resting for its basis on the declaration of any particular Church or set of men, but on the warrant of the written Word of God. This, Sir, is the ground taken by the Bishops of the Established Church. These are the fundamental principles upon which alone can be formed a compilation of scriptural instruction worthy of being adopted in a system of National Education, which the Lord Primate seems to have endeavoured to enforce in his letter of the 28th of August 1826. Entertaining these sentiments, and deeply impressed with a sense of our responsibility as the guardians of the national religion, and superintendents of national instruction, we suggest to your Board the propriety of obtaining from the Roman Catholic Prelates, previous to the reception of any new proposal, an explicit answer as to their willingness or unwillingness to recommend the use of our compilation in the National Schools, with such modifications as may be agreed upon. But it must be obvious to every unbiassed mind, that until the principles upon which our book is formed have been recognized, it will be a mere waste of time to enter into a detailed discussion respecting particular alterations. In the mean time, we have no hesitation in frankly stating the opinion we entertain of the Tract again submitted to us, with very slight alterations : our unanimous judgment is, that it is unfit to be adopted as the book of scriptural instruction, ‘ to be used in the general education which the children would receive in common ’ in the proposed National Schools.”

confide to our hands. It is only by a careful review of the correspondence which has taken place upon the subject, and of the examinations of the four Roman Catholic Archbishops, which will be found in the Appendix, that the grounds can be ascertained of the objections which have been taken to the several volumes which have been under our consideration.

We have now the honour to submit to your Excellency's consideration the several Works to which we have referred.

Your Excellency will observe, that in the last communication which we received from the Prelates of the Established Church, it is strongly insisted upon, that "an adequate representation of revealed Truth should be exhibited to the youthful mind in the way of national instruction."

In this principle we have throughout most fully concurred, and have earnestly laboured to give it effect.

We have so repeatedly stated, and so fully explained, that the volume in the nature of a Harmony of the Gospels, and the two volumes of extracts from the Old Testament referred to in our Minutes of Conversation with the Roman Catholic Archbishops on the 8th January 1825, were recommended by us to be used in addition to the Scriptures themselves, and not as a substitute for them, that we trust no misapprehension can exist in any quarter upon that point.

It is necessary for us to state with respect to the Resolutions of the Roman Catholic Bishops, bearing date the 21st January 1826, that we felt it our duty not to suffer them in any way to obstruct or interfere with us in the course which we were pursuing. They have little or no reference to the preparation of the books, with which alone we have been hitherto occupied; and it was our intention to apply ourselves to the adjustment of whatever difficulties should impede our course as they might successively arise; but having in the first instance been unable to obtain the concurring sanction of the Established Church, and of the Prelates of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, to such volumes as were indispensable for the execution of our plan, we trust your Excellency will approve of our having desisted from all further attempts to carry it into execution.

We think it necessary to explain, that it was our intention, before finally recommending any of the volumes in question for adoption in the Schools, to have submitted them to the consideration of the Presbyterian Clergy in Ireland, through the medium of their respective Moderators. Under the circumstances, however, which it has now been our duty to detail, it has become unnecessary for us to pursue that course.

Your Excellency has been pleased from time to time to order various applications made by individuals for Aid towards the establishment of Schools, to be referred to us for our consideration. We have thought it our duty to direct these papers to be returned to the office of the Chief Secretary, from which they have been successively transmitted to us.

London, 18th May 1827.

WE trust that the foregoing Report to his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant has explained, with sufficient clearness, the course of proceeding adopted by us, in consequence of the communication from his Excellency, to which we have already referred.

As the introduction of a Volume, containing copious extracts from the Scriptures*, into the Schools of general literary instruction formed an essential part of the plan we

* As the two compilations called Scripture Lessons and Christian Lessons have not been published, we have thought proper to insert them in the Appendix.

we had originally recommended, our inability to obtain the necessary sanction to such a compilation has prevented us from proceeding further with the experiment we had been directed to try.

We regret, therefore, that we have had no opportunity of ascertaining, whether that plan would have been found, in other parts of its details, to answer the expectations we had formed of it.

We were required by the express terms of the Commission, entrusted to our charge, to consider of the best means of extending to all classes of Your Majesty's subjects in Ireland the benefits of Education. In the interval which has elapsed since the presentation of our First Report, our attention has been closely fixed upon the means of effecting that object; and we have seen nothing which has induced us to change the general opinions we expressed in that Report, although many difficulties have presented themselves to our notice, which threatened to oppose serious obstacles in the way of the detailed execution of our Plan.

We are still of opinion, that for the Children of the lower orders in Ireland, a system of separate Education would be found to be pregnant with evils; that it would tend to increase, rather than to diminish, that distinctness of feeling between persons of different religious persuasions, which is already too prevalent; and we think it therefore most desirable, that a system should be adopted, under which the Children might imbibe similar ideas, and form congenial habits, and from which suspicion should, if possible, be banished, and the causes of distrust and jealousy be effectually removed.

We are of opinion, also, that no system of Education can be considered as deserving of that name, which shall not seek to lay the foundations of all moral obligation in religious instruction; but as the difference of their respective Tenets renders it difficult for children to receive religious instruction together, we still think that no better course can be adopted than that of uniting children of the different persuasions, for the purpose of instructing them in the general objects of literary knowledge, and of providing facilities for their instruction separately, when the difference of religious belief renders it impossible for them any longer to learn together.

Although we have failed in the attempt to combine religious with literary instruction to the extent originally contemplated by us, we still think that object may, to a limited extent, be effected.

Of the detail of the arrangements which would be found most effectual for the objects we have suggested, and least objectionable in practice, we are unable to express a more definite opinion than that contained in our First Report, as nothing but the test of actual experiment could have enabled us to do so. We beg leave, however, to refer to certain Regulations, which were prepared for discussion shortly after we undertook to try the experiment we have alluded to, and which, though never fully agreed upon, or finally adopted by the Board, may serve to show the views which were under the consideration of the Commissioners as to the mode of carrying their Plan into effect.

If we have not succeeded in disengaging the subject of general Education in Ireland from the embarrassments with which it was surrounded when the Inquiry was committed to our charge, we trust that the information we have collected may lead hereafter to more satisfactory results.

MINUTES of a Conversation between His Majesty's Commissioners of Education Inquiry and the Most reverend Dr. Murray, one of the Archbishops of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland.

Board of Education Inquiry, Dublin,
Thursday, 16th Dec. 1824.

Minute,
16th December
1824.

THE Commissioners being desirous of ascertaining the views of Dr. Murray, and of the Roman Catholic Clergy in Ireland, on some important points connected with a general plan of Education, stated to Dr. Murray that they were anxious to establish such a system as should unite children of all religious denominations in the same schools, except when it should become unavoidably necessary to separate them for the purpose of religious instruction.

They observed, that they considered this a point of great importance to the interests of the state, as it was only by training up the youth of all persuasions in habits of early intercourse and attachment, that they could hope to establish among them those reciprocal charities upon which the peace and harmony of society must depend.

The Commissioners then stated that they could not consider any system of education as deserving that name, which should not seek to lay the foundations of all moral obligation in religious instruction, and that with respect to the religious instruction of Roman Catholic children, they were anxious to ascertain the sentiments of Dr. Murray, and of the Roman Catholic Clergy.

They therefore inquired whether there would be any objection to common literary instruction being received by Roman Catholics, as well from a Protestant as a Roman Catholic master, and whether religious instruction could be given to the Roman Catholics by a Roman Catholic layman, approved of by the proper Roman Catholic pastor.

Dr. Murray stated that there could be no possible objection to Roman Catholics receiving literary instruction from a Protestant, nor to their receiving religious instruction from a Roman Catholic layman, approved of by the proper Roman Catholic pastor; and he added, that the providing of proper persons for such purpose would be a great relief to the Roman Catholic Clergy.

The Commissioners then suggested that schools might be established, in each of which there should be both a Protestant and Roman Catholic lay teacher, by whom education in common might be administered; so that the children, united in the same classes, should learn from the same masters, and use the same books; that for the remuneration of such teachers adequate means might be provided; that the Roman Catholic teacher might assist in the general literary instruction, and might give separate religious instruction to the Roman Catholic children, subject to the direction of their pastors; and that the school-room, for a reasonable portion of time, on one or two days in the week, might be appropriated exclusively to that object.

In these suggestions for uniting Protestant and Roman Catholic children in literary, and separating them only for religious instruction, Dr. Murray expressed his concurrence.

The Commissioners then observed that separate religious instruction should not commence until the difference of religious belief should make it impossible for instruction any longer to be received in common, and they inquired whether it would be objected to on the part of the Roman Catholic Clergy, that the more advanced of the Protestant and Roman Catholic children should, at certain times, during school-hours, read portions of the Holy Scriptures together, and in the same classes, but out of their respective versions, subject to proper regulations, and in the presence of their respective Protestant and Roman Catholic teachers, suggesting at the same time, that opportunities might be afforded to the teachers of each persuasion to explain to the children separately the portions so read.

Dr. Murray, answered, that serious difficulties would exist in the way of such an arrangement, and in lieu of it, he proposed that the Holy Scriptures should be used only when the Roman Catholic children should be taken apart for the purpose of receiving religious instruction, and he said that there could be no possible objection to the Roman Catholic children then reading out of the sacred volume itself the gospels and epistles of the week; he added, that no objection would be made to an harmony of the gospels being used in the general education, which the children should receive in common, nor to a volume containing extracts from the Psalms, Proverbs, and the Book of Ecclesiasticus; nor to a volume, containing the History of the Creation, of the Deluge, of the Patriarchs, of Joseph, and of the deliverance of the Israelites, extracted from the Old Testament, and that he was satisfied no difficulties in arranging the details of such works would arise on the part of the Roman Catholic Clergy.

The Commissioners then stated, that they considered it of the utmost moment that no books or catechisms should be admitted, either in the course of the literary or religious instruction, containing matter calculated to excite contempt, hatred, or any uncharitable feeling in any class towards persons of a different religious persuasion.

To this Dr. Murray cordially assented.

Minute,
7th January
1824.

The Commissioners having had an interview this day with the most Reverend Doctors Curtis, Murray, Kelly and Laffan, the four Archbishops of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, the Minute of the 16th December last was read, and it was explained, that the passage which related to the separate religious instruction of Roman Catholics, meant, that the proper Roman Catholic pastors should have the right of being present upon these occasions, and giving such religious instruction as they should think proper, and that what was said of masters applied also to mistresses; the Archbishops who were not present on the 16th, expressed a wish to consider the matter until to-morrow.

The Roman Catholic Archbishops mentioned above, having met the Commissioners this day, expressed their concurrence in the views already expressed by Dr. Murray.

+ ROBERT LAFFAN, D. D.

Upon the occasion of the preceding Minute being signed by the Roman Catholic Archbishops on the 8th of January 1825, a conversation took place between the Archbishops and the Commissioners, of which a memorandum was made at the time, from which the following are extracts:

(Dr. Murray.) With regard to a harmony, or any other work that might be selected, it appears to be the wish of these gentlemen (prelates) that any thing given in the shape of scripture, should be in the Douay version for the Catholic children, but any thing else that does not bear the name of the scriptures, it is immaterial which it is taken from; for instance, the little work, the History of Joseph and the Creation, is an admirable thing for the use of all; but with regard to the Psalms, which are a good deal in use among our people, for instance, in the office for Holy Week, they are in the hands of every body: there is one-third of the Psalter in the Douay version; there should be different versions of that; if you could have the very same selections there given, which are very fine, and very good selections, according to our version, we should be grateful for it; we think it highly useful; the Psalms, Proverbs, and Ecclesiasticus, containing precepts of high morality and great devotion, which we should be as anxious as any people in the world to inculcate in the country.

(Dr. Kelly.) Any thing given as scripture from a version not authorized by us, would be objectionable.

(Dr. Curtis.) Would it not be possible that on both sides we should agree on a certain paraphrase that should alter the text very little, and possibly keep up the spirit, which should not be in the opinion of either Protestants or Roman Catholics the scriptures, but a paraphrase as close as possible.

(Dr. Curtis.) We agree that the version of the Established Church in general is a very noble version, a very fine work, in very fine language, and surpasses ours by far in point of language, because it is in the nature of a paraphrase, and does not adhere so strictly as ours does to the letter of the original: wherever you translate, adhering to the letter of the original, the language will never be very fine; it must savour too much of the language from which it is translated; we say we cannot take that liberty of paraphrasing the scriptures; you may make it more palatable, but it is not the scriptures; if you give a different turn to a phrase it may sound better, but it is not the scriptures, it is not what was said; we cannot take it, and have not done it, but we have all of us in our controversial works praised the translation of the Established Church; it is a very fine translation; very fine and very good language, harmonized more than ours: our people could not do it so; they said we could do it, but it would not be the scriptures.

(Dr. Curtis.) I should imagine that a very good paraphrase might be made of the Life and Doctrines of Christ, that did not profess to follow either the Vulgate or the Protestant translation, or the ancient originals; would it not be possible to go over that book, to put it into the hands of Roman Catholics and Protestants to be improved; the book must be capable of improvement, and they should agree upon some book or other: any thing more than a paraphrase, in which we all agree, cannot be admitted without offence, we would rather be without such a thing; I do not see any danger or difficulty in the thing itself, but there is a danger of it being misunderstood.

Appendix, N° 2.

Minutes of Evidence taken before the Commissioners of Education Inquiry, at Dublin, Friday, 16th December 1825.

THOMAS FRANKLAND LEWIS, Esq. M. P. in the Chair.

The Most Reverend Dr. Curtis, the Most Reverend Dr. Murray, the Most Reverend Dr. Kelly, the Most Reverend Dr. Laffan, were examined as follows :

I BELIEVE in our letter you were apprised that at the desire of the Lord Lieutenant we had undertaken to superintend the establishment of a certain number of schools in different parts of Ireland, in which the plan we have recommended in our First Report may be submitted to the test of experiment, in order to ascertain whether the regulations proposed will answer their object. The first step necessary in the arrangement of that plan is to decide upon the books to be used in the general instruction of the children; and we have given you the trouble to meet us here that we may enter into the details of the arrangement, the outline of which was agreed to by the four Roman Catholic Archbishops in the month of January last; the passage in the Minutes of our conference on that occasion to which I refer, I will now read, "Dr. Murray added, that no objection would be made to a harmony of the gospels being used in the general education which the children should receive in common, nor to a volume containing extracts from the Psalms, Proverbs, and Book of Ecclesiasticus, nor to a volume containing the History of the Creation, of the Deluge, of the Patriarchs, of Joseph, and of the Deliverance of the Israelites, extracted from the Old Testament, and that he was satisfied no difficulties in arranging the details of such works would arise on the part of the Roman Catholic Clergy." I wish to state that we have considered a great variety of works of the kind that is described here as a Harmony of the Gospels, and the one which appears to us to be the simplest and the least open to objection is Dr. White's Diatessaron; it is a summary originally compiled in the Greek text of what is stated in the four Evangelists, interwoven in one connected narrative, but broken into short sections, and carefully arranged according to the chronology of the events recorded; we proposed to omit the present title, the preface, and the notes, and we wish now to know whether there are any passages in the text to which you object, on the ground of their being translated in a manner that may appear to you to be inadmissible?—(Dr. Curtis.) The time has been very short, and not sufficient to allow us to examine fairly into the merits of the work; however, from the little we have seen of it, we have consulted among ourselves, and we mentioned to Dr. Murray the result of our reflections; may I beg of Dr. Murray to mention what he heard from us?—(Dr. Murray.) The Prelates seem to have the same delicacy which I had the honour of expressing when I was last before this Board, with regard to giving any sanction to a book of general interest to which many persons not now present might object; these gentlemen would wish to have an opportunity of consulting the other Bishops. It is a most important matter to agree upon any thing like a harmony of the gospels, and to give to the people any thing in the shape of the Word of God without a minute examination; we wish, therefore, to have an opportunity of consulting the other Bishops. We can have a meeting by the middle of next month, when the trustees of Maynooth College are to assemble, and they can then communicate their own sentiments, and have a communication with this Board, if it should be deemed advisable.

The object in asking the question was not to obtain from yourselves a general sanction to any particular work, but to ascertain your own individual opinions whether there is any thing in the book particularly referred to which appears to you to be objectionable?—As it is a book of a religious character, and to be in general use in the schools established under the superintendence of this Board, a book to be thus in general use among the children of the Catholics of Ireland, these prelates deem it advisable not to give an opinion upon the subject without having an opportunity of consulting with the other Bishops.—(Dr. Curtis.) Our own opinion, if we were pressed to give it before we can consult our friends, would certainly be unfavourable to the work. The aspect of the book and the manner of expression in it would render it absolutely inadmissible. There is no manner of doubt upon that; for my part, I could not venture to approve of a book which goes to contradict any part of that version which we recommend to our people,—it is the Bible expressed in a certain form,—it is something expressed and explained in the words of the Bible,—it is the Scripture read in a general meeting of the children of different persuasions,—it is a Bible lecture given to them where we exclude the Bible ourselves. The intention expressed by the Board at the outset was, that there should be no instruction of a religious nature mixed with the general literary education.

You are aware that it does not differ from the Evangelical Life of Christ, except being taken from a different version, and not containing so much matter?—It is a different version, but it is also a Protestant who speaks in it on religious matters to Catholics, which never can be permitted. We never can permit any but a Roman Catholic to do that. If any thing like a History of the Bible, or if the substance of the Bible could be given, it would be avoiding the above difficulty in some manner; but we are not to speak of this as we should of any other historical matter; we should talk of it with very great reverence. The Life of Christ by Murphy is much more extensive than that; it is a very excellent thing; it employs the words of scripture, but they are accommodated by the author, and he is a Catholic; and none but a Catholic we wish should explain the scriptures to them; if religious instruction is to be given before Catholic children, it must be by a Catholic. We do not wish it should be done at all in the general instruction, but in the private instruction alone; but if it is done, it must be by a Catholic; it must not be read to them by any other person, not even the Lord's Prayer; it is a thing we will not permit.

Are we to understand that those observations would go so far as to apply to the Evangelical Life of Christ as it stands at present?—They apply to every thing; we admit a harmony, but if it is read or explained to the Catholic children, it must be by a Catholic; we never did consent, and we never could consent to any thing short of that; we should be censured in the most severe terms if we submitted to any thing of the kind; I never can consent to it.

The Board wish to understand what it is would constitute a Roman Catholic harmony of the gospels. We should be disposed to believe that a fair impartial version of the Vulgate would be to all intents and purposes a Catholic harmony?—(Dr. Curtis.) This work is not in the words of the Vulgate; it must be in the words of the Vulgate, even in the passages not subject to controversy, and then there might be some such compilation permitted; but any thing read before Catholic children must be taken from the Catholic version, even if read to other children in their presence.

Is it meant that it should be a fair bonâ fide translation of the Vulgate?—Yes; but a good translation, that gives the Bible according to our sense of it, will not do; such translation might be more classical and pleasing, but it would not be our translation, and we cannot propose any other as the scripture; it is proposed here as scripture, and it must be in the words of the Vulgate; we cannot permit any other to be used as scripture.

Do you hold that the sense of the Vulgate cannot be fairly rendered in any other words than those which now constitute the Douay translation?—No; there may to-morrow be a better translation, as you conceive, of your own translation; you do not say, but that in a few years time there may be a better translation approved of by the Church of England; and we say the same, but it must be approved of by the Church at large, and by the Church of Ireland; there is now but one approved translation of the Bible, and it is in the hands of every body; it is copied into all the different books of devotion; authors never make free with the words of scripture; they quote them, and they afterwards occasionally give their own annotations, and the people have those scriptural words by heart; and if they saw or heard of any text proposed to them in different words, although the sense were the same, it would not be well received; the words must be the same as those of our translation: it may be asked, could not there be another translation of the scriptures? Yes, there may, but there is not at present. Could there not be another translation for the Church of England? To be sure there might, but there is not now.

When you use the expression in the answer you have given us, "the Vulgate," you mean the Douay version of the Vulgate?—Yes; the common people know nothing of the Latin Vulgate, but as it is given to them in the translation, and we must not give them another translation. In our version it is said, "John was preaching the baptism of Penance," you say "the baptism of Repentance;" one child says, "this is not what I was taught;" but the other says, "it is an improvement." We should never think of proposing a Protestant version to the Catholic children.

That goes to a particular text, which we might deal with in a special manner?—At the head of one chapter it is said, "Jesus institutes the eating of bread and drinking of wine in remembrance of his body crucified;" is it possible you can suppose we could permit that to be proposed to a Roman Catholic child; that is at the head of one of the chapters; read that and put your hand upon your heart and say whether that could be proposed to the Catholic children.

We wish to be distinctly understood, in directing your attention to this work, to allude to the text of the work only, and not to the heading of the chapters; we never thought of retaining either them or the notes?—There must be some heading to the chapters.

If there was no disagreement upon the subject of the text of the work, we should soon agree as to the heading of the chapters?—Surely, it is infinitely better to tell you what we feel, than to conceal our feelings.

It certainly never was the intention of any person in the Commission, in discussing this work, to imply that any thing in the shape of comment or abbreviated description of what it contained should be retained; it is quite impossible that a Roman Catholic Commissioner could agree to the suggesting a work that taught doctrines even implying any thing contrary to those of his own church, and it may be right further to suggest that the work was submitted to you, in order that you might suggest any possible emendations that might occur to you, the Commissioners having suggested of themselves in the first instance such passages as according to the state of their information they conceived to comprise the differences differences between the Protestant and Roman Catholic Churches; but it was never intended that the heading of the chapters or the notes should be retained, and Dr. Murray must have collected that nothing was to stand as note or comment that could be objectionable to any sect of Christians?—(Dr. Murray.) Certainly.

All matters of this nature it was our intention to have made the subject of discussion?—(Dr. Curtis.) When minor objections are brought forward, such as the difference between “highly favoured” and “full of grace,” I wish to God Almighty it had never been raised: they seem to be the same thing; as to “penance” and “repentance,” that may be very easily settled.

Is there any difference in translation between the authorized version of the Established Church, and the Douay translation of the Vulgate as to the passage establishing the Sacrament of the Lord’s Supper?—(Dr. Murray.) There is a small difference; the collocation too of that passage, “I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine,” seems intended to explain the words of consecration in a sense different from the Catholic doctrine. A different collocation was adopted by one of the Evangelists, who appears to have recorded the words of our Saviour in the order in which they were uttered.

The subjects that were under our consideration last year, having been very fully deliberated upon, and the whole matter having been very fully discussed, before the Minute of the 8th January was made, which is entered upon our Report, the Commissioners wish to ask, what work was in Dr. Curtis’s contemplation as a harmony of the gospels, when last year it was agreed that such a work could without difficulty be arranged for the use of children in schools, for general instruction?—(Dr. Curtis.) More or less, such a work as Murphy’s, which was proposed at that time; that might be very acceptable; there might be some annotations to be corrected, but such a work as that would meet with no objection; the words of scripture there put down are the words of the Vulgate, and not only the Vulgate but the Douay version; we conceive that such a harmony as that could be given to the Catholic children; whether it should be given to the Protestant children we do not say—we are not asked upon that subject: but to the Catholic children such a work as that might be given; we had rather that something of that sort should be given than nothing; but the titles, the heading and phraseology, and every thing must be done in a Catholic way, which never can be the case with the book now submitted to us; no one can ever make that book answer our purpose to be read before Catholic children.

Are you aware that the work to which you have alluded as prepared by Mr. Murphy, of which you approve, contains no words except such as are to be found in the four Evangelists, and differs from the Diatessaron only in this respect, that it is expressed more fully?—I believe it contains none. I do not say but that some things might be abridged or made better; it is a work that has obtained a good deal of approbation among our people, and they know it pretty well already. We were talking a good deal yesterday about “penance” and “penitence:”—“penitence” may be a better word than “penance,” but we could not substitute one word for the other; if on some future occasion there should be a better translation of the Vulgate than the Douay, we may take it.

Will you give me leave to draw your attention to the other works mentioned in the Minute, and which were last year submitted to your consideration, namely, a volume that contains extracts from the Psalms, Proverbs, and Book of Ecclesiasticus, and a volume containing the History of the Creation, of the Deluge, of the Patriarchs, of Joseph, and the Deliverance of the Israelites, taken from the Old Testament; does it appear to you there would be any objection to either of those works?—No; they are to be given in the words of scripture, or in the words of the author, as Mr. Reeves does pretty fully. If the author adopts the sense, and accommodates the words to his own ideas, it is not the scripture at all, it is only the substance; but if we profess to give the words of scripture, they must be the very words of scripture, and no other.

The books in question were specifically submitted to the archbishops, upon the occasion of our meeting last year, and it appears, upon the most cursory inspection of them, that they are wholly couched in the words of scripture. The Minute of the 8th of January expressly states that; that therefore precludes all idea of their being compiled as mere histories from any other sources, or in any other shape than scripture?—There is no manner of doubt that Murphy sets out upon the idea of making use of the words of scripture.

We are now speaking of two works extracted from the Old Testament—we should wish to know, whether it is your view that they could be adopted in schools of general instruction?—Certainly; there could be no difficulty at all if they are in the words of the Douay version; if they are not, they cannot be used; in one of them they are given as selections from scripture; and as far as they go they are the scriptures themselves, and the scriptures themselves can never be read before our children, except according to our own version; according to the Vulgate, for those who understand the Vulgate, but for those who do not, and all ignorant people do not, it must be according to the Douay version, which is the only one we make use of; we do not say there could not be a better.

The fact being, that those two books (the subject of the present question) are compiled in the language of the authorized version, but not involving, as we suppose, according to our present information, any point in dispute between the two Churches; are we to understand that you consider them admissible or inadmissible in schools of general instruction?—Inadmissible, even if they are upon the most innocent points in the world, if they are not in the self-same words as our own version; take for instance the first chapter of St. John, “In the beginning was the Word.” (Dr. Murray.) Dr. Curtis does not object to extracts. As to the History of Joseph, it does not purport to be in the words of scripture.

Doctors
Curtis, Murray,
Kelly and Laffan,

It is right to observe, that though it does not purport to be taken from the scripture, there is not a single word in it that is not to be found in the scriptures in point of fact?—(Dr. Curtis.) As far as that goes it is taken from the scriptures. We thought that there might be nothing at all concerning religion mentioned in the general education, but we saw you had a particular desire that there should be something of that sort, and we agreed to it, and we agree to it still; but we never can agree that any thing should be given as the words of scripture to the common people, but the Douay version.

(To Dr. Murray.) As the book in question has been submitted to you, does any mode occur to you in which it could be used in schools of general instruction, without being objectionable to persons of any religious communion?—In the words of the author, not exactly confining himself to the words of scripture, I think a harmony might be made, containing the life of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. (Dr. Curtis.) I mentioned that yesterday, ten times over.

The Commissioners feel themselves in this situation—they are called upon by the Lord Lieutenant to carry into execution the plan they have recommended, and it forms a part of the plan that they have suggested, the use of a harmony of the gospels arranged from matters contained in the gospels only, and therefore whatever opinion they might have formed upon that subject last year they feel precluded from the consideration of it, except upon the basis of their Report?—(Dr. Murray.) “A harmony” does not imply that the work consists of scripture only. Calmet only introduces the words of scripture occasionally into a work of this kind, and yet he calls it a Harmony of the four Gospels.

The discussion last year had reference to a work called “The Evangelical Life of Christ,” and although it was not determined what mode should be adopted in deciding upon the text, it was understood that that work was not objectionable to the Roman Catholics, as it consisted of the text of the four gospels?—(Dr. Murray.) I conceive that it is not objectionable—that is, Murphy’s Evangelical Harmony.

Is your meaning this, that to a harmony in the words of scripture, provided it be in the words of the authorized Roman Catholic version, there would be no objection; but to any other harmony, professing to be in the words of scripture, there would be an objection?—Yes.

The Commissioners feel it desirable to have a book of this description, that could be used by all the children in common in the schools of general instruction; the Roman Catholic Archbishops must be aware, whatever objection they may make to the text of the authorized version, would be made by the Protestants to the Douay version; there is, therefore, a difficulty to be reconciled in endeavouring to attain the object of getting one book for common use: has it occurred to you, Dr. Murray, that any mode can be pursued, either by the omission of disputed texts, or by any other means, whereby a work could be arranged that would not be objected to by any class?—I think that such a work could be constructed if the object were not to give the exact words of scripture, but to convey the sense of the scripture in the words of the historian.

Supposing a work to be actually and substantially in the words of the Protestant authorized version for instance, but that it did not profess on the face of it to be so, would the objection equally arise?—I think that if any words attributed to our Saviour were given in any other form than that which is set down in the Douay version, an objection would lie against it.

Supposing that the very inconvenient course were adopted of using two versions in the schools, would there be any objection to the Roman Catholic children hearing the authorized version in parallel passages read by the Protestant children?—I fear there would be an objection to it.

And an objection of such a nature as that it would be materially insisted upon, and opposition to the schools caused in consequence?—A feeling would be raised against it throughout the country.

Supposing such passages as differ essentially from the Roman Catholic version and favour the Protestant doctrines rather than the Roman Catholic, were omitted, do you think the objection would exist?—I would allow the writer to give the sense of the passage in his own words.

Supposing it possible that we could undertake to write a history, narrating the mere events recorded in the gospels in any language of our own, does it occur to you that we could venture to state the doctrines of our Saviour in any words except by an immediate translation of the words of the Evangelist; for instance, could it be proposed that we should put the sermon on the Mount in any other language than we find it; would not the undertaking be in fact that of writing a fifth gospel?—We could not undertake to give exactly the sermon on the Mount otherwise than in the words of our Saviour himself.

Should you consider it a harmony of the gospels, if it omitted the sermon on the Mount?—It would not be a perfect harmony, if that important part were omitted.

Would it be equally necessary to omit every other passage of the gospels containing the doctrines of our Saviour?—If given in his own words.

Does not it occur to you there would be no alternative between giving his doctrines in his own words, or omitting all mention of his doctrines?—That constitutes the great difficulty of the thing. It might not have been fully foreseen at the commencement, but it becomes too visible on coming to the detail.

Is it your view that by what was meant by the expression of “a harmony of the gospels,” it was meant to omit the whole of the doctrines delivered by our Saviour?—Certainly not.

Does

Does it occur to you that it would be possible for us to undertake to put any portion of those gospels in any other language than we find it?—Not if you undertake to give it as the language of our Saviour; if you undertake merely to state his doctrines historically, you can. We could easily construct a harmony for ourselves; but when it is insisted that this should be for general instruction, the nearer we view the subject, the more the difficulties seem to increase; particularly since the opinions of the Protestant clergy have been taken, stating that, in their view of the matter, any harmony to be introduced into the schools should be formed at least principally from the authorized version. We should have the same difficulty with regard to the Protestant version that Protestants have with regard to ours.

Where has that opinion been expressed?—By the Archbishop of Dublin.

We should be glad more distinctly to understand whether it is your view of the nature of a harmony of the gospels that it should include or exclude a statement of the doctrines of our Saviour; whether it is to be confined to a mere narration of events; and if not, whether it is to comprise in the whole or in part the doctrines which he delivered?—It should comprise not only the principal circumstances of his life recorded in the gospels, but also the principal part of his moral doctrines.

What kind of harmony do you conceive was referred to in the Minute of the 8th of January?—It was not defined.

Was not the Evangelical Life of Christ by Murphy, including all our Saviour's doctrines, the book in consideration at that time?—It was one of those under consideration; and I should concur in the adoption of that harmony, but not if constructed from the authorized version; and I believe that this would be likewise the opinion of all the other prelates.

Did it occur to you at the time of your agreeing in that Minute, that the harmony you contemplated was to be the Evangelical Life of Christ by Murphy, without any alteration or power of emendation whatsoever on the part of the Protestants?—No, it did not; nor did it occur to me that the harmony was to be formed out of the Protestant version. I supposed that it might be put forth in the language of the writer; and it by no means occurred to me, that when the real words of the text should be occasionally introduced, there would be so strong an objection as there appears to be on the part of Protestants to the use of our version.

Do you conceive it would be possible for Protestants to assent to the use of the Douay version?—I cannot give an opinion upon that subject.

Dr. Murray will recollect one particular expression in that Minute, that no difficulty would arise in the arranging of this harmony on the part of the Roman Catholic clergy: the Commissioners wish to know whether the making it a sine quâ non that the harmony should be compiled from the Douay version of the scripture in omnibus, appears to be in accordance with that statement?—I expressed that as my opinion, without foreseeing all the difficulties which have since arisen.

We should wish particularly to know whether Dr. Murray considers the other two books, namely, "Extracts from the Psalms and the Proverbs, and the Book of Ecclesiasticus," and Extracts from the Patriarchal History, inadmissible for the use of schools of general instruction?—I do not object to the History of Joseph and of the Patriarchs, because it does not purport to be in the words of scripture; it is merely an historical narration of facts. Not having examined it minutely, I am not prepared to say that it does not contain doctrinal points; I believe it does not contain any discriminating doctrinal points.

Have you seen it since last year?—No, I have not.

You will be so good as to observe, that in the title-page there are these words, "Extracted from the Holy Scriptures;" and that though the form of verses is not preserved, there is in fact not the slightest deviation from the language of the authorized version of the scriptures: assuming now that there are no points of doctrine referred to in the passages extracted, we should beg to know whether you conceive it to be admissible or inadmissible in the schools of general instruction?—I conceive it to be admissible; it purports only to be compiled from scripture. As to the other extracts, if they are given as scripture, it must be remembered that we have all along said we could not propose to the children any thing as scripture, except what is taken from our own version.

The title of the book containing those other extracts referred to in the answer is, "Extracts from the Psalms of David, the Proverbs of Solomon, and the Book of Ecclesiasticus, for the use of Schools;" and though there is no intimation in this book as there was in the one last mentioned, that it is taken from the scripture, in point of fact the extracts are all taken from the authorized version: having stated this in respect to the work in question, we beg to ask, whether you consider it to be admissible or inadmissible for the use of schools for general instruction?—I consider a book containing the same extracts from the Douay version to be admissible.

The question is particularly whether the book in its present form, being in point of fact taken from the authorized version of the scriptures, though not announcing itself in the title to be so, is objectionable?—If given as scripture, I should think it objectionable.

Under the circumstances stated, and being requested to look at the title-page, will you have the goodness to state whether you deem that it professes to be given from scripture or not?—It appears to be on a closer inspection given as scripture.

As those books were submitted to you last year, were you then aware of the state in which they were, being in the words of our version?—Perhaps I did not attend to it minutely.

Doctors
Curtis, Murray,
Kelly and Laffan,

1825.

I know that with respect to the Life of Joseph, I stated that I had no objection to it, because it was given merely as a history.

Your objection would not be to a life of Joseph, but to a life of Joseph given in the words of the authorized version?—I do not object to the Life of Joseph at all.

(To Dr. Kelly.) Does it occur to you that any mode can be pointed out in which such a work as the harmony of the gospels, similar in its character to the Evangelical Life of Christ, can be so arranged as to be adapted to the use of children of all denominations in the schools of general instruction?—I think if an evangelical harmony could be compiled which would have the text in perfect conformity with our Vulgate, there would be no objection on our part: the book that has been given to me for inspection I have had very little time to look over, but I have seen enough of it to know, that we could not permit it to be put into the hands of the Catholic children, because in some parts I find that the text is translated in a manner not by any means conformable to our version, and for this reason I object to it.

Does your objection go to the whole of the work on account of it being from the authorized version, or to parts only?—It goes to the work as being a compilation from the authorized version, and not from our version.

And to all parts of it?—Yes, to all parts where there is a departure from the Vulgate.

Do you think that any alterations could be proposed in it that in your view of it would make it a faithful translation of the Vulgate, without going so far as to substitute in its place the whole of the Douay version?—I have seen no English translation of the Vulgate which we consider to be an admissible translation, except the Douay.

And that applies generally to all parts, without reference to particular texts?—Yes, to all parts.

Assuming, for the sake of putting the question, that the word "repentance," wherever it occurs in that book, should be altered to "penance," and that the Doxology should be omitted from the Lord's Prayer, and that the angelic salutation to the Blessed Virgin should be put according to the Douay version, and any other passages relating to the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church as contradistinguished from the doctrines of the Protestant Church, if any such passages do in point of fact occur, were to be altered according to the Roman Catholic views, should you feel that the remainder of the work would be admissible as a harmony for the purposes required. You will observe, according to the conditions supposed in the question, the great body of the text would still be according to the authorized version?—It is my opinion, that in order to make a harmony acceptable to the Catholics it will be necessary not only that particular passages, but that the whole of the translation shall be in conformity with the Vulgate.

Do you mean the Latin Vulgate, or the English Douay?—The translation we approve of is the English Douay; another translation may hereafter be proposed, but it cannot be approved of by us, unless it is in perfect conformity with the Vulgate.

Assuming again that the authorized version should be altered in all places where it is not a translation from the Vulgate, should you have any objection to the great body of the work remaining in its present form of the authorized version in the places in which, according to your own view, you would find it to be a fair translation of the Latin Vulgate?—Where there is a fair translation of the Latin Vulgate, and the authorized version is in perfect conformity with it, I do not object to that part of the version; but I object generally to the authorized version, inasmuch as I conceive that in many essential points it varies from the Vulgate.

Still assuming that the authorized version should be altered in all the places in which it is not a faithful translation of the Vulgate, would it then, having received those alterations, be in your view admissible as a harmony in question?—Without a reference to the authorized translation I should compare the translation with the Vulgate.

(To Dr. Murray.) Is there anything in Dr. Kelly's answers that appears to you to alter the view of the subject as taken by you?—No.

Does not it appear to you to admit of blending the two versions which you appeared to consider as inadmissible?—No; wherever the Vulgate is attended to, we cannot object to it.

Do you not think there are many parts of the authorized version that (as fairly as one language can render the meaning of another) follow the translation of the Vulgate?—Yes; and wherever it is conformable to the Vulgate, I should not object to it in a harmony.

Is it not your impression, that in ninety-nine parts out of one hundred the authorized version is as faithful a translation of the Vulgate as the Douay itself is?—If you give those passages as part of a harmony, there can be no difficulty about it, provided they do not purport to be the words of scripture which the people are accustomed to see.

If a harmony were formed, which harmony should be strictly conformable to the Vulgate, would the circumstance of its being conformable also to the authorized version, be an objection to it?—No, certainly not. Give it as a harmony, and not as the gospel, and there can be no difficulty about it.

If a harmony were formed out of so much of the authorized version as is conformable with the Vulgate, there would be no objection to it?—No, not where the words agree in sense, and are not given as the precise words of Christ.

And in passages which happened altogether to give the very words of Christ, provided they were given in a way conformable to the Vulgate, would you make any objection?—No.

Does

Does not it follow, then, that it is not impracticable so to alter the compilation made out according to the authorized version, as to make it admissible according to your view?—Certainly; if you make a harmony not purporting to be taken from the authorized version, but giving the sense of scripture in your own language, this would, in my view of the matter, be quite admissible.

The question presumed we were not to make use of our own language, but to adopt the language of the authorized version, where not inconsistent with the Vulgate?—If you give it as scripture, it must agree with the Vulgate.

Suppose, for the sake of discussion, that a harmony were given as a work coming from the Commissioners of Education, in which harmony they should adopt the words of the authorized version, so far as they are conformable to the Latin Vulgate, would there be any objection to it?—I would not object to it.

(To Dr. Kelly.) Would you object to it?—I have no objection to any harmony conformable to the Vulgate; if you alter that passage, “Hail, thou that art highly favoured!” to “Hail, Mary, full of grace!” I should have no objection.

(To Dr. Murray.) If a harmony could be formed that should not profess to be a full and perfect abstract of the gospels, and which being so formed, should be conformable to both versions, there would be no objection, it being conformable to the Latin Vulgate?—Just so.

(To Dr. Kelly.) Does not it follow, from the views you have stated to us, that the volume submitted to your consideration is susceptible of such alterations as would make it, according to the views you have stated, perfectly admissible as a harmony?—I think, when it undergoes the corrections which I should think it necessary to introduce in order to make it acceptable to Catholics, it would cease to be what it now is.

Can you give us any idea of the probable extent of those corrections?—I cannot give an exact idea at this moment.

The question went to the probable number?—I have not had time to read over the work to discover all of them; but the principle is to make the book perfectly conformable to our Vulgate.

(To Dr. Laffan.) You have necessarily attended to the statements made by Dr. Kelly; do you concur with him in his opinions?—I do. If the authorized version were to be corrected or altered in every part where it varies or differs from the Vulgate, surely it would cease to be the authorized version; it would be the Vulgate, or the Douay.

Does it occur to you, that in order to make it a just and true translation of the Vulgate, it does require great and extensive alterations?—Yes, I think so; I have not had sufficient time to examine this work minutely.

Is it your opinion, that in order to make it a strict translation of the Latin Vulgate, it should be made agreeable to the Douay?—I do not say but there may be a better translation hereafter, but that at present is our authorized version.

Should you be satisfied with any thing short of rendering a harmony, constructed in the first instance according to the authorized version, strictly conformable by dint of correction to the English Douay?—If the authorized version is strictly conformable to the Douay, it would cease to be the authorized version.

The question is, whether, according to your view, it would be necessary to give it such a quantity of correction as would make it in all respects conformable to the English Douay?—In every part where the authorized version differs from the Vulgate. If the corrections made it agree, it would be our own Douay, or the Vulgate; if it be in the words of scripture, we cannot admit any thing but our own authorized version; if it be only given in the language of the author, in the shape of a history, we have no objection to it in that way.

It appears to the Commissioners that there is some ambiguity between the expression “the Vulgate” and “the Douay;” we wish particularly to learn your opinion as to whether it would be necessary to correct the authorized version to such an extent as to make it in all respects conformable to the English Douay to meet your views?—(Dr. Curtis.) I think there is a great difference in the authority in which we hold the Vulgate and the Douay; but if there was to be a correction, we should wish it should be made in preference according to the Vulgate, rather than the Douay; but there is no English version we look at with so much respect as the Douay.

Will you state to the Commissioners the relative authority you have referred to as existing between the Vulgate and the Douay?—The Vulgate is the authorized version given us by the church, and the Douay is the best representative or interpreter we have of it here.

Has the Douay version ever received the sanction of the Roman Catholic church?—Usage and time have given it a sanction.

Has it ever received the direct sanction of the Roman Catholic church?—Some of the editions have been published under the sanction of the Archbishops here.

Has the Pope, or any authority that you conceive as representing the Roman Catholic church, ever given that sanction?—I believe the church, as represented in this country, has sanctioned it.

But the Roman Catholic church has never sanctioned any work as the scripture, but the Vulgate?—No. (Dr. Kelly.) And we adopt the Douay as coming nearest to it.

Do you consider that a translation from the Vulgate may be faithful, so as to meet your view in its use as a harmony, although it is not literally and verbally the same as the Douay?—(Dr. Laffan.) It is a subject of such moment to a Catholic, that I would not venture to give an opinion upon it without more deliberation. (Dr. Curtis.) I do not believe you asked me any question as to the comparison between the Vulgate and the Douay version, but I believe that these gentlemen when they spoke so much about the Vulgate, and the conformity with the Vulgate, understood by the Vulgate, the Douay translation of the Vulgate. This is a question of giving a book to children in schools where they know nothing about the Latin Vulgate; if we were to have any discussion with the Archbishop of Dublin, or if he was engaged in any polemic dispute, he would put the Douay version on one side and examine the Vulgate; he would go to the original, and there may be texts there that the learned are accustomed to scrutinize and examine according to the Greek and Hebrew, or not according to the Greek and the Hebrew, or the Vulgate; but that is out of the question now, it is a book for the common people and the children, and we must never think of giving them any thing more or less than in the words of the Vulgate, that is, the Vulgate known to them, the Douay version; and any alteration that may be made that might be more conformable to the Latin Vulgate than the Douay translation, as it would be a novelty to them, we are not authorized to do it; so that the conformity must be not only a conformity with the Vulgate, but a conformity with that translation which we have adopted, as the only one at present that is known; we make use of no other.

We understand you to say, that a harmony must, according to your views of it, be conformable not only to the Latin Vulgate, but the Douay translation of it, both in those parts that are important and those parts that are not important?—Yes, both those important and those not important.

Suppose the Commissioners were to prepare a work entitled “the Life of Christ,” or any other title which should be a harmony of the gospels, so far as it went, and which should be rendered conformable to the Latin Vulgate, the work not being given as scripture, but being rendered, notwithstanding that, conformable to the Latin Vulgate as well as to what is called the Protestant version, would there be any objection to such a work being used?—If the words are not used as the words of scripture, none in the world; but if they are expressed so as to show they are taken from scripture, they must not only be conformable to the Vulgate, but conformable to our approved translation of the Vulgate, which is the Douay version. Where you make use of your own language, or use a sentence from scripture here, and there, it may be done, it is not the scripture; you may allude to the scripture and take the sense of it, or take some of the words, but if you signify they are the words of scripture, or if they would be so understood, they must be given according to our translation.

Suppose for the sake of discussion that the Commissioners now, taking not an English translation into their hands, but the Latin Vulgate, were to make what they should consider to be a harmony by a translation from it, would that be objected to as a work to be put into the hands of Roman Catholic children?—Certainly not, if not given in the words of scripture; if given in the words of scripture it must be according to our translation.

Suppose the Commissioners simply published a work which they should call “the Life of Christ,” and which work should be substantially a translation of the Latin Vulgate, but which should not declare in the title page whether it were taken from the scriptures or not, would there be any objection to that?—Not if they are not given as the words of scripture; if they are given in the words of scripture, whether called so or not, they must be in the words of our Douay version.

Could there be any translation suggested of the Vulgate which would not necessarily be put forward in the character of scripture?—I believe not, if a translation; and if a translation, it must be in the very words of our English version, that is what the writers of the Douay have attempted to do, and it cost them a great deal of trouble; it is adopted here, and it is the only one we have. Among people well instructed, not only the Douay version, but even the originals can be brought in and disputed upon; but if you use a book to instruct children, it must be that book they have always been accustomed to read.

Could a book consisting only of extracts from any translation of the Vulgate be received in any other character than scripture in your view of it?—Yes; so that it does not profess to be the words of scripture. We cannot now offer to the people a translation of the Vulgate in any other language or style than that of the translation which has been already authorized among us. If ever another translation should come forward, it must be submitted to the proper authorities; and when once it is approved of, it may be used; but that is not to be done lightly by me, nor by all of us here together.

Have not the different editions of the Douay version varied from each other?—No, certainly not; not of late. There have been corrections made when the language became so obsolete that it was necessary to make some alterations. That was done sixty or seventy years ago by Dr. Challoner. (Dr. Murray.) There have been some merely verbal alterations.

It has fallen under the notice of the Commissioners, that an edition published by Dr. Crolly, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Down and Connor, differs in several instances from the edition published by Dr. Troy, a few years antecedently to him?—(Dr. Murray.) There may have been verbal alterations. I have not examined it.

The original edition was published in 1582?—Yes.

Is it not a fact, that modern editions differ from that edition in matters much more than verbal, embracing points of doctrine of some importance?—(Dr. Curtis.) No; at any rate this could only be in the notes. Dr. Challoner, sixty or seventy years ago, was obliged to retouch the language, because it was so old; he ventured to do it, and it was so communicated to the prelates of Ireland.

Appendix N° 3.

Saturday, 17th December 1825.

The Most Reverend Dr. Curtis, The Most Reverend Dr. Murray, The Most Reverend Dr. Kelly, The Most Reverend Dr. Laffan, were further examined as follows :

(To Dr. Kelly.) AT the close of our interview yesterday, two works were put into your hands for inspection, namely, Extracts from the Psalms and Proverbs, and Book of Ecclesiasticus ; and the Patriarchal History extracted from the Scriptures ; have you had time to look into them?—Yes.

Will you state the opinion you have formed as to their admissibility into schools of general instruction, to be read by the children of persons of all descriptions in this country?—I think in order to make the two works that I have looked over acceptable to the Catholics as school books, it is necessary they should undergo some revision and correction.

Will you have the goodness to state with what view they should be corrected and revised, so as to assist our judgment upon the subject?—The correction and revision they would require would be, that the texts of scripture contained in them should be rendered conformable to the version approved of by our church.

Would it be necessary to make them conformable throughout, or only to change particular passages, the meaning of which you think not truly rendered?—They should be changed throughout.

Does that necessity appear to be as strong with reference to the extracts from the Proverbs, as the extracts from the Psalms?—The observation I have made is equally applicable to both.

Does it apply also in your view to the extracts from Genesis, containing the Patriarchal History?—It does ; all parts of it that purport to be a translation from scripture must, in order to be acceptable to Catholics, be rendered conformable to the translation approved of by the Catholic church.

No part is declared to be taken from the scriptures, but it nevertheless is all taken from them in fact, and such being the case, we beg to know whether you consider it as falling within your description as being given as the scriptures, and as such excluded from being admitted into the schools of general instruction?—Knowing that they profess to be the texts of scripture, I think it necessary they should be rendered conformable to our version.

Do you mean to be identically the same?—Yes, to accord with it.

In the same words?—Yes.

If a work, exactly corresponding with the two books that have been put into your hands, were prepared in the Douay version for the use of Roman Catholic children, in schools of general instruction, and the work you have seen were put into the hands of Protestant children ; would there be in your view any objection to their reading in class in each others hearing?—I conceive there would be an objection to Catholic children listening to a version of the scriptures which was not approved of by our church.

Would you think the objection of such importance that you would object to children going to any school in which such a rule of instruction should be enforced?—I apprehend it would be an insurmountable objection.

Would the utmost exertions be used to prevent the attendance of Roman Catholic children at such a school?—I think it would meet with considerable opposition.

Speaking of your own diocese, should you think it your duty to exhort your priests to prevent the children, if they could, from attending such a school?—I do confess I should feel myself so called upon.

(To Dr. Laffan.) Having heard the questions put to Dr. Kelly, and the answers given by him, will you state your own view of the subject?—I certainly think the plan of the Commissioners would be more extensively beneficial for the purpose proposed, if the schools should be so arranged that the Catholic children should hear no portion read out of the scriptures except in a version completely their own, not only in sense and meaning, but likewise in words ; and that is what I meant last night by being conformable ; I meant conformable even in words. The Douay version is pretty much what I may call the Vulgate for the laity.

Are those observations applied to the two works put into your hands last night?—I have not seen them ; but from what I have heard of them I understand the principle is applicable to them.

Supposing two works of the kind alluded to were prepared, and that a book in the version approved of by Roman Catholics were put into the hands of the Roman Catholic children, and a corresponding work, but in the text of the authorized version, were put into the hands of Protestant children, should you think it objectionable that the children should hear the versions read by each other, and thereby have a chance of becoming acquainted with the difference in the translation; always understanding, that any text objected to on the ground of doctrine should be omitted?—I do not know how that could be managed. There is, as I am told, no difference of doctrine in those extracts. I think, however, the children should not be allowed to hear the scriptures in any other language than that approved of by the prelates in this country; it is a very different thing, if there was to be a harmony not professing to be in the words of scripture.

How could it be possible to prepare any harmony, such as the Evangelical Life of Christ, in the words of any version of the scripture, and professing to be any thing but what it is: must it not, in candour and sincerity, be stated to be what it is, namely, a harmony of the gospels, containing only the text?—(Dr. Murray.)—There are harmonies approved of by Catholics, though they do not consist solely of the words of scripture. There is a harmony in the French language, edited by Austin Calmet: it is here [producing it].

Upon what principle is that formed; is it upon any principle that would aid us in our objects?—It might. We brought it to show that there are harmonies among us that are not expressed in the words of the gospels. Here are two books which are both called harmonies, one in English, and the other originally in French, but translated afterwards into Latin. They give an account of the life and doctrines of our Saviour; one of them in a much more lengthened manner, the other in a more abridged form; but they do not purport to give this account precisely in the words of scripture, and yet no one calls either of them a "fifth gospel."

What is the name of the author of the other work; you have named one?—It is compiled by Rutter.

Do you happen to know whether any considerable extracts from scripture are included in that work?—In Rutter's there are; Calmet gives the facts in his own words, in the order in which they are supposed to have occurred; whereas the Evangelists do not in their narratives always follow the course of events in strict chronological order.

Are you sufficiently acquainted with the work to say in what way the sermon on the Mount is given?—He gives the general tenor of the doctrines of our Saviour; it is not stated at length.

As a narrative?—Yes.

Our attention has been pointed to a work compiled by a person of the name of Reeves; and in that, the sermon on the Mount is condensed into a short space, as are also many other of the most important passages; has the same plan been followed in the work now before you?—The narrative is abridged; it gives an account of our Saviour's doctrines, and the acts of his life, in the shortest way. The author's object was to give at first a short view of the events recorded in the four gospels, and then he takes each gospel separately, and gives his commentary on it.

Do you think it would be possible to arrange any work upon the principle upon which that is formed, mixing the text of Holy Writ with introductory matter of the writer in such a way as that it could be fitted for the use of Protestants and Roman Catholics, in schools of general instruction in this country?—I do not know how far such works may be consistent with the views of Protestants; they are considered by Catholics as very useful.

According to the principles you have announced, it would be necessary to have the extracts in the Douay text, and no other?—Yes, of course; in the works before us they are in that text.

Whatever extract was made must be in the Douay text only, and no corresponding work could be formed for Protestants out of their version that could be read in the hearing of Roman Catholic children?—Just so; I see that the texts here are very few.

Would it be proper to put before children something as text, and to disguise that it was taken from scripture?—No; if you give it as text you must give it for what it is.

Are you sufficiently acquainted with the work of Reeves to know whether it could be adopted in schools of general instruction; is it not in all its forms and parts a Roman Catholic book?—There are several parts, particularly of the moral reflections, that are intended solely for Catholics, and adapted for them only. It should undergo considerable alteration before it could be adopted for general instruction; the basis might be retained.

Did you refer to the work merely to show the principle, rather than as mentioning it as a work to be adopted in its present state?—Entirely so.

(To Dr. Kelly.) Is Reeves's History of the New Testament used in the Tuam school?—Yes it is.

Is it not very generally used throughout the schools in your diocese?—It is pretty generally used.

Is it not the History or View of the New Testament that is most generally used in the Catholic schools throughout Ireland?—It is that which is generally used in the Catholic schools in the diocese of Tuam; I cannot answer for other parts of the country.

Supposing for the sake of argument the Tuam school was connected with any Board of Commissioners dispensing government assistance, and the members of that Board were to feel feel it their duty to require that that book should be discontinued in the Tuam school, would you be disposed to acquiesce in that requisition?—I should feel no objection to do so, if it tended to bring about an arrangement that might be useful for the promotion of education.

We understood that Dr. Curtis yesterday suggested this book of Reeves's as meeting his idea of a harmony such as we had under discussion; do you consider it of that description?—(Dr. Curtis.) I only meant so far as has been mentioned, to illustrate the principle; I do not think it is voluminous enough, it ought to be much more extensive.

(To Dr. Kelly.) Do you consider there is any positive advantage in that book in deserting, as it does almost universally, the text of scripture, and giving the account of the same events in the words of the author?—I think it has the advantage of giving in an abridged form, attending very much to the chronological order of the events, a history of the New Testament, which I think very useful and profitable for young persons.

Do you not think that in many instances it is not merely an abridgement, but that it also superadds many circumstances that are not to be found at all in the scripture, and which are in this book stated as positive facts?—There are reflections which the author gives, without professing that they are contained in the Sacred Text in the words he uses.

Are those reflections distinguished in any manner from what is stated to be taken from the text; are they not so interwoven by narrative as that it would be impossible for any one, who was not most critically acquainted with the scriptures, to say which was taken from the scripture and which from the author?—He does not profess to use the words of scripture; he gives a history of the New Testament in his own language, and in doing this he sometimes introduces some moral reflections and observations, which I think might be advantageously read by children in schools.

Is there not this misfortune attending the execution of the work, that it is almost impossible for any reader, unless he is most critically acquainted with the scriptures, to distinguish the language of the author from that which is really extracted from the scriptures?—The book is not intended to be substituted for scripture: it does not give the history of the Old or New Testament in the words of scripture, nor does it profess to do so, but it gives an abridged history of them.

We will come to an example for the mere purpose of illustration. It is stated in page 11, in the account which is there given, and which professes to be taken from the first chapter of St. Luke's Gospel—it is so headed in the account of the angelical salutation, "The Angel in reply, assured her that no concurrence of man was requisite for what the sole power of the most High with her consent would operate within her, that by the ineffable virtue of the Holy Ghost she should conceive, bear a son, and still remain a pure virgin;" and again, "For Mary had no sooner given her consent, than the Son of God, the second person of the most adorable Trinity, by an invisible and inexplicable operation of the Holy Ghost took flesh and became man in her womb without the least detriment to her virginal integrity." You will observe that we are not aware that the fact of her consent, which is there twice positively stated, is contained in the scriptures, nor is it a circumstance adverted to by Protestants. Do you think that any book formed upon this principle, stating things as facts which are not to be found in scripture, could be admitted by Protestants?—I do not know that in any school under the direction of a Catholic they ever recommended the Protestant children to read Reeves's History of the Bible; I do not think it would be acceptable to Protestants, but I think it a very fit book to be put into the hands of Roman Catholics.

The question was for illustration of the principle. It is here stated as a matter of fact, and not as of doctrine, that the Blessed Virgin gave her consent, and the instance is adverted to, to explain the meaning of the general question, whether it is to be hoped that any book, the author of which feels himself at liberty to insert facts that are not to be found in the scriptures, could be acceptable in Schools in which Protestants were to be taught?—Protestants would not adopt it as a school-book.

(To Dr. Murray.) May we ask your opinion upon the point?—I think she does announce her consent most distinctly, "be it done to me according to thy word."

We observe in the same account the following words, "For with the same sentiments of virtue, and in the same dispositions of mind, says St. Austin, both Mary and Joseph entered into a mutual engagement of joining the marriage state with a state of virginity, of which the world had not yet seen an example. Almighty God honoured this alliance with an issue that was to set open the gates of Heaven, which for ages had been shut against us by the crime of our first parents. Mary was the woman destined by Almighty God to crush the serpent's head, as it is written in the Book of Genesis, (chapter 3,) and it was to obtain her consent that God then sent his Angel to Nazareth." You will observe there are several facts here stated which we are not aware are found in scripture; first, the mutual engagement of Mary and Joseph to lead a life of perpetual virginity. Do you think any book that is compiled according to the principles that the author of this book feels open to him to follow, could be received by Protestants in schools of general instruction?—We do not state that the book should be adopted by Protestants in schools of general instruction without certain alterations being made in it, but we conceive the account which it gives to be fully justified by scripture.

Do we understand the book as meaning to assert that the person who was to bruise the serpent's head was Mary?—The seed of Mary.

Doctors
Curtis, Murray,
Kelly and Laffan,
17 December
1825.

It is in Reeves's book expressly stated to be Mary herself?—It means of course through her: she was the instrument for that purpose.

Is it not a fact that Reeves's book feels itself at liberty to borrow very freely and fully from the statements of the ancient fathers as well as the scriptures?—The author announces that his reflections are borrowed from the fathers, and he likewise introduces facts taken from profane history in illustration of what he states.

There was a question yesterday put to Dr. Murray respecting the degree in which it would be desirable or admissible that a harmony should include the doctrines of the inspired writers, as contradistinguished from being a mere narrative of the events recorded. We observe that in the account that is here given of the discourse of Saint Paul before Festus the following is the whole statement: "The Holy Apostle began by saying how happy he was in being permitted to plead before Agrippa, and in the sequel of his discourse, spoke with such strength and eloquent simplicity of expression, that Agrippa told him in the end he had almost persuaded him to become a Christian." This is the entire account of that discourse as contained in this book. It is obvious that it is a mere statement of the fact of the discourse having taken place, entirely omitting all the doctrines contained in it; we should wish to understand, whether in such a harmony as is in the contemplation of the Archbishops, for the purpose of general instruction, it is proposed to construct it upon the same principle—whether the doctrine is to be omitted, or whether there is to be any portion of it inserted, and, if so, upon what principle such selection of doctrine should be made?—(Dr. Murray.) The Archbishops have already declared that they cannot give their sanction to any book for general use throughout the kingdom without the concurrence of the other prelates: in any harmony which may be adopted, it would be desirable to introduce as much as possible the doctrines of our Lord Jesus Christ.

In the preaching of St. Paul at Athens, the whole account here given is this, "He went to Athens, where he converted Denis the learned Areopagite." Here is again a complete omission of every thing St. Paul said upon that occasion. When we are talking of a harmony of the gospels, it seems extremely desirable to understand what it is that we each mean; this example is put merely to elicit, whether it is considered by the Roman Catholic Archbishops as the principle of any harmony to be admitted, that the doctrines put forth should be omitted as they are in the examples cited from Reeves's History of the New Testament?—Reeves's History was proposed merely as a basis to show that those things were quite practicable, without inserting the exact words only of scripture; but never as a book that comprehended all that should be inserted, or as not comprehending many things that might be omitted.

We are putting these instances as illustrations of the principle upon which this book was constructed, in order to obtain your opinion of the principle upon which the proposed harmony ought to be made. It appears obvious that such a book may either consist merely of such a statement of facts as is here given, or it may also feel itself at liberty to add the doctrines. The object of the question is to ascertain how far the one course or the other should, in your opinion, be adopted?—It is quite clear that this book was not offered as containing all that it would be useful to give, from the fact that another work has been put forward in two volumes octavo, upon the same subject; and it is merely presented to show that such books are known to us, and are used for the instruction of our people.

We perceive that the sermon on the Mount is stated in Reeves's History of the New Testament, from page 49 to page 53, consisting of about three pages and a half, in language entirely, and, as it would appear, studiously different from that contained in any translation of the scripture. We beg to learn your view of the relative advantages or disadvantages of teaching the matter of that sermon to Roman Catholic children through the medium of what is stated in this book, or through the medium of the 5th, 6th, and 7th chapters of St. Matthew's Gospel, according to the Douay version?—I have not made up my mind on the subject.

Are we to understand that there is the same indecision upon that point in the view of the other Archbishops present?—(Dr. Curtis.) I declare I do not by any means approve of Reeves being so very laconic as not to mention the very few words preached by St. Paul before the Areopagus. I think that is ill done, and that he should have mentioned them; as to the sermon on the Mount, I think the words of Christ ought to be brought forward; if you wanted to explain them, or to make them more intelligible to young people, or to people not very well versed in scripture, it might be done in a very few words. Part of the sermon on the Mount is given to the children in their catechism, in what is called the Beatitudes, in the very words, and it is recited in the manner of a prayer; I think Reeves should have given the words of Christ.

(To Dr. Kelly.) Would you be so good as to state your view of the question put?—If the book is meant as a book for literary instruction, I think the form in which it is given is well suited to the purpose: if it is meant as a book for religious instruction, in which the words of scripture are to be included, I should think it would not answer the purpose.

For instance, in your school at Tuam?—In our school at Tuam it is used as a book of literary instruction; it does not profess to give the history in the words of scripture.

(To Dr. Laffan.) May we ask your view of the subject?—It is very generally used in our schools, and another shorter even than that; but it is by no means intended as a substitute for the scripture, nor is it announced as such; it is only a pious history, but it was never intended intended to be put forward as a work in which Protestants and Catholics could agree. Protestant children at the schools where it is used are not required to read it, nor to be present while it is read by the Catholic children; it is not considered a book of religious instruction.

(To Dr. Murray.) We have not had an opportunity of knowing your opinion upon the subject of, whether you think it so objectionable that Roman Catholic children should hear extracts from the scriptures read by Protestant children, that it would constitute a fatal objection, always understanding that the difference was not upon points of doctrine, but merely conveying the same meaning in different words?—I have always stated my objection to Catholics hearing any thing as scripture that is not in our version.

Although it may be in this sense objectionable that it would not be to be desired if there was a perfectly free choice, do you think it amounts to an objection sufficient to constitute a fatal obstacle to uniting children in the general system of instruction proposed?—Yes, I think it would be considered so throughout the country.

In recommending to our notice last year the Evangelical Life of Christ in the Douay version, it being obvious that the same objection would be taken on the part of Protestants that is now stated by the Roman Catholics, do you think it possible that the Evangelical Life of Christ in the Douay version could be admitted into schools of general instruction, and adopted by Protestants as well as Catholics?—I do not know that the Evangelical Life of Christ was introduced as if to be used without abridgement or alteration; it was merely mentioned as a harmony that we approved of.

We understood no objection would be made by Roman Catholics to that work?—None by me; I can only give my own sentiments; I am not pretending to speak in the name of any other, but I am not aware that the Catholics would object to it.

Would there be any objection to an abbreviation of the Evangelical Life of Christ, still continuing the original words of scripture so far as it went. The question is not meant to imply any opinion on the part of the Commissioner proposing it?—I think there would be no objection to it, supposing that it did not purport to comprise the whole of the gospels.

By means of which those parts of the Douay version deemed offensive to Protestants might be omitted?—Certainly.

For instance, omitting in the abbreviation of the Life of Christ those parallel passages which it was suggested yesterday might be omitted in the Diatessaron?—Certainly.

Suppose a harmony could be framed, or a work analagous to a harmony, in which the author could use words occasionally in relating historical facts that should not be objectionable to Catholics or Protestants, and could, in speaking of the doctrines and precepts of our Saviour, adopt the words of scripture, the same as they are used in both churches, would you not think it preferable that the work should be so given?—Yes, without marking them as being exactly the words of scripture; without, for instance, placing them in inverted commas, so as to signify that they are a part of the text.

If the passages appeared in inverted commas, then the objection would arise?—Yes, certainly; it would be the text then. I understood the Commissioners to mean, in the preceding question, that the history is to be drawn up in the author's own words, and that he is to be at liberty to use the language of both versions indiscriminately where there is no material difference between them.

Suppose one of the Commissioners were to compose a Life of Christ taken from the authorized Protestant version, and the Roman Catholic version, so far as they substantially agreed, but which was not offered as scripture, do you not think that such a book might be rendered acceptable to Roman Catholics?—For my part I would not object to it.

Suppose so much of the sermon on the Mount as is found to be given alike in the two versions were extracted and introduced into a harmony, would there be any objection to it?—Where there was a material variation I should prefer having our own version. I should not object to the mere transposing of a word, or making a verb active or passive to express an equivalent sentence.

For the sake of example we will put this passage in the authorized version,—it is "For I say unto you, That except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven." In the Douay version, we find that passage stated thus: "For I tell you, that unless your justice abounds more than that of the Scribes and Pharisees, you shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." We should wish to know whether you consider the variance in that verse between the authorized version and the Douay version sufficient to exclude the admissibility of the authorized version in that place?—If given as the writer's own words, I should not object to his using the word "righteousness" instead of "justice."

You will observe that the particular sentence above, put for the sake of example, excludes the possibility of supposing it is in the writer's own words, because our Lord speaks in the first person, "For I say unto you"?—It is very likely it would be objected to by many; but as I find the meaning of our Saviour is conveyed by the word "righteousness" I would not object to the use of it in a harmony.

(To Dr. Curtis.) May we ask your opinion upon that particular example?—When it is not brought forward as the text I should not object, they are perfectly the same; it does not mean retributive justice; justification means sanctification: if you call it holiness or piety, I think they are pretty nearly synonymous; however, in any translation of scripture, given as scripture, I would certainly retain "justice" until it shall be changed by the proper authority, but I should have no objection to a harmony.

Do you consider Murphy's Evangelical Life of Christ given as scripture?—(Dr. Murray.) I should not object to Murphy using the word "righteousness." (Dr. Curtis.) Nor would I object to it; nor would I object to it in a sermon, taking that very text.

The question is this particularly; whether the following words could be allowed to stand in a harmony which we are speaking of, "For I say unto you, that except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven," that being the authorized version, while the Douay version is as follows: "For I tell you, that unless your justice abounds more than that of the Scribes and Pharisees, you shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven?"—"For I say unto you" and "For I tell you," there the same may be said as was said about "justice" and "righteousness," they both mean the same thing. This is not a matter in which they disagree, but there are other passages which might lead to different results; in such a work as that mentioned by Dr. Murray to day, by Rutter, he professes to give the whole text of the four gospels, but he always puts the words of scripture in inverted commas, so that in such a work as that, you must give the words of scripture in the words read by Catholics.

If a work professes to give not merely the substance of scripture, but the words of scripture, of that scripture which the children when they read the New Testament know to be scripture, you consider it must be given in its precise words. (Dr. Murray.) Exactly so.

But if the work professes to give the substance of scripture, describing the words of our Saviour as in the first person, yet not professing to say that they are taken exactly from scripture, the objection would not apply, provided the substance were correctly given.—Just so.

We do not understand that there is any objection suggested to the Evangelical Life of Christ in the manner and form now before us, to be used in the course of the separate religious instruction?—No, I am not aware of any. (Dr. Curtis.) Certainly not; I always understood the Protestants in general did not object much to the Douay version; the greater part of those that have conversed with me have said they found it a very good translation, and that it does not differ from their own materially at all. Now, there is not such a feeling among us with regard to the Protestant version; when it agrees with our own in sense, it is insisted upon that it must be the Catholic version, not only in sense but in words; that does not apply among Protestants, I believe; at least they would not make the same difficulty that our people do.

Is there not this difference between the two cases, that the Protestant version has received the solemn sanction of the Church of England, but that the Douay version has never received any sanction from the Church of Rome?—From our church here it certainly has not by Act of Parliament; we cannot make Acts of Parliament; but it has received approbation thus far, that not only we do not receive any other, but we cannot receive any other till some other is substituted by an equal authority.

Has Rome ever at any time sanctioned the Douay version?—Rome never has yet, and most likely never will give a formal sanction to a translation of the scriptures into any of the vulgar languages; it has never sanctioned any version but the Vulgate; it has sanctioned that, and has ordered us to adhere to it, allowing us at the same time to refer to the originals between the merits of which and those of the Vulgate it does not institute any comparison.

Is there not the papal sanction of an Italian translation?—(Dr. Curtis.) Not at all.—(Dr. Murray.) There is a letter of thanks to the translator; that is all.

Do you not think that the differences of translation which exist in the Protestant version are less contrary to the opinions of Roman Catholics than the differences in the Roman Catholic version in the same passages are to the opinions of Protestants?—I am not prepared to answer a question so comprehensive as to include not only the opinions of Catholics but those also of Protestants.

Do you not think that the word "repentance," adopted by the authorized version as the translation of the word "penitentia," is less repugnant to Roman Catholics than the word "penance," adopted by Roman Catholics, is to Protestants?—(Dr. Curtis.) We should have no objection to the use of the word "repentance" unless it is used to exclude penance.

Is it not the fact, that the word "repentance" does express the Roman Catholic view, but that the word "penance" does not express the Protestant view?—Protestants have generally taken up the notion that what we mean by "penance" is external works, such as fasting and long prayers. Now that is called penance, because we suppose it is to be accompanied by a true penitential spirit, without which external works are worth nothing; but accompanied by that spirit we think they are worth a great deal; they have taken up the idea that it means merely fasting. I hope this will not be taken amiss; they merely think that it means external works alone; that is not the fact; that would be a downright error, and and a very dangerous one; there is no such thing as a remission of sins without a true conversion of heart; call it what you please.—(Dr. Murray.) I think in a harmony in many places where the word “penance” is used, the word “penitence” might be substituted.—(Dr. Curtis.) Undoubtedly it might.

Would a harmony that left out the word “penance” altogether, where it occurred, be one that would be acceptable to Roman Catholics?—No, certainly not.

In some cases the word “penitentiam” is used in the Vulgate without the Latin word “ago” connected with it, do you think it would be a safe rule for any person who was attempting to form a work of this kind, that in such cases the word “penitence” or “repentance” might be used?—I would say the same with regard to that as I did about “righteousness.” I should have no objection to the word “penitence” or “repentance.”

Always supposing it were in a harmony, but not in any thing purporting to be extracts from scripture?—Yes, supposing it to be in such a harmony as was described.

Like the Evangelical Life of Christ?—(Dr. Curtis.) Yes.

(To Dr. Murray.) Always supposing that the difficulties and opinions of Protestants on their part must be mutatis mutandis, corresponding with those you have so strongly expressed, and supposing it to be desirable that an attempt should be made to arrange some work of the kind about which we have talked so much (that is to say, a harmony of the gospels either entirely or almost entirely founded upon texts of scripture), in what way do you think a person would best set about arranging such a work, in the hope of its being not fatally objectionable to one class or other in this country?—I think a harmony such as that suggested by one of the Commissioners, given by the writer of the book, and choosing the words from the two versions indiscriminately, where they did not differ materially, and omitting any words that marked the discriminating doctrines of either, might be constructed, and if so constructed, would be generally approved of; at least I would not disapprove of it.

Does it appear to either of the other Archbishops, on the statement that Dr. Murray has made, that there is any objection to it upon the principle stated?—(Dr. Kelly.) I do not see any objection to it; I have no objection to a harmony in the compilation of which you do not profess to give a translation of the scriptures, but a history of the life of our Lord and Saviour, and a summary of the doctrines he delivered. If you profess to give that, and not a translation of the scriptures, I should not be particular as to the language, provided the doctrines be correctly reported.

In stating a summary of his doctrines, would it be necessary, according to your view, to avoid the language of scripture?—(Dr. Murray.) To avoid the language of the authorized version.—(Dr. Kelly.) Certainly.

Throughout?—I shall not inquire where the language was found in forming a harmony that does not profess to be a translation of the scripture, if the facts be fairly stated.

Will you define the criterion by which you would determine whether the writer endeavoured to give the words of scripture or not?—The evangelical harmony in Calmet will give you an idea of it.

Would you say the same of the Evangelical Life of Christ?—That professes to give the words of scripture itself.—(Dr. Murray.) Not in the order in which they are in scripture.

Suppose a person constructing such a work as has been referred to, in stating the doctrines of our Saviour, adopted as his own, the words in some places which he found in the authorized version, and in other places the words which he found in the Roman Catholic version; if what he so gave as doctrine was substantially and strictly correct, would there be any objection to it?—(Dr. Kelly.) None at all.

(To Dr. Laffan.) Do you agree in this statement?—I see not the smallest objection to it.

(To Dr. Curtis.) Do you agree in the sentiments expressed by Dr. Murray, Dr. Kelly, and Dr. Laffan?—(Dr. Curtis.) Certainly.

Has any thing occurred since this time twelve months which makes you think the plan then under consideration liable to more objection than it appeared then to be: has any thing led you to think that the attempt at united education is less to be sought for than it was then?—(Dr. Curtis.) Certainly there is; the prelates in general and the clergy in general, and still more, the laity, or a great portion of the laity, seem to be afraid of what is intended; they seem to be averse to general instruction, and above all, they were alarmed when they found there was any thing like a harmony of the scriptures, of the Bible. “So after all,” say they, “the scriptures that have been abandoned by these gentlemen who wish to give general instruction, still the Bible is to be retained under one denomination or another.” They felt exceedingly sore at that, and they feel so still; there are many that would wish to deprecate general instruction, and would wish that the instruction should be given in different schools; that was generally given up; not merely many Protestants but Catholics wished to accommodate themselves to the general idea of indiscriminate instruction, provided there should never be any idea of interference at all with the principles of

of the children, male or female, and that Roman Catholics should be permitted to preside and inspect, and to be their masters and mistresses, to take care that no undue interference should take place. If that could be rigorously kept up, we would consent to it reluctantly, but we would consent; people say there is always an opportunity of the scriptures being read, and if read, they will be explained, and if read, they would be read by a Protestant; and that is an idea we cannot agree to. I do not know whether we can do the thing in such a way as to show them there is no danger of that. When we speak of the scriptures, all dispute should be sedulously avoided; but it is not avoided, if you give me the Life of Joseph, if you set out all the words in the Protestant text.

Are you aware that all the spelling books that are now in use, so far as we are acquainted with them, that have been in any way edited by Protestants, do contain considerable extracts from scripture given according to the authorized version?—They do so, and I assure you they have been liable to a good deal of opposition on that very account; there are many persons who wish they did not contain them.

Do you consider them inadmissible on that account?—I do not say they are inadmissible; there are in them a few extracts from the scripture, and I would much rather that they should be omitted on the whole, or given in our version, as our version is not disagreeable to the Protestants; they only say it is too literal.

(To Dr. Kelly.) Do you consider the plan we have had under consideration of the united education of Protestant and Roman Catholic children as having become more objectionable at present than it was when we considered this matter last year?—I apprehend it is more objectionable at present to the public than it was at that time.

Can you state what the views are that are taken of it by that portion of the public to which you allude, that have led them to entertain that feeling?—In the first place, they are not made acquainted with the constitution or nature of the Board to which the care of seeing the plan carried into execution will be given. In order that it should be acceptable, they would require that the Board should be so constructed as that the interests of the Catholics and Protestants and Presbyterians should be attended to in carrying it into effect; they therefore apprehend, as they have not been made acquainted with the constitution of that Board, that the result may not be generally favourable to the Roman Catholics.

Do you conceive, yourself, that the success of any such plan would depend upon the favourable or unfavourable opinion they might form of the members of the Board?—I think, unless the members of the Board possessed the confidence of the public, they would find it very difficult to carry any plan of education into practical effect.

Is there any other ground of objection you are aware of than that which you have stated?—On reading over the Report, it would appear that the head master in all the schools was to be a Protestant; and this is considered not proper, where the majority of scholars should be Catholics.

It never was our intention to express such an opinion, and it is not our intention at the present moment?—There is another point in the Report: it would appear that there are to be no other training schools, or model schools, except those belonging to the Kildare Place Society; and the Report is objectionable to Catholics on that account, because they would expect that there should be training schools and model schools established that would possess their confidence. My opinion is, that we require to have training and model schools, where we can send Catholics to be educated; and we feel that we should have a model school not liable to the objections that the Kildare-place Society is.

Appendix, N^o 4.

SCHOOL REGULATIONS, which were prepared for discussion shortly after the Commissioners undertook to try the experiment of establishing Schools, but which were never fully agreed upon, or finally adopted by the Board.

School
Regulations.

THE Commissioners of Education Inquiry having been requested by his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant to superintend, for a limited time, the establishment of a certain number of day schools, on the principles laid down in their Report, in order that an opportunity may be afforded of observing the practical effect, in different parts of the country, of the regulations which they have suggested, are ready to assist in the building of a limited number of new schools, and in the regulation and supply of schools already established, where the patrons and managers shall desire it.

The Commissioners are ready to receive applications from patrons and managers of schools, whether clergymen or laymen, Protestants or Roman Catholics, and whether the schools are intended for boys or girls.

The

The following are the Regulations under which the Commissioners propose to proceed in the first instance. Alterations in details may not improbably suggest themselves in the course of the experiment :

1st. Where aid is required towards building a new school, the Commissioners will advance (in aid of private contributions) such proportion not exceeding of the entire cost, as under all the circumstances of the application may seem to them expedient.

2d. In any case where aid for building a new school is granted by the Commissioners to any amount exceeding the school-house is to be conveyed in fee, or for such a term of lives, or years, as may be agreed on, to one or more trustees, to be approved of by them.

3d. Where nothing more is sought than annual assistance, such as masters salaries, school requisites, and inspection, no conveyance to trustees will be required; and the patrons or managers of the school, where the assistance is merely annual, are to be at liberty to dissolve the connection with the Commissioners, upon giving half a year's notice of such being their wish.

4th. Two teachers, the one a Protestant and the other a Roman Catholic, are to be appointed in any school connected with the Commissioners, where under all its circumstances they shall deem such a course expedient. The persons to be appointed as teachers are to be proposed by the patrons or managers of the school, and approved of by the Commissioners; the Commissioners having no intention or wish to recommend any individuals for these situations. The Commissioners, in all ordinary cases, will expect that the selection of any teacher, whether he be of the Established Church, or a Protestant Dissenter or Roman Catholic, shall be approved of by the clergyman of the parish or place to whose congregation the teacher may belong; but it is not proposed to give an absolute power of appointment to such clergyman, (except where he is himself the sole patron of the school;) and in the event of his approbation appearing to be unreasonably withheld for the purpose of virtually acquiring the power of nomination, the Commissioners reserve to themselves the right of making such arrangements with the patrons, if such a case should occur, as they may deem expedient.

5th. The patrons or managers of each school are to suggest to the Commissioners whether the two teachers are to be co-ordinate in authority, or whether either, and which of them, is to be principal, and the other merely an assistant. The Commissioners are then to exercise their judgment in each particular instance, whether, in reference to the proposed arrangement under all its circumstances, aid is to be granted.

6th. It is to be the general rule of the school, that the children shall pay for their instruction. An exception to the rule may, however, be made in favour of any number of free scholars that the patrons and managers may deem expedient. The regulations under which they shall be admitted are to be determined by the patrons or managers. The Commissioners recommend that the different ministers of religion shall each be permitted to nominate a reasonable number.

7th. The patron or managers are to suggest to the Commissioners in what proportion it is proposed that the profits arising from the scholars shall be divided between the teachers. The Commissioners are to be at liberty to vary this proportion, if they should deem it desirable.

8th. A portion of each of two days of the week is to be left free for the separate instruction in religion of such Protestant children as are regularly attendant upon the general school; and a similar portion of two other days shall be left free for the separate religious instruction of the Roman Catholic children regularly attendant on the general school. The children of each persuasion are to be allowed the exclusive use of the school-room on such occasions, subject, however, to the regulations hereinafter expressed. The patron or manager is not to interfere in the separate religious instruction of children professing a religious faith different from his own, further than to see, if necessary, that these regulations are not infringed; nor is it proposed that any patron or manager should undertake to be in any way instrumental in teaching a faith different from his own, farther than by permitting the use of the school-room on two portions of days in the week for that purpose, subject to the following regulations.

9th. The Holy Scriptures are to be used in the separate religious instruction of all children who can read, not in the form of extracts, but the sacred volume itself. The edition of the New Testament agreed on between the Commissioners and the four Roman Catholic Archbishops is to be employed in the instruction of the Roman Catholics. All such Roman Catholic children as can read, are, when collected for separate religious instruction, to read in that volume the portions pointed out by the Roman Catholic Church, for the epistles and gospels of the entire week, and any other passages which the persons entrusted with their religious instruction may desire.

10th. The clergyman of each persuasion respectively, who has spiritual charge of the place where the school may be, is to be at liberty to attend at the time set apart for religious instruction, if he so thinks proper, and where his object is to promote by his assistance the welfare of the school established upon these principles—the Protestant clergyman of the Established Church, when Protestant children of the Established Church are collected, and the Protestant dissenting minister, when there are Protestant dissenting children collected along with the former, and the Roman Catholic clergyman, when the Roman Catholic children are collected. Protestant children of all religious denominations are to read the scriptures together in the authorized version, either with oral explanation, or without it, as the persons conducting their instruction may think fit; but no catechisms are to be taught to any children except such as their respective pastors may approve of.

11th. The children are to be united in the same school-room in classes, without distinction of religion or of books, and taught alike by the same masters, and out of the same books, except when separated as above, for the purposes of religious instruction.

12th. In the general school the books to be employed are to be—

The Dublin Spelling Book;

The Dublin Reading Book;

The book entitled Selections from the Psalms of David, the Proverbs of Solomon, and the Book of Ecclesiasticus;

The History of Joseph and the Deliverance of the Israelites from Egypt, to which is prefixed the History of the Creation and of the Patriarchs.

The History of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, extracted from the Gospels.

This latter book is by no means adopted as a substitute for the scriptures, which are to be used in their proper form, in the manner above provided for the separate religious instruction of the children; and such other books are to be employed in the school of general instruction, as may be agreed on from time to time between the patrons and managers of each school and the Commissioners.

No catechism or religious instruction, other than the mere reading of the above books, is to be admissible into the general school; religious instruction being reserved, as above specified, for the occasions when the children are separated.

13th. A lending library is to be attached to the school, to be used by the more advanced boys out of school-hours; it will be supplied by the Commissioners.

14th. The name of every book, tract, and paper of whatsoever description, used either in the general school or in the separate religious instruction of the children, or in any lending library in any way connected with either, is to be communicated to the Commissioners, and if they feel called on to express their disapprobation of any book, its use is to be immediately discontinued.

15th. The books intended for the school of general instruction, and copies of the New Testament according to the authorized version, and according to the Douay version, and also a lending library, will be supplied, if desired, by the Commissioners. Catechisms and other books intended for separate religious instruction are to be provided by the patrons and managers, or clergymen of the respective persuasions, or by the parents of the children, subject as above mentioned to be, any of them, discontinued, if the Commissioners feel called on to express their disapprobation.

The Commissioners will further give annual gratuities to each teacher, varying in amount from 5*l.* to 15*l.* and regulated exclusively by the opinion they may see reason to form of his efficiency and good conduct.

It is proposed to maintain a regular system of inspection for this purpose; and it is to be distinctly understood, that in case the Commissioners should see occasion for the dismissal of a teacher, the patrons or managers accepting their aid are to discontinue his services. The patrons or managers are, however, to be at liberty to dismiss any teacher without the sanction of the Commissioners, if they shall so think proper.

16th. No school, while connected with the Commissioners, is to receive any aid or direction from any other society or association, or to be subject to the direction of any persons, except such as are stated to the Commissioners to be its patrons or managers.

17th. As the superintendence of the present Commissioners must necessarily be of a very limited duration, patrons or managers accepting aid from them are to continue the connection of their schools in like manner with any other competent authority, which the Legislature or the Government may hereafter provide for the purpose.

Patrons and Managers of Schools, applying for Aid, are requested to answer the following Queries :

QUERIES.	ANSWERS.
1st. Do you promise that (in case you receive aid from the Commissioners) you will so far as in you lies, take care that the School shall be conducted on the principles stated in the above Regulations, and that you will, from time to time, report to the Commissioners any deviations therefrom that may come to your knowledge?
2d. What is the nature and extent of the aid which you are desirous of obtaining?
3d. What is the name of the County, Parish, Townland, in which the proposed School is to be situated?
4th. What is its Post Town?
5th. What number of Children is it expected will attend? And distinguish the probable number of Protestants of the Established Church, Protestant Dissenters, Roman Catholics, respectively.
6th. Is it intended that the School be confined to Boys, or to Girls, or that both should be admissible?
7th. Is the School, or has it been, connected with any and what Society, Association, Brotherhood, or other Managing Authority?
8th. What are the names, occupations, and residences of the several persons who propose to be Patrons and Managers of the School?

The persons making application are requested here to affix their signature, and the date; and it is particularly desired, where there are more Patrons or Managers than one, that they should all sign.

This Paper, with the Answers written thereon, to be returned to the Commissioners.

School
Regulations.

welfare of the school established upon these principles—the Protestant clergyman of the Established Church, when Protestant children of the Established Church are collected, and the Protestant dissenting minister, when there are Protestant dissenting children collected along with the former, and the Roman Catholic clergyman, when the Roman Catholic children are collected. Protestant children of all religious denominations are to read the scriptures together in the authorized version, either with oral explanation, or without it, as the persons conducting their instruction may think fit; but no catechisms are to be taught to any children except such as their respective pastors may approve of.

11th. The children are to be united in the same school-room in classes, without distinction of religion or of books, and taught alike by the same masters, and out of the same books, except when separated as above, for the purposes of religious instruction.

12th. In the general school the books to be employed are to be—

The Dublin Spelling Book;

The Dublin Reading Book;

The book entitled Selections from the Psalms of David, the Proverbs of Solomon, and the Book of Ecclesiasticus;

The History of Joseph and the Deliverance of the Israelites from Egypt, to which is prefixed the History of the Creation and of the Patriarchs.

The History of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, extracted from the Gospels.

This latter book is by no means adopted as a substitute for the scriptures, which are to be used in their proper form, in the manner above provided for the separate religious instruction of the children; and such other books are to be employed in the school of general instruction, as may be agreed on from time to time between the patrons and managers of each school and the Commissioners.

No catechism or religious instruction, other than the mere reading of the above books, is to be admissible into the general school; religious instruction being reserved, as above specified, for the occasions when the children are separated.

13th. A lending library is to be attached to the school, to be used by the more advanced boys out of school-hours; it will be supplied by the Commissioners.

14th. The name of every book, tract, and paper of whatsoever description, used either in the general school or in the separate religious instruction of the children, or in any lending library in any way connected with either, is to be communicated to the Commissioners, and if they feel called on to express their disapprobation of any book, its use is to be immediately discontinued.

15th. The books intended for the school of general instruction, and copies of the New Testament according to the authorized version, and according to the Douay version, and also a lending library, will be supplied, if desired, by the Commissioners. Catechisms and other books intended for separate religious instruction are to be provided by the patrons and managers, or clergymen of the respective persuasions, or by the parents of the children, subject as above mentioned to be, any of them, discontinued, if the Commissioners feel called on to express their disapprobation.

The Commissioners will further give annual gratuities to each teacher, varying in amount from 5*l.* to 15*l.* and regulated exclusively by the opinion they may see reason to form of his efficiency and good conduct.

It is proposed to maintain a regular system of inspection for this purpose; and it is to be distinctly understood, that in case the Commissioners should see occasion for the dismissal of a teacher, the patrons or managers accepting their aid are to discontinue his services. The patrons or managers are, however, to be at liberty to dismiss any teacher without the sanction of the Commissioners, if they shall so think proper.

16th. No school, while connected with the Commissioners, is to receive any aid or direction from any other society or association, or to be subject to the direction of any persons, except such as are stated to the Commissioners to be its patrons or managers.

17th. As the superintendence of the present Commissioners must necessarily be of a very limited duration, patrons or managers accepting aid from them are to continue the connection of their schools in like manner with any other competent authority, which the Legislature or the Government may hereafter provide for the purpose.

1057

Patrons and Managers of Schools, applying for Aid, are requested to answer the following Queries:

School
Regulations.

QUERIES.	ANSWERS.
1st. Do you promise that (in case you receive aid from the Commissioners) you will so far as in you lies, take care that the School shall be conducted on the principles stated in the above Regulations, and that you will, from time to time, report to the Commissioners any deviations therefrom that may come to your knowledge?
2d. What is the nature and extent of the aid which you are desirous of obtaining?
3d. What is the name of the County, Parish, Townland, in which the proposed School is to be situated?
4th. What is its Post Town?
5th. What number of Children is it expected will attend? And distinguish the probable number of Protestants of the Established Church, Protestant Dissenters, Roman Catholics, respectively.
6th. Is it intended that the School be confined to Boys, or to Girls, or that both should be admissible?
7th. Is the School, or has it been, connected with any and what Society, Association, Brotherhood, or other Managing Authority?
8th. What are the names, occupations, and residences of the several persons who propose to be Patrons and Managers of the School?

The persons making application are requested here to affix their signature, and the date; and it is particularly desired, where there are more Patrons or Managers than one, that they should all sign.

This Paper, with the Answers written thereon, to be returned to the Commissioners.

Appendix, N° 6.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS:

Being the Work referred to in the Letter of His Grace the Archbishop of Dublin, dated 8th July 1826.

Scripture Lessons. The Parentage and Birth of John the Baptist.

LUKE I.

5 ¶ THERE was in the days of Herod, the king of Judæa, a certain Priest named Zacharias, of the course of Abia: and his wife was of the daughters of Aaron, and her name was Elisabeth.

6 And they were both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless.

7 And they had no child, because that Elisabeth was barren, and they both were now well stricken in years.

8 And it came to pass, that while he executed the Priest's office before God in the order of his course,

9 According to the custom of the Priest's office, his lot was to burn incense when he went into the temple of the Lord.

10 And the whole multitude of the people were praying without at the time of incense.

11 And there appeared unto him an angel of the Lord standing on the right side of the altar of incense.

12 And when Zacharias saw him, he was troubled, and fear fell upon him.

13 But the angel said unto him, Fear not, Zacharias: for thy prayer is heard; and thy wife Elisabeth shall bear thee a son, and thou shalt call his name John.

14 And thou shalt have joy and gladness; and many shall rejoice at his birth.

15 For he shall be great in the sight of the Lord, and shall drink neither wine nor strong drink; and he shall be filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb.

16 And many of the children of Israel shall he turn to the Lord their God.

17 And he shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just; to make ready a people prepared for the Lord.

18 And Zacharias said unto the angel, Whereby shall I know this? for I am an old man, and my wife well stricken in years.

19 And the angel answering said unto him, I am Gabriel, that stand in the presence of God; and am sent to speak unto thee, and to shew thee these glad tidings.

20 And, behold, thou shalt be dumb, and not able to speak, until the day that these things shall be performed, because thou believest not my words, which shall be fulfilled in their season.

21 And the people waited for Zacharias, and marvelled that he tarried so long in the temple.

22 And when he came out, he could not speak unto them: and they perceived that he had seen a vision in the temple: for he beckoned unto them, and remained speechless.

23 And it came to pass, that, as soon as the days of his ministration were accomplished, he departed to his own house.

24 And after those days his wife Elisabeth conceived, and hid herself five months, saying,

25 Thus hath the Lord dealt with me in the days wherein he looked on me, to take away my reproach among men.

57 Now Elisabeth's full time came that she should be delivered; and she brought forth a son.

58 And her neighbours and her cousins heard how the Lord had shewed great mercy upon her; and they rejoiced with her.

59 And it came pass, that on the eighth day they came to circumcise the child; and they called him Zacharias, after the name of his father.

60 And his mother answered and said, Not so; but he shall be called John.

61 And they said unto her, There is none of thy kindred that is called by this name.

62 And they made signs to his father, how he would have him called.

63 And he asked for a writing table, and wrote, saying, His name is John. And they marvelled all.

64 And his mouth was opened immediately and his tongue loosed, and he spake and praised God.

65 And fear came on all that dwelt round about them: and all these sayings were noised abroad throughout all the hill country of Judæa.

66 And all they that heard them laid them up in their hearts, saying, What manner of child shall this be! And the hand of the Lord was with him.

67 And his father Zacharias was filled with the Holy Ghost and prophesied, saying, 68 Blessed be the Lord God of Israel; for he hath visited and redeemed his people.

69 And hath raised up an horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David;

70 As he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began:

71 That we should be saved from our enemies, and from the hand of all that hate us;

72 To perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember his holy covenant;

73 The oath which he sware to our father Abraham,

74 That he would grant unto us, that we being delivered out of the hand of our enemies might serve him without fear.

75 In holiness and righteousness before him, all the days of our life

76 And thou child shalt be called the prophet of the Highest: for thou shalt go before 8 before

before the face of the Lord to prepare his ways;

77 To give knowledge of salvation unto his people by the remission of their sins,

78 Through the tender mercy of our God; whereby the day-spring from on high hath visited us,

79 To give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet into the way of peace.

80 And the child grew, and waxed strong in spirit, and was in the deserts until the day of his shewing unto Israel.

John the Baptist, the Forerunner of Christ.

JOHN I.

6 ¶ There was a man sent from God, whose name was John.

7 The same came for a witness, to bear witness of the Light, that all men through him might believe.

8 He was not that Light, but was sent to bear witness of that Light.

9 That was the true light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world.

15 ¶ John bare witness of him, and cried, saying, This was he of whom I spake, He that cometh after me is preferred before me: for he was before me.

16 And of his fulness have all we received, and grace for grace.

17 For the law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ.

18 No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him.

19 ¶ And this is the record of John, when the Jews sent Priests and Levites from Jerusalem to ask him, Who art thou?

20 And he confessed, and denied not; but confessed, I am not the Christ.

21 And they asked him, What then? Art thou Elias? And he saith, I am not. Art thou that prophet? And he answered, No.

22 Then said they unto him, Who art thou? that we may give an answer to them that sent us. What sayest thou of thyself?

23 He said, I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the Lord, as said the prophet Esaias.

24 And they which were sent were of the Pharisees.

25 And they asked him, and said unto him, Why baptizest thou then, if thou be not that Christ, nor Elias, neither that prophet?

26 John answered them, saying, I baptize with water: but there standeth one among you, whom ye know not;

27 He it is, who coming after me is preferred before me, whose shoe's latchet I am not worthy to unloose.

28 These things were done in Bethabara beyond Jordan, where John was baptizing.

29 ¶ The next day John seeth Jesus coming unto him, and saith, Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world.

30 This is he of whom I said, After me cometh a man which is preferred before me: for he was before me.

31 And I knew him not: but that he should be made manifest to Israel, therefore am I come baptizing with water.

510.

32 And John bare record, saying, I saw the Spirit descending from heaven like a dove, and it abode upon him.

33 And I knew him not: but he that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me, Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and remaining on him, the same is he which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost.

34 And I saw, and bare record that this is the Son of God.

JOHN III.

30 He must increase, but I must decrease.

31 He that cometh from above is above all: he that is of the earth is earthly, and speaketh of the earth: he that cometh from heaven is above all.

32 And what he hath seen and heard, that he testifieth; and no man receiveth his testimony.

33 He that hath received his testimony hath set to his seal that God is true.

34 For he whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God: for God giveth not the Spirit by measure unto him.

35 The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hand.

36 He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him.

The Birth and Infancy of Our Lord Jesus Christ.

JOHN I.

1 In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God.

2 The same was in the beginning with God.

3 All things were made by him; and without him was not any thing made that was made.

4 In him was life; and the life was the light of men.

5 And the light shineth in darkness; and the darkness comprehended it not.

10 He was in the world, and the world was made by him, and the world knew him not.

11 He came unto his own, and his own received him not.

12 But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name:

13 Which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God.

14 And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, (and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father), full of grace and truth.

LUKE I.

26 And in the sixth month the angel Gabriel was sent from God unto a city of Galilee, named Nazareth.

27 To a virgin espoused to a man whose name was Joseph, of the house of David; and the Virgin's name was Mary.

30 And the angel said unto her, Fear not, Mary: for thou hast found favour with God.

31 And, behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb,

Scripture Lessons.

womb, and bring forth a son, and shalt call his name JESUS.

35 The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee: therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God.

32 He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest: and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David:

33 And he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end.

36 And, behold, thy cousin Elisabeth, she hath also conceived a son in her old age: and this is the sixth month with her, who was called barren.

37 For with God nothing shall be impossible.

38 And Mary said, Behold the handmaid of the Lord: be it unto me according to thy word. And the angel departed from her.

39 And Mary arose in those days, and went into the hill country with haste, into a city of Juda;

40 And entered into the house of Zacharias, and saluted Elisabeth.

41. And it came to pass, that, when Elisabeth heard the salutation of Mary, the babe leaped in her womb; and Elisabeth was filled with the Holy Ghost:

42 And she spake out with a loud voice, and said, Blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb.

43 And whence is this to me, that the mother of my Lord should come to me?

44 For, lo, as soon as the voice of thy salutation sounded in mine ears, the babe leaped in my womb for joy.

45 And blessed is she that believed: for there shall be a performance of those things which were told her from the Lord.

46 And Mary said, My soul doth magnify the Lord.

47 And my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour.

48 For he hath regarded the low estate of his handmaiden: for, behold, from henceforth all generations shall call me blessed.

49 For he that is mighty hath done to me great things: and holy is his name.

50 And his mercy is on them that fear him from generation to generation.

51 He hath shewed strength with his arm; he hath scattered the proud in the imagination of their hearts.

52 He hath put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree.

53 He hath filled the hungry with good things; and the rich he hath sent empty away.

54 He hath holpen his servant Israel, in remembrance of his mercy;

55 As he spake to our fathers, to Abraham, and to his seed for ever.

56 And Mary abode with her about three months, and returned to her own house.

MATTHEW I.

20 But while he (Joseph) thought on these things, behold, the angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a dream, saying,

Joseph, thou son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife: for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost.

21 And she shall bring forth a son, and though shalt call his name JESUS: for he shall save his people from their sins.

22 (Now all this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying, 23 Behold, a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Emmanuel, which being interpreted is, God with us).

24 Then Joseph being raised from sleep, did as the angel of the Lord had bidden him, and took unto him his wife.

LUKE II:

1 And it came to pass in those days, that there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus, that all the world should be taxed.

3 And all went to be taxed, every one into his own city.

4 And Joseph also went up from Galilee, out of the city of Nazareth, into Judæa, unto the city of David, which is called Bethlehem; (because he was of the house and lineage of David):

5 To be taxed with Mary his espoused wife, being great with child.

6 And so it was, that while they were there, the days were accomplished that she should be delivered.

7 And she brought forth her firstborn son, and wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in a manger; because there was no room for them in the inn.

8 And there were in the same country shepherds abiding in the field, keeping watch over their flock by night.

9 And, lo, the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them: and they were sore afraid.

10 And the angel said unto them: fear not: for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people.

11 For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord.

12 And this shall be a sign unto you; Ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger.

15 And the shepherds said one to another, Let us now go even unto Bethlehem, and see this thing which is come to pass, which the Lord hath made known unto us.

16 And they came with haste, and found Mary, and Joseph, and the babe lying in a manger.

17 And when they had seen it, they made known abroad the saying which was told them concerning this child.

18 And all they that heard it wondered at those things which were told them by the shepherds.

19 But Mary kept all these things, and pondered them in her heart.

20 And the shepherds returned, glorifying and praising God for all the things that they had heard and seen, as it was told unto them.

21 And when eight days were accomplished for the circumcision of the child, his name name was called JESUS, which was so named of the angel before he was conceived in the womb.

22 And when the days of her purification according to the law of Moses was accomplished, they brought him to Jerusalem, to present him to the Lord;

23 (As it is written in the law of the Lord, Every male that openeth the womb shall be called holy to the Lord);

24 And to offer a sacrifice according to that which is said in the law of the Lord, A pair of turtle-doves, or two young pigeons.

25 And, behold, there was a man in Jerusalem, whose name was Simeon; and the same man was just and devout, waiting for the consolation of Israel: and the Holy Ghost was upon him.

26 And it was revealed unto him by the Holy Ghost, that he should not see death, before he had seen the Lord's Christ.

27 And he came by the Spirit into the temple: and when the parents brought in the child Jesus, to do for him after the custom of the law,

28 Then took he him up in his arms, and blessed God, and said,

29 Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word;

30 For mine eyes hath seen thy salvation,

31 Which thou hast prepared before the face of all people;

32 A light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel.

33 And Joseph and his mother marvelled at those things which were spoken of him.

34 And Simeon blessed them, and said unto Mary his mother, Behold, this child is set for the fall and rising again of many in Israel; and for a sign which shall be spoken against;

35 (Yea, a sword shall pierce through thy own soul also), that the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed.

MATTHEW II.

1 Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judæa in the days of Herod the king, behold there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem,

2 Saying, Where is he that is born King of the Jews? for we have seen his star in the east, and are come to worship him.

3 When Herod the king had heard these things, he was troubled, and all Jerusalem with him.

4 And when he had gathered all the Chief Priests and Scribes of the people together, he demanded of them where Christ should be born.

5 And they said unto him, In Bethlehem of Judæa; for thus it is written by the prophet,

6 And thou Bethlehem, in the land of Juda, art not the least among the princes of Juda: for out of thee shall come a Governor, that shall rule my people Israel.

7 Then Herod, when he had privily called the wise men, enquired of them diligently what time the star appeared.

8 And he sent them to Bethlehem, and said, Go and search diligently for the young child; and when ye have found him, bring me word again, that I may come and worship him also.

9 When they had heard the king, they departed; and, lo, the star, which they saw in the east, went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was.

10 When they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy.

11 ¶ And when they were come into the house, they saw the young child with Mary his mother, and fell down, and worshipped him: and when they had opened their treasures, they presented unto him gifts; gold, and frankincense, and myrrh.

12 And being warned of God in a dream that they should not return to Herod, they departed into their own country another way.

13 And when they were departed, behold, the angel of the Lord appeareth to Joseph in a dream, saying, Arise, and take the young child and his mother, and flee into Egypt, and be thou there until I bring thee word: for Herod will seek the young child to destroy him.

14 When he arose, he took the young child and his mother by night, and departed into Egypt:

15 And was there until the death of Herod: that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying, Out of Egypt have I called my Son.

16 ¶ Then Herod, when he saw that he was mocked of the wise men, was exceeding wroth, and sent forth, and slew all the children that were in Bethlehem, and in all the coasts thereof, from two years old and under, according to the time which he had diligently enquired of the wise men.

17 Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet, saying,

18 In Rama was there a voice heard, lamentation, and weeping, and great mourning, Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted, because they are not.

19 ¶ But when Herod was dead, behold, an angel of the Lord appeareth in a dream to Joseph in Egypt.

20 Saying, Arise, and take the young child and his mother, and go into the land of Israel: for they are dead which sought the young child's life.

21 And he arose, and took the young child and his mother, and came into the land of Israel.

22 But when he heard that Archelaus did reign in Judæa in the room of his father Herod, he was afraid to go thither: notwithstanding, being warned of God in a dream, he turned aside into the parts of Galilee:

23 And he came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth: that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, He shall be called a Nazarene.

LUKE II.

40 And the child grew, and waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom: and the grace of God was upon him.

41 Now his parents went to Jerusalem every year at the feast of the Passover.

42 And when he was twelve years old, they they went up to Jerusalem after the custom of the feast.

43 And when they had fulfilled the days, as they returned, the child Jesus tarried behind in Jerusalem; and Joseph and his mother knew not of it.

44 But they, supposing him to have been in the company, went a day's journey; and they sought him among their kinsfolk and acquaintance.

45 And when they found him not, they turned back again to Jerusalem, seeking him.

46 And it came to pass, that after three days they found him in the temple, sitting in the midst of the doctors, both hearing them, and asking them questions.

47 And all that heard him were astonished at his understanding and answers.

48 And when they saw him they were amazed: and his mother said unto him, Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? behold, thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing.

49 And he said unto them, How is it that ye sought me? wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business.

50 And they understood not the saying which he spake unto them.

51 And he went down with them, and came to Nazareth, and was subject unto them: but his mother kept all these sayings in her heart.

52 And Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and man.

Baptism of Christ.

MATTHEW III.

13 ¶ Then cometh Jesus from Galilee to Jordan unto John, to be baptized of him.

14 But John forbad him, saying, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?

15 And Jesus answering said unto him, Suffer it to be so now: for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness. Then he suffered him.

16 And Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water: and, lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him:

17 And lo a voice from heaven, saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

The Temptation.

MATTHEW IV.

1 Then was Jesus led up of the spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil.

2 And when he had fasted forty days and forty nights, he was afterwards an hungred.

3 And when the tempter came to him, he said, If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread.

4 But he answered and said, It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.

5 Then the devil taketh him up into the holy city, and setteth him on a pinnacle of the temple.

6 And saith unto him, If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down: for it is written, He shall give his angels charge concerning thee: and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone.

7 Jesus said unto him, It is written again, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God.

8 Again, the devil taketh him up into an exceeding high mountain, and sheweth him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them;

9 And saith unto him, All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me.

10 Then saith Jesus unto him, Get thee hence, Satan: for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve.

11 Then the devil leaveth him, and, behold, angels came and ministered unto him.

The Ministry of Our Lord.

LUKE IV.

14 ¶ And Jesus returned in the power of the spirit into Galilee: and there went out a fame of him through all the region round about.

15 And he taught in their synagogues, being glorified of all.

MARK I.

15 And saying, The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand: repent ye, and believe the Gospel.

LUKE IV.

16 ¶ And he came to Nazareth, where he had been brought up: and, as his custom was, he went into the synagogue on the sabbath day, and stood up for to read.

17 And there was delivered unto him the book of the prophet Esaias. And when he had opened the book, he found the place where it was written,

18 The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised.

19 To preach the acceptable year of the Lord.

20 And he closed the book, and he gave it again to the minister, and sat down. And the eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened on him.

21 And he began to say unto them, This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears.

22 And all bare him witness, and wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth.

MATTHEW IV.

23 ¶ And Jesus went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the Gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of sickness and all manner of disease among the people.

24 And his fame went throughout all Syria: and they brought unto him all sick people that were taken with divers diseases and torments, and those which were possessed with devils, and those which were lunatick, and those that had the palsy; and he healed them.

25 And

25 And there followed him great multitudes of people from Galilee, and from Decapolis, and from Jerusalem, and from Judæa, and from beyond Jordan.

Christ's Sermon on the Mount.

MATTHEW V.

1 And seeing the multitudes, he went up into a mountain: and when he was set, his disciples came unto him:

2 And he opened his mouth, and taught them, saying,

3 Blessed are the poor in spirit: for their's is the kingdom of heaven.

4 Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted.

5 Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth.

6 Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled.

7 Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy.

8 Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God.

9 Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God.

10 Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake: for their's is the kingdom of heaven.

11 Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake.

12 Rejoice, and be exceeding glad: for great is your reward in heaven: for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you.

13 ¶ Ye are the salt of the earth: but if the salt have lost his savour, wherewith shall it be salted? it is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out, and to be trodden under foot of men.

14 Ye are the light of the world. A city that is set on an hill cannot be hid.

15 Neither do men light a candle, and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick; and it giveth light unto all that are in the house.

16 Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven.

17 ¶ Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy but to fulfil.

18 For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled.

19 Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven: but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven.

20 For I say unto you, That except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven.

21 ¶ Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not kill; and whosoever shall kill shall be in danger of the judgment:

22 But I say unto you, That whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause, shall be in danger of the judgment: and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council: but whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire.

23 Therefore if thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath ought against thee;

24 Leave there thy gift before the altar and go thy way; first, be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift.

25 Agree with thine adversary quickly, whiles thou art in the way with him; lest at any time the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison.

26 Verily I say unto thee, Thou shalt by no means come out thence, till thou hast paid the uttermost farthing.

27 ¶ Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not commit adultery:

28 But I say unto you, That whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart.

29 And if thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell.

30 And if thy right hand offend thee, cut it off, and cast it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell.

31 It hath been said, Whosoever shall put away his wife, let him give her a writing of divorcement:

32 But I say unto you, That whosoever shall put away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery: and whosoever shall marry her that is divorced, committeth adultery.

33 ¶ Again, ye have heard that it hath been said by them of old time, Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths:

34 But I say unto you, Swear not at all; neither by heaven; for it is God's throne:

35 Nor by the earth; for it is his footstool: neither by Jerusalem; for it is the city of the great King.

36 Neither shalt thou swear by thy head, because thou canst not make one hair white or black.

37 But let your communication be, Yea, yea; Nay, nay: for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil.

38 ¶ Ye have heard that it hath been said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth:

39 But I say unto you, That ye resist not evil: but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also.

40 And if any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also.

41 And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain.

42 Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away.

43 ¶ Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy.

Scripture Lessons.

44 But I say unto you, love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you;

45 That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven; for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust.

46 For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the Publicans the same?

47 And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? do not even the Publicans so?

48 Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.

Christ continueth his Sermon.

MATTHEW VI.

1 Take heed that ye do not your alms before men, to be seen of them: otherwise ye have no reward of your Father which is in heaven.

2 Therefore when thou doest thine alms, do not sound a trumpet before thee, as the hypocrites do in the synagogues and in the streets, that they may have glory of men. Verily I say unto you, They have their reward.

3 But when thou doest alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth:

4 That thine alms may be in secret: and thy Father, which seeth in secret, himself shall reward thee openly.

5 ¶ And when thou prayest, thou shalt not be as the hypocrites are: for they love to pray standing in the synagogues and in the corners of the streets, that they may be seen of men. Verily I say unto you, They have their reward.

6 But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father, which seeth in secret, shall reward thee openly.

7 But when ye pray, use not vain repetitions, as the heathen do; for they think that they shall be heard for their much speaking.

8 Be not ye therefore like unto them: for your Father knoweth what things ye have need of, before ye ask him.

LUKE XI.

2 When ye pray, say, Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name, Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, as in heaven, so in earth.

3 Give us day by day our daily bread.

4 And forgive us our sins; for we also forgive every one that is indebted to us. And lead us not into temptation; but deliver us from evil.

MATTHEW VI.

14 ¶ For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you:

15 But if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses.

16 ¶ Moreover when ye fast, be not, as the hypocrites, of a sad countenance: for they disfigure their faces, that they may appear unto men to fast. Verily I say unto you, They have their reward.

17 But thou, when thou fastest, anoint thine head, and wash thy face;

18 That thou appear not unto men to fast, but unto thy Father which is in secret: and thy Father, which seeth in secret, shall reward thee openly.

19 ¶ Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal:

20 But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal:

21 For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also.

22 The light of the body is the eye: if therefore thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light.

23 But if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness. If therefore the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness!

24 ¶ No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon.

25 Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment?

26 Behold the fowls of the air; for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they?

27 Which of you, by taking thought, can add one cubit unto his stature?

28 And why take ye thought for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin:

29 And yet I say unto you, That even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these.

30 Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?

31 Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed?

32 (For after all these things do the Gentiles seek:) for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things.

33 But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you.

34 Take therefore no thought for the morrow: for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.

Christ endeth his Sermon.

MATTHEW VII.

1 Judge not, that ye be not judged.

2 For with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged: and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again.

3 And why beholdest thou the mote that is is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye?

4 Or how wilt thou say to thy brother, Let me pull out the mote out of thine eye; and, behold, a beam is in thine own eye?

5 Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye.

6 ¶ Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet, and turn again and rend you.

7 ¶ Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you:

8 For every one that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened.

9 Or what man is there of you, whom if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone?

10 Or if he ask a fish, will he give him a serpent?

11 If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him?

12 Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them: for this is the Law and the Prophets.

13 ¶ Enter ye in at the strait gate: for wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat:

14 Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it.

15 ¶ Beware of false prophets, which come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves.

16 Ye shall know them by their fruits. Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?

17 Even so every good tree bringeth forth good fruit; but a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit.

18 A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit.

19 Every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire.

20 Wherefore by their fruits ye shall know them.

21 ¶ Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven.

22 Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works?

23 And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity.

24 ¶ Therefore whosoever heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them, I will liken him unto a wise man, which built his house upon a rock:

25 And the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell not: for it was founded upon a rock.

26 And every one that heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man, which built his house upon the sand:

27 And the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell: and great was the fall of it.

28 And it came to pass, when Jesus had ended these sayings, the people were astonished at his doctrine:

29 For he taught them as one having authority, and not as the Scribes.

MATTHEW XI.

25 ¶ At that time Jesus answered and said, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes.

26 Even so, Father: for so it seemed good in thy sight.

27 All things are delivered unto me of my Father: and no man knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him.

28 ¶ Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.

29 Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls.

30 For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light.

MATTHEW XII.

46 ¶ While he yet talked to the people, behold, his mother and his brethren stood without, desiring to speak with him.

47 Then one said unto him, Behold, thy mother and thy brethren stand without, desiring to speak with thee.

48 But he answered and said unto him that told him, Who is my mother? and who are my brethren?

49 And he stretched forth his hand toward his disciples, and said behold my mother and my brethren!

50 For whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother.

MATTHEW IX.

36 ¶ But when he saw the multitudes, he was moved with compassion on them, because they fainted, and were scattered abroad, as sheep having no shepherd.

37. Then saith he unto his disciples, The harvest truly is plenteous, but the labourers are few;

38 Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he will send forth labourers into his harvest.

The Call of the Twelve Apostles.

MATTHEW X.

1 And when he had called unto him his twelve disciples, he gave them power against unclean spirits, to cast them out, and to heal all manner of sickness and all manner of disease.

2 Now the names of the twelve apostles are these: The first, Simon, who is called Peter, and Andrew his brother: James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother;

3 Philip, and Bartholomew; Thomas, and Matthew the Publican; James the son of Alphaeus,

Scripture Lessons.

Alpheus, and Lebbeus, whose surname was Thaddeus ;

4 Simon the Canaanite, and Judas Iscariot, who also betrayed him.

5 These twelve Jesus sent forth, and commanded them, saying, Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not ;

6 But go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel.

7 And as ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand.

8 Heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead, cast out devils : freely ye have received, freely give.

9 Provide neither gold, nor silver, nor brass in your purses,

10 Nor scrip for your journey, neither two coats, neither shoes, nor yet staves : for the workman is worthy of his meat.

11 And into whatsoever city or town ye shall enter, enquire who in it is worthy ; and there abide till ye go thence.

12 And when ye come into an house, salute it.

13 And if the house be worthy, let your peace come upon it : but if it be not worthy, let your peace return to you.

14 And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear your words, when ye depart out of that house or city, shake off the dust of your feet.

15 Verily I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for that city.

16 ¶ Behold, I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves : be ye therefore wise as serpents, and harmless as doves.

17 But beware of men : for they will deliver you up to the councils, and they will scourge you in their synagogues ;

18 And ye shall be brought before governors and kings for my sake, for a testimony against them and the Gentiles.

19 But when they deliver you up, take no thought how or what ye shall speak : for it shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak.

20 For it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you.

21 And the brother shall deliver up the brother to death, and the father the child : and the children shall rise up against their parents, and cause them to be put to death.

22 And ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake : but he that endureth to the end shall be saved.

28 And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul : but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell.

29 Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing ? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father.

30 But the very hairs of your head are all numbered.

31 Fear ye not therefore, ye are of more value than many sparrows.

32 Whosoever therefore shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven.

33 But whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven.

40 ¶ He that receiveth you receiveth me, and he that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me.

41 He that receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet, shall receive a prophet's reward ; and he that receiveth a righteous man in the name of a righteous man, shall receive a righteous man's reward.

42 And whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward.

Jesus sendeth forth Seventy Disciples.

LUKE X.

1 After these things the Lord appointed other seventy also, and sent them two and two before his face into every city and place whither he himself would come.

2 Therefore said he unto them, The harvest truly is great, but the labourers are few : pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he would send forth labourers into his harvest.

3. Go your ways : behold, I send you forth as lambs among wolves.

4 Carry neither purse, nor scrip, nor shoes : and salute no man by the way.

5 And into whatsoever house ye enter, first say, Peace be to this house.

6 And if the son of peace be there, your peace shall rest upon it ; if not, it shall turn to you again.

7 And in the same house remain, eating and drinking such things as they give : for the labourer is worthy of his hire. Go not from house to house.

8 And into whatsoever city ye enter, and they receive you, eat such things as are set before you :

9 And heal the sick that are therein, and say unto them, The kingdom of God is come nigh unto you.

10 But into whatsoever city ye enter, and they receive you not, go your ways out into the streets of the same, and say,

11 Even the very dust of your city, which cleaveth on us, we do wipe off against you : notwithstanding be ye sure of this, that the kingdom of God is come nigh unto you.

12 But I say unto you, that it shall be more tolerable in that day for Sodom, than for that city.

15 And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted to heaven, shalt be thrust down to hell.

16 He that heareth you heareth me ; and he that despiseth you despiseth me ; and he that despiseth me despiseth him that sent me.

17 ¶ And the seventy returned again with joy, saying, Lord, even the devils are subject unto us through thy name.

18 And he said unto them, I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven.

19 Behold, I give unto you power to tread on serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy : and nothing shall by any means hurt you.

20 Notwithstanding in this rejoice not, that the spirits are subject unto you ; but rather rather rejoice, because your names are written in heaven.

Little Children brought to the Lord.

LUKE XVIII.

15 ¶ And they brought unto him also infants, that he would touch them: but when his disciples saw it, they rebuked them.

16 But Jesus called them unto him, and said, suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God.

17 Verily I say unto you, Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, shall in no wise enter therein.

MARK X.

16 And he took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them.

The Necessity of Self-Denial.

MATTHEW XVI.

24 ¶ Then said Jesus unto his disciples, if any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me.

25 For whosoever will save his life shall lose it: and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it.

26 For what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?

27 For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels; and then he shall reward every man according to his works.

The Necessity of Humility.

MATTHEW XVIII.

1 At the same time came the disciples unto Jesus, saying, Who is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven?

2 And Jesus called a little child unto him, and set him in the midst of them,

3 And said, Verily I say unto you, Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven.

4 Whosoever therefore shall humble himself as this little child, the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven.

5 And whoso shall receive one such little child in my name, receiveth me.

6 But whoso shall offend one of these little ones which believe in me, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea.

The Offering of the poor Widow.

LUKE XXI.

1 And he looked up, and saw the rich men casting their gifts into the treasury.

2 And he saw also a certain poor widow casting in thither two mites.

3 And he said, Of a truth I say unto you, that this poor widow hath cast in more than they all:

4. For all these have of their abundance cast in unto the offerings of God: but she of her penury hath cast in all the living that she had.

The Necessity of Regeneration.

JOHN III.

1 There was a man of the Pharisees, named Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews:

2 The same came to Jesus by night, and said unto him, Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God: for no man can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him.

3 Jesus answered and said unto him, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.

4 Nicodemus saith unto him, How can a man be born when he is old? can he enter the second time into his mother's womb, and be born?

5 Jesus answered, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God.

6 That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit.

9. Nicodemus answered and said unto him, How can these things be?

10 Jesus answered and said unto him, Art thou a master of Israel, and knowest not these things?

11 Verily, verily, I say unto thee, We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen; and ye receive not our witness.

12 If I have told you earthly things, and ye believe not, how shall ye believe, if I tell you of heavenly things?

13 And no man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven.

14 ¶ And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up:

15 That whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life.

16 ¶ For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life.

17 For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world; but that the world through him might be saved.

18 ¶ He that believeth on him is not condemned: but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God.

19 And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil.

20 For every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved.

21 But he that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest, that they are wrought in God.

The Mercy of our Lord towards a Penitent Sinner.

LUKE VII.

36 ¶ And one of the Pharisees desired him that he would eat with him. And he went into into the Pharisee's house, and sat down to meat.

37 And, behold, a woman in the city, which was a sinner, when she knew that Jesus sat at meat in the Pharisee's house, brought an alabaster box of ointment,

38 And stood at his feet behind him weeping, and began to wash his feet with tears, and did wipe them with the hairs of her head, and kissed his feet, and anointed them with the ointment.

39 Now when the Pharisee which had bidden him saw it, he spake within himself, saying, This man, if he were a prophet, would have known who and what manner of woman this is that toucheth him: for she is a sinner.

40 And Jesus answering said unto him, Simon, I have somewhat to say unto thee. And he saith, Master, say on.

41 There was a certain creditor which had two debtors: the one owed five hundred pence, and the other fifty.

42 And when they had nothing to pay, he frankly forgave them both. Tell me therefore, which of them will love him most?

43 Simon answered and said, I suppose that he, to whom he forgave most. And he said unto him, Thou hast rightly judged.

44 And he turned to the woman, and said unto Simon, Seest thou this woman? I entered into thine house, thou gavest me no water for my feet: but she hath washed my feet with tears, and wiped them with the hairs of her head.

45 Thou gavest me no kiss: but this woman, since the time I came in, hath not ceased to kiss my feet.

46 My head with oil thou didst not anoint: but this woman hath anointed my feet with ointment.

47 Wherefore I say unto thee, Her sins, which are many, are forgiven; for she loved much; but to whom little is forgiven, the same loveth little.

48 And he said unto her, Thy sins are forgiven.

49 And they that sat at meat with him began to say within themselves, Who is this that forgiveth sins also?

50 And he said to the woman, Thy faith hath saved thee: go in peace.

MATTHEW XVIII.

15 ¶ Moreover if thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone: if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother.

16 But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established.

17 And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the Church: but if he neglect to hear the Church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a Publican.

3 ¶ Take heed to yourselves: If thy brother trespass against thee, rebuke him.

4 And if he trespass against thee seven times in a day, and seven times in a day turn again to thee, saying, I repent; thou shalt forgive him.

MATTHEW XVIII.

21 ¶ Then came Peter to him, and said, Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? till seven times?

34 A new commandment I give unto you, That ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another.

35 By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another.

Of our Duty to keep the Commandments, and the Danger of Riches.

MARK X.

17 ¶ And when he was gone forth into the way, there came one running, and kneeled to him, and asked him, Good Master, what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?

18 And Jesus said unto him, Why callest thou me good? there is none good but one, that is, God.

19 Thou knowest the commandments, Do not commit adultery, Do not kill, Do not steal, Do not bear false witness, Defraud not, Honour thy father and mother.

20 And he answered and said unto him, Master, all these have I observed from my youth.

21 Then Jesus beholding him loved him and said unto him, One thing thou lackest; go thy way, sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come, take up the cross, and follow me.

22 And he was sad at that saying, and went away grieved: for he had great possessions.

23 ¶ And Jesus looked round about, and saith unto his disciples, How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God!

24 And the disciples were astonished at his words. But Jesus answereth again, and saith unto them, Children, how hard is it for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God!

25 It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God.

26 And they were astonished out of measure, saying among themselves, Who then can be saved?

27 And Jesus looking upon them saith, With men it is impossible, but not with God, for with God all things are possible.

MATTHEW XXII.

34 But when the Pharisees had heard that he had put the Sadducees to silence, they were gathered together.

35 Then one of them, which was a lawyer, asked him a question, tempting him, and saying,

36 Master, which is the great commandment in the law?

37 Jesus said unto him, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind.

38 This is the first and great commandment.

39 And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.

MARK XII.

13 ¶ And they send unto him certain of the Pharisees and of the Herodians, to catch him in his words.

14 And when they were come, they say unto him, Master, we know that thou art true, and carest for no man: for thou regardest not the person of men, but teachest the way of God in truth: Is it lawful to give tribute to Cæsar, or not?

15. Shall we give or shall we not give? But he, knowing their hypocrisy, said unto them, Why tempt ye me? bring me a penny, that I may see it.

16 And they brought it. And he saith unto them, Whose is this image and superscription? And they said unto him, Cæsar's.

17 And Jesus answering said unto them, Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's. And they marvelled at him.

5 And he said unto them, Which of you shall have a friend, and shall go unto him at midnight, and say unto him, Friend, lend me three loaves;

6 For a friend of mine in his journey is come to me, and I have nothing to set before him?

7 And he from within shall answer and say, Trouble me not: the door is now shut, and my children are with me in bed; I cannot rise and give thee.

8 I say unto you, Though he will not rise and give him, because he is his friend, yet because of his importunity he will rise and give him as many as he needeth.

9 And I say unto you, Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and we shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you.

10 For every one that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened.

A Description of true Worship, given to the Woman of Samaria by our Saviour.

JOHN IV.

5 Then cometh he to a city of Samaria, which is called Sychar, near to the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph.

6 Now Jacob's well was there. Jesus therefore, being wearied with his journey, sat thus on the well: and it was about the sixth hour.

7 There cometh a woman of Samaria to draw water: Jesus saith unto her, Give me to drink.

8 (For his disciples were gone away unto the city to buy meat.)

9 Then saith the woman of Samaria unto him, How is it that thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me, which am a woman of Samaria? (for the Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans.)

10 Jesus answered and said unto her, If thou knewest the gift of God, and who it is that saith to thee, Give me to drink, thou wouldest have asked of him, and he would have given thee living water,

11 The woman saith unto him, Sir, thou hast nothing to draw with, and the well is deep: from whence then hast thou that living water?

12 Art thou greater than our father Jacob which gave us the well, and drank thereof himself, and his children, and his cattle?

13 Jesus answered and said unto her, Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again:

14 But whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life.

15 The woman saith unto him, Sir, give me this water, that I thirst not, neither come hither to draw.

16 Jesus saith unto her, Go, call thy husband, and come hither.

17 The woman answered and said, I have no husband. Jesus said unto her, Thou hast well said, I have no husband:

18 For thou hast had five husbands; and he whom thou now hast is not thy husband: in that saidst thou truly.

19 The woman saith unto him, Sir, I perceive that thou art a prophet.

20 Our fathers worshipped in this mountain; and ye say, that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship.

21 Jesus saith unto her, Woman believe me, the hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father.

22 Ye worship ye know not what: we know what we worship: for salvation is of the Jews.

23 But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth: for the Father seeketh such to worship him.

24 God is a Spirit: and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth.

25 The woman saith unto him, I know that Messias cometh, which is called Christ: when he is come, he will tell us all things.

26 Jesus saith unto her, I that speak unto thee am he.

27 ¶ And upon this came his disciples, and marvelled that he talked with the woman: yet no man said, What seekest thou? or, Why talkest thou with her?

28 The woman then left her waterpot, and went her way into the city, and saith to the men,

29 Come, see a man, which told me all things that ever I did: is not this the Christ?

30 Then they went out of the city, and came unto him.

31 ¶ In the mean while his disciples prayed him, saying, Master, eat.

32 But he said unto them, I have meat to eat that ye know not of.

33 Therefore said the disciples one to another, Hath any man brought him ought to eat?

34 Jesus saith unto them, My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to finish his work.

35 Say not ye, There are yet four months and then cometh harvest? behold I say unto you, Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields; for they are white already to harvest.

36 And he that reapeth receiveth wages, and gathereth fruit unto life eternal: that both he that soweth and he that reapeth may rejoice together.

37 And herein is that saying true, One soweth, and another reapeth.

38 I sent you to reap that whereon ye bestowed no labour: other men laboured, and ye are entered into their labours.

39 ¶ And many of the Samaritans of that city believed on him for the saying of the woman, which testified, He told me all that ever I did.

40 So when the Samaritans were come unto him, they besought him that he would tarry with them: and he abode there two days.

41 And many more believed because of his own word;

42 And said unto the woman, Now we believe, not because of thy saying: for we have heard him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world.

Mary is praised for her good Choice.

LUKE X.

38 ¶ Now it came to pass, as they went, that he entered into a certain village: and a certain woman named Martha received him into her house.

39 And she had a sister called Mary, which also sat at Jesus' feet, and heard his word.

40 But Martha was cumbered about much serving, and came to him, and said, Lord dost thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone? bid her therefore that she help me.

41 And Jesus answered and said unto her, Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things:

42 But one thing is needful: and Mary hath chosen that good part, which shall not be taken away from her.

The Lord declares that his Works bear Testimony of him.

JOHN V.

31 If I bear witness of myself, my witness is not true.

32 ¶ There is another that beareth witness of me; and I know that the witness which he witnesseth of me is true.

33 Ye sent unto John, and he bare witness unto the truth.

34 But I receive not testimony from man: but these things I say that ye might be saved.

35 He was a burning and a shining light: and ye were willing for a season to rejoice in his light.

36 ¶ But I have greater witness than that of John: for the works which the Father hath given me to finish, the same works that I do, bear witness of me, that the Father hath sent me.

37 And the Father himself, which hath sent me, hath borne witness of me. Ye have neither heard his voice at any time, nor seen his shape.

38 And ye have not his word abiding in you: for whom he hath sent, him ye believe not.

39 ¶ Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life: and they are they which testify of me.

40 And ye will not come to me, that ye might have life.

41 I receive not honour from men.

42 But I know you, that ye have not the love of God in you.

43 I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not: if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive.

44 How can ye believe, which receive honour one of another, and seek not the honour that cometh from God only?

Jesus Christ declareth that he is the true Bread of Life.

JOHN VI.

27 Labour not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life, which the Son of man shall give unto you: for him hath God the Father sealed.

28 Then said they unto him, What shall we do that we might work the works of God?

29 Jesus answered and said unto them, This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent.

30 They said therefore unto him, What sign shewest thou then, that we may see, and believe thee? what doest thou work?

31 Our fathers did eat manna in the desert; as it is written, He gave them bread from heaven to eat.

32 Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Moses gave you not that bread from heaven; but my Father giveth you the true bread from heaven.

33 For

33 For the bread of God is he which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world.

34 Then said they unto him, Lord, evermore give us this bread.

35 And Jesus said unto them, I am the bread of life: he that cometh to me shall never hunger; and he that believeth on me shall never thirst.

36 But I said unto you, That ye also have seen me, and believe not.

37 All that the Father giveth me shall come to me; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out.

38 For I came down from heaven not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me.

39 And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day.

40 And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life: and I will raise him up at the last day.

41 The Jews then murmured at him because he said, I am the bread which came down from heaven.

42 And they said, Is not this Jesus, the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know? how is it then that he saith, I came down from heaven?

43 Jesus therefore answered and said unto them, Murmur not among yourselves.

44 No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me, draw him: and I will raise him up at the last day.

45 It is written in the Prophets, And they shall be all taught of God. Every man therefore that hath heard, and hath learned of the Father, cometh unto me.

46 Not that any man hath seen the Father, save he which is of God: he hath seen the Father.

47 Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that believeth on me hath everlasting life.

48 I am that bread of life.

49 Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead.

50 This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof, and not die.

51 I am the living bread which came down from heaven: if any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever: and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world.

52 The Jews therefore strove among themselves, saying, How can this man give us his flesh to eat?

53 Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you.

54 Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day.

55 For my flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed.

56 He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him.

57 As the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father: so he that eateth me, even he shall live by me.

58 This is that bread which came down from heaven: not as your fathers did eat manna, and are dead: he that eateth of this bread shall live for ever.

59 These things said he in the synagogue, as he taught in Capernaum.

60 Many therefore of his disciples, when they had heard this, said, 'This is an hard saying; who can hear it?'

61 When Jesus knew in himself that his disciples murmured at it, he said unto them, Doth this offend you?

62 What and if ye shall see the Son of man ascend up where he was before?

63 It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life.

66 ¶ From that time many of his disciples went back, and walked no more with him.

67 Then said Jesus unto the twelve, Will ye also go away?

68 Then Simon Peter answered him, Lord, to whom shall we go? thou hast the words of eternal life.

69 And we believe and are sure that thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God.

The Lord declareth that he is the Fountain of Living water.

JOHN VII.

14 ¶ Now about the midst of the feast Jesus went up into the Temple and taught.

15 And the Jews marvelled, saying, How knoweth this man letters, having never learned?

16 Jesus answered them, and said, My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me.

17 If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself.

37 In the last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, saying, If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink.

38 He that believeth on me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water.

39. (But this spake he of the Spirit, which they that believe on him should receive: for the Holy Ghost was not yet given; because that Jesus was not yet glorified.)

Jesus Christ justifieth his Doctrine to the Jews.

JOHN VIII.

28 Then said Jesus unto them, When ye have lifted up the Son of man, then shall ye know that I am he, and that I do nothing of myself; but as my Father hath taught me, I speak these things.

29 And he that sent me is with me: the Father hath not left me alone; for I do always those things that please him.

30 As he spake these words, many believed on him.

31 ¶ Then said Jesus to those Jews which believed on him, If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed;

32 And ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free.

33 ¶ They answered him, We be Abraham's seed, and were never in bondage to any man: how sayest thou, Ye shall be made free?

34 Jesus answered them, Verily, verily, I say

Scripture Lessons

I say unto you, Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin.

35 And the servant abideth not in the house for ever: but the Son abideth ever.

36 If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed.

51 Verily, verily, I say unto you, If a man keep my saying, he shall never see death.

52 Then said the Jews unto him, Now we know that thou hast a devil. Abraham is dead, and the Prophets; and thou sayest, If a man keep my saying, he shall never taste of death.

53 Art thou greater than our father Abraham, which is dead? and the Prophets are dead: whom makest thou thyself?

54 Jesus answered, If I honour myself, my honour is nothing: it is my Father that honoureth me; of whom ye say, that he is your God:

55 Yet ye have not known him; but I know him: and if I should say, I know him not, I shall be a liar like unto you: but I know him, and keep his saying.

56 Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day: and he saw it, and was glad.

57 Then said the Jews unto him, Thou art not yet fifty years old, and hast thou seen Abraham?

58 Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Before Abraham was, I am.

59 Then took they up stones to cast at him: but Jesus hid himself, and went out of the Temple, going through the midst of them, and so passed by.

Jesus Christ declareth that he is the Light of the World.

JOHN VIII.

12 ¶ Then spake Jesus again unto them, saying, I am the light of the world: he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life.

JOHN XII.

35 Then Jesus said unto them, Yet a little while is the light with you. Walk while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you: for he that walketh in darkness knoweth not whither he goeth.

36 While ye have light, believe in the light, that ye may be the children of light.

46 I am come a light into the world, that whosoever believeth on me should not abide in darkness.

47 And if any man hear my words, and believe not, I judge him not; for I came not to judge the world, but to save the world.

48 He that rejecteth me, and receiveth not my words, hath one that judgeth him: the word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day.

49 For I have not spoken of myself; but the Father which sent me, he gave me a commandment, what I should say, and what I should speak.

50 And I know that his commandment is life everlasting: whatsoever I speak therefore, even as the Father said unto me, so I speak.

The Lamentation of our Lord over Jerusalem.

LUKE XIX.

41 ¶ And when he was come near, he beheld the city, and wept over it.

42 Saying, If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes.

43 For the days shall come upon thee, that thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side.

44 And shall lay thee even with the ground, and thy children within thee; and they shall not leave in thee one stone upon another; because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation.

MATTHEW XXIII.

37 O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the Prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!

38 Behold your house is left unto you desolate.

39 For I say unto you, Ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.

Of the Last Judgment.

MATTHEW XXV.

31 ¶ When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory:

32 And before him shall be gathered all nations: and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats:

33 And he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left.

34 Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world:

35 For I was an hungred, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me in:

36 Naked, and ye clothed me: I was sick, and ye visited me: I was in prison, and ye came unto me.

37 Then shall the righteous answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee an hungred, and fed thee? or thirsty, and gave thee drink?

38 When saw we thee a stranger, and took thee in? or naked, and clothed thee?

39 Or when saw we thee sick, or in prison, and came unto thee?

40 And the King shall answer and say unto them, Verily, I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.

41 Then shall he say also unto them on the left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels:

42 For I was an hungred, and ye gave me no meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me no drink:

43 I was a stranger, and ye took me not in: naked, and ye clothed me not: sick, and in prison, and ye visited me not.

44 Then shall they also answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee an hungred, or athirst, or a stranger, or naked, or sick, or in prison, and did not minister unto thee?

45 Then

45 Then shall he answer them, saying, Verily, I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me.

46 And these shall go away into everlasting punishment: but the righteous into life eternal.

MIRACLES OF OUR LORD.

The Centurion's Servant healed.

MATTHEW VIII.

5 ¶ And when Jesus was entered into Capernaum, there came unto him a centurion, beseeching him,

6 And saying, Lord, my servant lieth at home sick of the palsy, grievously tormented.

7 And Jesus saith unto him, I will come and heal him.

8 The centurion answered and said, Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldst come under my roof: but speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed.

9 For I am a man under authority, having soldiers under me: and I say to this man, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant, Do this, and he doeth it.

10 When Jesus heard it, he marvelled, and said to them that followed, Verily, I say unto you, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel.

11 And I say unto you, That many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven.

12 But the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

13 And Jesus said unto the centurion, Go thy way; and as thou hast believed, so be it done unto thee. And his servant was healed in the selfsame hour.

The Tempest appeased.

MARK IV.

35 And the same day, when the even was come, he saith unto them, Let us pass over unto the other side.

36 And when they had sent away the multitude, they took him even as he was in the ship. And there were also with him other little ships.

37 And there arose a great storm of wind, and the waves beat into the ship, so that it was now full.

38 And he was in the hinder part of the ship, asleep on a pillow: and they awake him, and say unto him, Master, carest thou not that we perish?

39 And he arose, and rebuked the wind, and said unto the sea, Peace, be still. And the wind ceased, and there was a great calm.

40 And he said unto them, Why are ye so fearful? how is it that ye have no faith?

41 And they feared exceedingly, and said one to another, What manner of man is this, that even the wind and the sea obey him.

Christ feedeth the Multitude by a Miracle.

MATTHEW XIV.

14 And Jesus went forth, and saw a great multitude, and was moved with compassion toward them, and he healed their sick.

510.

15 ¶ And when it was evening, his disciples came to him, saying, This is a desert place, and the time is now past: send the multitude away, that they may go into the villages, and buy themselves victuals.

16 But Jesus said unto them, They need not depart; give ye them to eat.

17 And they say unto him, We have here but five loaves, and two fishes.

18 He said, Bring them hither to me.

19 And he commanded the multitude to sit down on the grass, and took the five loaves, and the two fishes, and looking up to heaven, he blessed, and brake, and gave the loaves to his disciples, and the disciples to the multitude.

20 And they did all eat, and were filled: and they took up of the fragments that remained twelve baskets full.

21 And they that had eaten were about five thousand men, beside women and children.

Our Lord walketh upon the Sea.

MATTHEW XIV.

22 ¶ And straightway Jesus constrained his disciples to get into a ship, and to go before him unto the other side, while he sent the multitudes away.

23 And when he had sent the multitudes away, he went up into a mountain apart to pray: and when the evening was come, he was there alone.

24 But the ship was now in the midst of the sea, tossed with waves: for the wind was contrary.

25 And in the fourth watch of the night Jesus went unto them, walking on the sea.

26 And when the disciples saw him walking on the sea, they were troubled, saying, It is a spirit: and they cried out for fear.

27 But straightway Jesus spake unto them, saying, Be of good cheer; it is I; be not afraid.

28 And Peter answered him and said, Lord, if it be thou, bid me come unto thee on the water.

29 And he said, Come. And when Peter was come down out of the ship, he walked on the water, to go to Jesus.

30 But when he saw the wind boisterous, he was afraid; and beginning to sink, he cried, saying, Lord, save me.

31 And immediately Jesus stretched forth his hand, and caught him, and said unto him, O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?

32 And when they were come into the ship, the wind ceased.

33 Then they that were in the ship came and worshipped him, saying, Of a truth thou art the Son of God.

The Lord raiseth the Daughter of Jairus from the Dead.

MARK V.

22 And, behold, there cometh one of the rulers of the synagogue, Jairus by name; and when he saw him, he fell at his feet.

23 And besought him greatly, saying, My little daughter lieth at the point of death: I pray thee, come and lay thy hands on her, that she may be healed; and she shall live.

K 3

24 And

Scripture Lessons.

24 And Jesus went with him; and much people followed him, and thronged him.

35 ¶ While he yet spake, there came from the ruler of the synagogue's house certain which said, Thy daughter is dead: why troublest thou the Master any further?

36 As soon as Jesus heard the word that was spoken, he saith unto the ruler of the synagogue, Be not afraid, only believe.

37 And he suffered no man to follow him, save Peter, and James, and John the brother of James.

38 And he cometh to the house of the ruler of the synagogue, and seeth the tumult, and them that wept and wailed greatly.

39 And when he was come in, he saith unto them, Why make ye this ado, and weep? the damsel is not dead, but sleepeth.

40 And they laughed him to scorn. But when he had put them all out, he taketh the father and the mother of the damsel, and them that were with him, and entereth in where the damsel was lying.

41 And he took the damsel by the hand, and said unto her, Talitha cumi; which is, being interpreted, Damsel, I say unto thee, Arise.

42. And straightway the damsel arose, and walked; for she was of the age of twelve years. And they were astonished with a great astonishment.

43 And he charged them straitly that no man should know it; and commanded that something should be given her to eat.

The Infirm Woman cured.

LUKE XIII.

10 And he was teaching in one of the synagogues on the sabbath.

11 ¶ And, behold, there was a woman which had a spirit of infirmity eighteen years, and was bowed together, and could in no wise lift up herself.

12 And when Jesus saw her, he called her to him, and said unto her, Woman thou art loosed from thine infirmity.

13 And he laid his hands on her: and immediately she was made straight, and glorified God.

14 And the ruler of the synagogue answered with indignation, because that Jesus had healed on the sabbath day, and said unto the people, There are six days in which men ought to work: in them therefore come and be healed, and not on the sabbath day.

15 The Lord then answered him, and said, Thou hypocrite, doth not each one of you on the sabbath loose his ox or his ass from the stall, and lead him away to watering?

16 And ought not this woman, being a daughter of Abraham, whom Satan hath bound, lo, these eighteen years, be loosed from this bond on the sabbath day?

17 And when he had said these things, all his adversaries were ashamed: and all the people rejoiced for all the glorious things that were done by him.

A Man with a Withered Hand cured.

MATTHEW XII.

9 And when he was departed thence, he went into their synagogue:

10 ¶ And, behold, there was a man which had his hand withered. And they asked him, saying, Is it lawful to heal on the sabbath days? that they might accuse him.

11 And he said unto them, What man shall there be among you, that shall have one sheep, and if it fall into a pit on the sabbath day, will he not lay hold on it, and lift it out?

12 How much then is a man better than a sheep? Wherefore it is lawful to do well on the sabbath days.

13 Then saith he to the man, Stretch forth thine hand. And he stretched it forth; and it was restored whole, like as the other.

Christ healeth the Daughter of a Woman of Canaan.

MATTHEW XV.

21 ¶ Then Jesus went thence, and departed into the coasts of Tyre and Sidon.

22 And, behold, a woman of Canaan came out of the same coasts, and cried unto him, saying, Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou Son of David; my daughter is grievously vexed with a devil.

23 But he answered her not a word. And his disciples came and besought him, saying, Send her away; for she crieth after us.

24 But he answered and said, I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel.

25 Then came she and worshipped him, saying, Lord, help me.

26 But he answered and said, It is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it to dogs.

27 And she said, Truth, Lord: yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their master's table.

28 Then Jesus answered and said unto her, O woman, great is thy faith: be it unto thee even as thou wilt. And her daughter was made whole from that very hour.

The Lord cureth a Lunatic.

MATTHEW XVII.

14 ¶ And when they were come to the multitude, there came to him a certain man kneeling down to him, and saying,

15 Lord, have mercy on my son: for he is lunatick, and sore vexed: for oft times he falleth into the fire, and oft into the water.

16 And I brought him to thy disciples and they could not cure him.

17 Then Jesus answered and said, O faithless and perverse generation, how long shall I be with you? how long shall I suffer you? bring him hither to me.

18 And Jesus rebuked the devil; and he departed out of him: and the child was cured from that very hour.

19 Then came the disciples to Jesus apart, and said, Why could not we cast him out?

20 And Jesus said unto them, Because of your unbelief: for verily I say unto you, If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place; and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you.

21 Howbeit this kind goeth not out but by prayer and fasting.

The Lord restoreth to Bartimeus his Sight.

MARK X.

46 ¶ And they came to Jericho: and as he went out of Jericho with his disciples and a great number of people, blind Bartimeus, the son of Timeus, sat by the highway side begging.

47 And when he heard that it was Jesus of Nazareth, he began to cry out, and say, Jesus, thou Son of David, have mercy on me.

48 And many charged him that he should hold his peace: but he cried the more a great deal, Thou Son of David have mercy on me.

49 And Jesus stood still, and commanded him to be called. And they called the blind man, saying unto him, Be of good comfort, rise; he calleth thee.

50 And he, casting away his garment, rose, and came to Jesus.

51 And Jesus answered and said unto him, What wilt thou that I should do unto thee? The blind man said unto him, Lord, that I might receive my sight.

52 And Jesus said unto him, Go thy way; thy faith hath made thee whole. And immediately he received his sight, and followed Jesus in the way.

The Lord healeth the Deaf and Dumb.

MARK VII.

32 And they bring unto him one that was deaf, and had an impediment in his speech; and they beseech him to put his hand upon him.

33 And he took him aside from the multitude, and put his fingers into his ears, and he spit, and touched his tongue;

34 And looking up to heaven, he sighed, and saith unto him, Ephphatha, that is, Be opened.

35 And straightway his ears were opened, and the string of his tongue was loosed, and he spake plain.

36 And he charged them that they should tell no man: but the more he charged them, so much the more a great deal they published it;

37 And were beyond measure astonished, saying, He hath done all things well: he maketh both the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak.

The Miraculous Draught of Fishes.

LUKE V.

1 And it came to pass, that, as the people pressed upon him to hear the word of God, he stood by the lake of Gennesaret,

2 And saw two ships standing by the lake: but the fishermen were gone out of them, and were washing their nets.

3 And he entered into one of the ships, which was Simon's, and prayed him that he would thrust out a little from the land. And he sat down, and taught the people out of the ship.

4 Now when he had left speaking, he said unto Simon, Launch out into the deep, and let down your nets for a draught.

5 And Simon answering, said unto him, 510.

Master, we have toiled all the night, and have taken nothing: nevertheless, at thy word I will let down the net.

6 And when they had this done, they enclosed a great multitude of fishes: and their net brake.

7 And they beckoned unto their partners, which were in the other ship, that they should come and help them. And they came, and filled both the ships, so that they began to sink.

8 When Simon Peter saw it, he fell down at Jesus' knees, saying, Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, O Lord.

9 For he was astonished, and all that were with him, at the draught of the fishes which they had taken:

10 And so was also James, and John, the sons of Zebedee, which were partners with Simon. And Jesus said unto Simon, Fear not; from henceforth thou shalt catch men.

11 And when they had brought their ships to land, they forsook all, and followed him.

The Lord healeth one sick of the Palsy.

LUKE V.

17 And it came to pass on a certain day, as he was teaching, that there were Pharisees and doctors of the law sitting by, which were come out of every town of Galilee, and Judæa, and Jerusalem: and the power of the Lord was present to heal them.

18 ¶ And, behold, men brought in a bed a man which was taken with a palsy: and they sought means to bring him in, and to lay him before him.

19 And when they could not find by what way they might bring him in because of the multitude, they went upon the house top, and let him down through the tiling, with his couch, into the midst before Jesus.

20 And when he saw their faith, he said unto him, Man, thy sins are forgiven thee.

21 And the Scribes and the Pharisees began to reason, saying, Who is this which speaketh blasphemies? Who can forgive sins, but God alone?

22 But when Jesus perceived their thoughts, he answering, said unto them, What reason ye in your hearts?

23 Whether is easier, to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Rise up and walk?

24 But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power upon earth to forgive sins, (he said unto the sick of the palsy), I say unto thee, Arise, and take up thy couch, and go into thine house.

25 And immediately he rose up before them, and took up that whereon he lay, and departed to his own house, glorifying God.

26 And they were all amazed, and they glorified God, and were filled with fear, saying, We have seen strange things to day.

He raiseth the Widow's Son.

LUKE VII.

11 ¶ And it came to pass the day after, that he went into a city called Nain; and many of his disciples went with him, and much people.

12 Now when he came nigh to the gate of the city, behold, there was a dead man carried out, the only son of his mother, and she was a widow : and much people of the city was with her.

Scripture Lessons.

13 And when the Lord saw her, he had compassion on her, and said unto her, Weep not.

14 And he came and touched the bier : and they that bare him stood still. And he said, Young man, I say unto thee, Arise.

15 And he that was dead sat up, and began to speak. And he delivered him to his mother.

16 And there came a fear on all : and they glorified God, saying, That a great prophet is risen up among us ; and, That God hath visited his people.

Ten Lepers cured.

LUKE XVII.

11 ¶ And it came to pass, as he went to Jerusalem, that he passed through the midst of Samaria and Galilee.

12 And as he entered into a certain village, there met him ten men that were lepers, which stood afar off :

13 And they lifted up their voices, and said, Jesus, Master, have mercy on us.

14 And when he saw them, he said unto them, Go shew yourselves unto the Priests. And it came to pass, that, as they went, they were cleansed.

15 And one of them, when he saw that he was healed, turned back, and with a loud voice glorified God,

16 And fell down on his face at his feet, giving him thanks : and he was a Samaritan.

17 And Jesus answering said, Were there not ten cleansed ? but where are the nine ?

18 There are not found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger.

19 And he said unto him, Arise, go thy way : thy faith hath made thee whole.

Jesus Christ cureth a Man who had been blind from his Birth.

JOHN IX.

1 And as Jesus passed by, he saw a man which was blind from his birth.

2. And his disciples asked him, saying, Master, who did sin, this man, or his parents, that he was born blind ?

3 Jesus answered, Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents : but that the works of God should be made manifest in him.

4 I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day : the night cometh, when no man can work.

5 As long as I am in the world, I am the light of the world.

6 When he had thus spoken, he spat on the ground, and made clay of the spittle, and he anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay,

7 And said unto him, Go, wash in the pool of Siloam, (which is, by interpretation, Sent). He went his way therefore, and washed, and came seeing.

8 ¶ The neighbours therefore, and they which before had seen him that he was blind, said, Is not this he that sat and begged ?

9 Some said, This is he : others said, He is like him : but he said, I am he.

10 Therefore said they unto him, How were thine eyes opened ?

11 He answered and said, A man that is called Jesus, made clay, and anointed mine eyes, and said unto me, Go to the pool of Siloam, and wash : and I went and washed, and I received sight.

12 Then said they unto him, Where is he ? He said, I know not.

13 ¶ They brought to the Pharisees him that aforetime was blind.

14 And it was the sabbath day when Jesus made the clay, and opened his eyes.

15 Then again the Pharisees also asked him how he had received his sight. He said unto them, He put clay upon mine eyes, and I washed, and do see.

16 Therefore said some of the Pharisees, This man is not of God, because he keepeth not the sabbath day. Others said, How can a man that is a sinner do such miracles ? And there was a division among them.

17 They say unto the blind man again, What sayest thou of him, that he hath opened thine eyes ? He said, He is a prophet.

18 But the Jews did not believe concerning him, that he had been blind, and received his sight, until they called the parents of him that had received his sight.

19 And they asked them, saying, Is this your son, who ye say was born blind ? how then doth he now see ?

20 His parents answered them, and said, We know that this is our son, and that he was born blind :

21 But by what means he now seeth, we know not ; or who hath opened his eyes, we know not : he is of age ; ask him : he shall speak for himself.

22 These words spake his parents, because they feared the Jews : for the Jews had agreed already, that if any man did confess that he was Christ, he should be put out of the synagogue.

23 Therefore, said his parents, He is of age ; ask him.

24 Then again called they the man that was blind, and said unto him, Give God the praise : we know that this man is a sinner.

25 He answered and said, Whether he be a sinner or no, I know not : one thing I know, that, whereas I was blind, now I see.

26 Then said they to him again, What did he to thee ? how opened he thine eyes ?

27 He answered them, I have told you already, and ye did not hear : wherefore would ye hear it again ? will ye also be his disciples ?

28 Then they reviled him, and said, Thou art his disciple ; but we are Moses' disciples.

29 We know that God spake unto Moses : as for this fellow, we know not from whence he is.

30. The man answered, and said unto them, Why herein is a marvellous thing, that ye know not from whence he is, and yet he hath opened mine eyes.

31 Now we know that God heareth not sinners : but if any man be a worshipper of God, and doeth his will, him he heareth.

32 Since the world began, was it not heard heard that any man opened the eyes of one that was born blind.

33 If this man were not of God, he could do nothing.

34 They answered, and said unto him, Thou wast altogether born in sins, and dost thou teach us? And they cast him out.

35 Jesus heard that they had cast him out; and when he had found him, he said unto him, Dost thou believe on the Son of God?

36 He answered and said, Who is he Lord, that I might believe on him?

37 And Jesus said unto him, Thou hast both seen, him and it is he that talketh with thee.

38 And he said, Lord, I believe. And he worshipped him.

Jesus Christ raiseth Lazarus.

JOHN XI.

1 Now a certain man was sick, named Lazarus, of Bethany, the town of Mary and her sister Martha.

2 (It was that Mary which anointed the Lord with ointment, and wiped his feet with her hair, whose brother Lazarus was sick.)

3 Therefore his sisters sent unto him, saying, Lord, behold, he whom thou lovest is sick.

4 When Jesus heard that, he said, This sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of God might be glorified thereby.

5 Now Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus.

6 When he had heard therefore that he was sick, he abode two days still in the same place where he was.

7 Then after that, saith he to his disciples, Let us go into Judæa again.

8 His disciples say unto him, Master, the Jews of late sought to stone thee; and goest thou thither again?

9 Jesus answered, Are there not twelve hours in the day? If any man walk in the day, he stumbleth not, because he seeth the light of this world.

10 But if a man walk in the night, he stumbleth, because there is no light in him.

11 These things said he: and after that he saith unto them, Our friend Lazarus sleepeth; but I go, that I may awake him out of sleep.

12 Then said his disciples, Lord, if he sleep, he shall do well.

13 Howbeit Jesus spake of his death: but they thought that he had spoken of taking of rest in sleep.

14 Then said Jesus unto them plainly, Lazarus is dead.

15 And I am glad for your sakes that I was not there, to the intent ye may believe; nevertheless let us go unto him.

16 Then said Thomas, which is called Didymus, unto his fellow-disciples, Let us also go, that we may die with him.

17 Then when Jesus came, he found that he had lain in the grave four days already.

18 Now Bethany was nigh unto Jerusalem, about fifteen furlongs off:

19 And many of the Jews came to Martha and Mary, to comfort them concerning their brother.

510.

20 Then Martha, as soon as she heard that Jesus was coming, went and met him: but Mary sat still in the house.

21 Then said Martha unto Jesus, Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died.

22 But I know, that even now, whatsoever thou wilt ask of God, God will give it thee.

23 Jesus saith unto her, Thy brother shall rise again.

24 Martha saith unto him, I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day.

25 Jesus said unto her, I am the resurrection, and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live:

26 And whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die. Believest thou this?

27 She saith unto him, Yea, Lord: I believe that thou art the Christ, the Son of God, which should come into the world.

28 And when she had so said, she went her way, and called Mary her sister secretly, saying, The Master is come, and calleth for thee.

29 As soon as she heard that, she arose quickly, and came unto him.

30 Now Jesus was not yet come into the town, but was in that place where Martha met him.

31 The Jews then which were with her in the house, and comforted her, when they saw Mary, that she rose up hastily and went out, followed her, saying, She goeth unto the grave to weep there.

32 Then when Mary was come where Jesus was, and saw him, she fell down at his feet, saying unto him, Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died.

33 When Jesus therefore saw her weeping, and the Jews also weeping which came with her, he groaned in the spirit, and was troubled,

34 And said, where have ye laid him? They say unto him, Lord, come and see.

35 Jesus wept.

36 Then said the Jews, Behold how he loved him!

37 And some of them said, Could not this man, which opened the eyes of the blind, have caused that even this man should not have died?

38 Jesus therefore again groaning in himself, cometh to the grave. It was a cave, and a stone lay upon it.

39. Jesus said, Take ye away the stone. Martha, the sister of him that was dead, saith unto him, Lord, by this time he stinketh; for he hath been dead four days.

40 Jesus saith unto her, Said I not unto thee, that, if thou wouldest believe, thou shouldest see the glory of God?

41 Then they took away the stone from the place where the dead was laid. And Jesus lifted up his eyes, and said, Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me.

42 And I knew that thou hearest me always: but because of the people which stand by I said it, that they may believe that thou hast sent me.

43 And when he thus had spoken, he cried with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth.

44 And he that was dead came forth, bound hand and foot with grave-clothes : and his face was bound about with a napkin. Jesus saith unto them, Loose him, and let him go.

John sendeth his disciples to Christ, who beareth Testimony of him.

LUKE III.

19 But Herod the tetrarch, being reprov'd by him for Herodias his brother Philip's wife, and for all the evils which Herod had done,

22 Added yet this above all, that he shut up John in prison.

MATTHEW XI.

2 Now when John had heard in the prison the works of Christ, he sent two of his disciples,

3 And said unto him, Art thou he that should come, or do we look for another ?

4 Jesus answered, and said unto them, Go and shew John again those things which ye do hear and see :

5 The blind received their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the Gospel preached to them.

6 And blessed is he, whosoever shall not be offended in me.

7 ¶ And as they departed, Jesus began to say unto the multitudes concerning John, What went ye out into the wilderness to see ? A reed shaken with the wind ?

8 But what went ye out for to see ? A man clothed in soft raiment ? behold, they that wear soft clothing are in king's houses.

9 But what went ye out for to see ? A prophet ? yea, I say unto you, and more than a prophet.

10 For this is he, of whom it is written, Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee.

11 Verily, I say unto you, Among them that are born of women, there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist : notwithstanding, he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he.

The Death of John the Baptist.

MARK VI.

21 And when a convenient day was come, that Herod on his birth-day made a supper to his lords, high captains, and chief estates of Galilee ;

22 And when the daughter of the said Herodias came in, and danced, and pleased Herod and them that sat with him, the king said unto the damsel, Ask of me whatsoever thou wilt, and I will give it thee.

23 And he sware unto her, Whatsoever thou shalt ask of me, I will give it thee, unto the half of my kingdom.

24 And she went forth, and said unto her mother, What shall I ask ? And she said, The head of John the Baptist.

25 And she came in straightway with haste unto the king, and asked, saying, I will that thou give me by and by in a charger, the head of John the Baptist.

26 And the king was exceeding sorry ; yet for his oath's sake, and for their sakes which sat with him, he would not reject her.

27 And immediately the king sent an executioner, and commanded his head to be brought : and he went and beheaded him in the prison.

28 And brought his head in a charger, and gave it to the damsel : and the damsel gave it to her mother.

29 And when his disciples heard of it, they came and took up his corpse, and laid it in a tomb.

PARABLES OF OUR LORD.

The Parable of the Sower.

MATTHEW XIII.

1 The same day went Jesus out of the house, and sat by the sea side.

2 And great multitudes were gathered together unto him, so that he went into a ship, and sat ; and the whole multitude stood on the shore.

3 And he spake many things unto them in parables, saying, Behold, a sower went forth to sow ;

4 And when he sowed, [some seed fell by the way side, and the fowls came and devoured them up :

5 Some fell upon stony places, where they had not much earth : and forthwith they sprung up, because they had no deepness of earth :

6 And when the sun was up, they were scorched ; and because they had no root, they withered away.

7 And some fell among thorns ; and the thorns sprung up, and choked them.

8 But other fell into good ground, and brought forth fruit, some an hundredfold, some sixtyfold, some thirtyfold.

9 Who hath ears to hear, let him hear.

18 ¶ Hear ye therefore the parable of the sower.

19 When any one heareth the word of the kingdom, and understandeth it not, then cometh the wicked one, and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart. This is he which received seed by the way side.

20 But he that received the seed into stony places, the same is he that heareth the word, and anon with joy receiveth it ;

21 Yet hath he not root in himself, but dureth for awhile : for when tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the word, by and by he is offended.

22 He also that received seed among the thorns, is he that heareth the word, and the care of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, choke the word, and he becometh unfruitful.

23 But he that received seed into the good ground, is he that heareth the word, and understandeth it ; which also beareth fruit, and bringeth forth, some an hundredfold, some sixty, some thirty.

Of the Tares.

MATTHEW XIII.

24 ¶ Another parable put he forth unto them saying, The kingdom of heaven is likened likened unto a man which sowed good seed in his field :

25 But while men slept, his enemy came and sowed tares among the wheat, and went his way.

26 But when the blade was sprung up, and brought forth fruit, then appeared the tares also.

27 So the servants of the householder came and said unto him, Sir, didst not thou sow good seed in thy field? from whence then hath it tares?

28 He said unto them, An enemy hath done this. The servants said unto him, Wilt thou then that we go and gather them up?

29 But he said, Nay; lest while ye gather up the tares, ye root up also the wheat with them.

30 Let both grow together until the harvest: and in the time of harvest I will say to the reapers, Gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them: but gather the wheat into my barn.

36 Then Jesus sent the multitude away, and went into the house; and his disciples came unto him, saying, Declare unto us the parable of the tares of the field.

37 He answered and said unto them, He that soweth the good seed is the Son of man;

38 The field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom; but the tares are the children of the wicked one.

39 The enemy that sowed them is the devil; the harvest is the end of the world; and the reapers are the angels.

40 As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire; so shall it be in the end of this world.

41 The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity;

42 And shall cast them into a furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth.

43 Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. Who hath ears to hear, let him hear.

Of the Hidden Treasure.

MATTHEW XIII.

44 ¶ Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto treasure hid in a field; the which when a man hath found, he hideth, and for joy thereof goeth and selleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field.

45 ¶ Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchantman, seeking goodly pearls;

46 Who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had, and bought it.

Of the Unmerciful Creditor.

MATTHEW XVIII.

23 ¶ Therefore is the kingdom of heaven likened unto a certain king, which would take account of his servants.

24 And when he had begun to reckon, one was brought unto him, which owed him ten thousand talents.

25 But for as much as he had not to pay, his lord commanded him to be sold, and his wife, and children, and all that he had, and payment to be made.

510.

26 The servant therefore fell down, and worshipped him, saying, Lord, have patience with me, and I will pay thee all.

27 Then the lord of that servant was moved with compassion, and loosed him, and forgave him the debt.

28 But the same servant went out, and found one of his fellow-servants, which owed him an hundred pence: and he laid hands on him, and took him by the throat, saying, Pay me that thou owest.

29 And his fellow-servant fell down at his feet, and besought him, saying, Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all.

30 And he would not: but went and cast him into prison till he should pay the debt.

31 So when his fellow-servants saw what was done, they were very sorry, and came and told unto their lord all that was done.

32 Then his lord, after that he had called him, said unto him, O thou wicked servant, I forgave thee all that debt, because thou desiredst me:

33 Shouldest not thou also have had compassion on thy fellow-servant, even as I had pity on thee?

34 And his lord was wroth, and delivered him to the tormentors, till he should pay all that was due unto him.

35 So likewise shall my heavenly Father do also unto you, if ye from your hearts forgive not every one his brother their trespasses.

Of the Ten Virgins.

MATTHEW XXV.

1 Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom.

2 And five of them were wise, and five were foolish.

3 They that were foolish took their lamps, and took no oil with them.

4 But the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps.

5 While the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept.

6 And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him.

7 Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps.

8 And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil; for our lamps are gone out.

9 But the wise answered, saying, Not so; lest there be not enough for us and you: but go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves.

10 And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage: and the door was shut.

11 Afterward came also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open to us.

12 But he answered and said, Verily, I say unto you, I know you not.

13 Watch, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh.

The Talents.

MATTHEW XXV.

14 ¶ For the kingdom of heaven is as a man travelling into a far country, who called his own servants, and delivered unto them his goods.

15 And unto one he gave five talents, to another two, and to another one; to every man according to his several ability; and straightway took his journey.

16 Then he that had received the five talents went and traded with the same, and made them other five talents.

17 And likewise he that had received two, he also gained other two.

18 But he that had received one, went and digged in the earth, and hid his lord's money.

19 After a long time the lord of those servants cometh, and reckoneth with them.

20 And so he that had received five talents came and brought other five talents, saying, Lord, thou deliveredst unto me five talents: behold I have gained besides them five talents more.

21 His lord said unto him, Well done, thou good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord.

22 He also that had received two talents came and said, Lord, thou deliveredst unto me two talents: behold, I have gained two other talents besides them.

23 His lord said unto him, Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord.

24 Then he which had received the one talent came and said, Lord, I knew thee that thou art an hard man, reaping where thou hast not sown, and gathering where thou hast not strawed:

25 And I was afraid, and went and hid thy talent in the earth: lo, there thou hast that is thine.

26 His lord answered and said unto him, Thou wicked and slothful servant, thou knewest that I reap where I sowed not, and gather where I have not strawed;

27 Thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers, and then at my coming I should have received mine own with usury.

28 Take therefore the talent from him, and give it unto him which hath ten talents.

29 For unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance: but from him that hath not, shall be taken away even that which he hath.

30 And cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

The Good Samaritan.

LUKE X.

25 ¶ And, behold, a certain lawyer stood up, and tempted him, saying, Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?

26 He said unto him, What is written in the law? how readest thou?

27 And he answering said, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbour as thyself.

28 And he said unto him, Thou hast answered right; this do, and thou shalt live.

29 But he, willing to justify himself, said unto Jesus, And who is my neighbour?

30 And Jesus answering said, A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves, which stripped him of his raiment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead.

31 And by chance there came down a certain Priest that way: and when he saw him, he passed by on the other side.

32 And likewise a Levite, when he was at the place, came and looked on him, and passed by on the other side.

33 But a certain Samaritan, as he journeyed, came where he was: and when he saw him, he had compassion on him.

34 And went to him, and bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and set him on his own beast, and brought him to an inn, and took care of him.

35 And on the morrow when he departed, he took out two pence, and gave them to the host, and said unto him, Take care of him; and whatsoever thou spendest more, when I come again, I will repay thee.

36 Which now of these three, thinkest thou, was neighbour unto him that fell among the thieves?

37 And he said, He that shewed mercy on him. Then said Jesus unto him, Go, and do thou likewise.

Upon Avarice.

LUKE XII.

15 And he said unto them, Take heed, and beware of covetousness: for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth.

16. And he spake a parable unto them, saying, The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully:

17 And he thought within himself, saying, What shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits?

18 And he said, This will I do: I will pull down my barns, and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods.

19 And I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry.

20 But God said unto him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee: then whose shall those things be, which thou hast provided?

21 So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God.

The Barren Fig-Tree.

LUKE XIII.

6 ¶ He spake also this parable: A certain man had a fig-tree planted in his vineyard; and he came and sought fruit thereon, and found none.

7 Then

7 Then said he unto the dresser of his vineyard, Behold, these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig-tree, and find none: cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground?

8 And he answering said unto him, Lord, let it alone this year also, till I shall dig about it, and dung it:

9 And if it bear fruit, well: and if not, then after that thou shalt cut it down.

The Lost Sheep.

MATTHEW XVIII.

10 Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones; for I say unto you, That in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven.

11 For the Son of man is come to save that which was lost.

12 How think ye? if a man have an hundred sheep, and one of them be gone astray, doth he not leave the ninety and nine, and goeth into the mountains, and seeketh that which is gone astray?

13 And if so be that he find it, verily I say unto you, he rejoiceth more of that sheep, than of the ninety and nine which went not astray.

14 Even so it is not the will of your Father which is in heaven, that one of these little ones should perish.

The Prodigal Son.

LUKE XV.

11 ¶ And he said, A certain man had two sons.

12. And the younger of them said to his father, Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth to me. And he divided unto them his living.

13 And not many days after the younger son gathered all together, and took his journey into a far country, and there wasted his substance with riotous living.

14. And when he had spent all, there arose a mighty famine in that land; and he began to be in want.

15 And he went and joined himself to a citizen of that country; and he sent him into his fields to feed swine.

16 And he would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat: and no man gave unto him.

17 And when he came to himself, he said, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger!

18 I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee,

19 And am no more worthy to be called thy son: make me as one of thy hired servants.

20 And he arose, and came to his father. But when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him.

21 And the son said unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son.

22 But the father said to his servants, Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet:

510.

23 And bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it; and let us eat, and be merry:

24 For this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found. And they began to be merry.

25 Now his elder son was in the field: and as he came and drew nigh to the house, he heard musick and dancing.

26 And he called one of the servants, and asked what these things meant.

27 And he said unto him, Thy brother is come; and thy father hath killed the fatted calf, because he hath received him safe and sound.

28 And he was angry, and would not go in: therefore came his father out, and entreated him.

29 And he answering said to his father, Lo, these many years do I serve thee, neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment: and yet thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends:

30 But as soon as this thy son was come, which has devoured thy living with harlots, thou hast killed for him the fatted calf.

31 And he said unto him, Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine.

32 It was meet that we should make merry, and be glad: for this thy brother was dead, and is alive again; and was lost, and is found.

The Rich Man and Lazarus.

LUKE XVI.

19 ¶ There was a certain rich man, which was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day:

20 And there was a certain beggar named Lazarus, which was laid at his gate, full of sores,

21 And desiring to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table: moreover, the dogs came and licked his sores.

22 And it came to pass, that the beggar died, and was carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom: the rich man also died, and was buried;

23 And in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torments, and seeth Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom.

24 And he cried and said, Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue; for I am tormented in this flame.

25 But Abraham said, Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things: but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented.

26 And besides all this, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed: so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot; neither can they pass to us, that would come from thence.

27 Then he said, I pray thee therefore, father, that thou wouldest send him to my father's house:

28 For I have five brethren; that he may testify unto them, lest they also come into this place of torment.

Scripture Lessons.

29 Abraham saith unto him, They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them.

31 If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead.

Of the Pharisee and Publican.

LUKE XVIII.

9 And he spake this parable unto certain which trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others:

10 Two men went up into the temple to pray; the one a Pharisee, and the other a Publican.

11 The Pharisee stood and prayed thus with himself, God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this Publican.

12 I fast twice in the week, I give tithes of all that I possess.

13 And the Publican, standing afar off, would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven, but smote upon his breast, saying, God be merciful to me a sinner.

14 I tell you, this man went down to his house justified rather than the other: for every one that exalteth himself shall be abased; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted.

Jesus Christ the Good Shepherd.

JOHN X.

1 Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that entereth not by the door into the sheepfold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber.

2 But he that entereth in by the door, is the shepherd of the sheep.

3 To him the porter openeth; and the sheep hear his voice: and he calleth his own sheep by name, and leadeth them out.

4 And when he putteth forth his own sheep, he goeth before them, and the sheep follow him: for they know his voice.

5 And a stranger will they not follow, but will flee from him: for they know not the voice of strangers.

6 This parable spake Jesus unto them; but they understood not what things they were which he spake unto them.

7 Then said Jesus unto them again, Verily, verily, I say unto you, I am the door of the sheep.

8 All that ever came before me are thieves and robbers: but the sheep did not hear them.

9 I am the door: by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out, and find pasture.

10 The thief cometh not, but for to steal, and to kill, and to destroy: I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly.

11 I am the good shepherd: the good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep.

12 But he that is an hireling, and not the shepherd, whose own the sheep are not, seeth the wolf coming, and leaveth the sheep, and fleeth: and the wolf catcheth them, and scattereth the sheep.

13 The hireling fleeth, because he is an hireling, and careth not for the sheep.

14 I am the good shepherd, and know my sheep, and am known of mine.

15 As the Father knoweth me, even so know I the Father: and I lay down my life for the sheep,

16 And other sheep I have, which are not of this fold: them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold, and one shepherd.

17 Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life, that I might take it again.

18 No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment have I received of my Father.

19 ¶ There was a division therefore again among the Jews for these sayings.

20 And many of them said, He hath a devil, and is mad; why hear ye him?

21 Others said, these are not the words of him that hath a devil. Can a devil open the eyes of the blind?

22 ¶ And it was at Jerusalem the feast of the dedication, and it was winter.

23 And Jesus walked in the temple in Solomon's porch.

24 Then came the Jews round about him, and said unto him, How long dost thou make us to doubt? If thou be the Christ, tell us plainly.

25 Jesus answered them, I told you, and ye believed not: the works that I do in my Father's name, they bear witness of me.

26 But ye believe not, because ye are not of my sheep, as I said unto you.

27 My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me:

28 And I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand.

29 My Father which gave them me, is greater than all; and none is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand.

30 I and my Father are one.

The Transfiguration of Our Lord.

LUKE IX.

28 ¶ And it came to pass about an eight days after these sayings, he took Peter, and John, and James, and went up into a mountain to pray.

29 And as he prayed, the fashion of his countenance was altered, and his raiment was white and glistening.

30 And, behold, there talked with him two men, which were Moses and Elias:

31 Who appeared in glory, and spake of his decease which he should accomplish at Jerusalem.

32 But Peter and they that were with him were heavy with sleep: and when they were awake, they saw his glory, and the two men that stood with him.

33 And it came to pass, as they departed from him, Peter said unto Jesus, Master, it is good for us to be here: and let us make three tabernacles; one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias: not knowing what he said.

34 While he thus spake, there came a cloud, cloud, and overshadowed them: and they feared as they entered into the cloud.

35 And there came a voice out of the cloud, saying, This is my beloved Son: hear him.

36 And when the voice was past, Jesus was found alone.

MATTHEW XVII.

9 And as they came down from the mountain, Jesus charged them, saying, Tell the vision to no man, until the Son of man be risen again from the dead.

False Zeal condemned.

LUKE IX.

51 ¶ And it came to pass, when the time was come that he should be received up, he stedfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem,

52 And sent messengers before his face: and they went, and entered into a village of the Samaritans, to make ready for him.

53 And they did not receive him, because his face was as though he would go to Jerusalem.

54 And when his disciples James and John saw this, they said, Lord, wilt thou that we command fire to come down from heaven, and consume them, even as Elias did?

55 But he turned, and rebuked them, and said, Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of.

56 For the Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them. And they went to another village.

Jesus Christ predicteth his Death and Resurrection.

MARK X.

32 ¶ And they were in the way going up to Jerusalem; and Jesus went before them: and they were amazed; and as they followed, they were afraid. And he took again the twelve, and began to tell them what things should happen unto him,

33 Saying, Behold we go up to Jerusalem; and the Son of man shall be delivered unto the Chief Priests, and unto the Scribes; and they shall condemn him to death, and shall deliver him to the Gentiles.

34 And they shall mock him, and shall scourge him, and shall spit upon him, and shall kill him: and the third day he shall rise again.

MATTHEW XX.

28 Even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many.

JOHN XII.

24 Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone: but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit.

25 He that loveth his life shall lose it; and he that hateth his life in this world, shall keep it unto life eternal.

26 If any man serve me, let him follow me; and where I am, there shall also my servant be: if any man serve me, him will my Father honour.

510.

27 Now is my soul troubled; and what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour: but for this cause came I unto this hour.

28 Father glorify thy name. Then came there a voice from heaven, saying, I have both glorified it, and will glorify it again.

29 The people therefore, that stood by, and heard it, said that it thundered: others said, An angel spake to him.

30 Jesus answered and said, This voice came not because of me, but for your sakes.

31 Now is the judgment of this world: now shall the prince of this world be cast out.

32 And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me.

33 (This he said, signifying what death he should die.)

Mary anointeth the Feet of Jesus.

JOHN XII.

1 Then Jesus, six days before the Passover, came to Bethany, where Lazarus was which had been dead, whom he raised from the dead.

2 There they made him a supper; and Martha served: but Lazarus was one of them that sat at the table with him.

3 Then took Mary a pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly, and anointed the feet of Jesus, and wiped his feet with her hair: and the house was filled with the odour of the ointment.

4 Then saith one of his disciples, Judas Iscariot, Simon's son, which should betray him,

5 Why was not this ointment sold for three hundred pence, and given to the poor?

6 This he said, not that he cared for the poor; but because he was a thief, and had the bag, and bare what was put therein.

MARK XIV.

6 And Jesus said, Let her alone; why trouble ye her? she hath wrought a good work on me.

7 For ye have the poor with you always, and whensoever ye will, ye may do them good: but me ye have not always.

8 She hath done what she could: she is come aforehand to anoint my body to the burying.

9 Verily I say unto you, Wheresoever this Gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, this also that she hath done shall be spoken of for a memorial of her.

The Entrance of Jesus Christ into Jerusalem.

LUKE XIX.

29 And it came to pass, when he was come nigh to Bethphage and Bethany, at the mount called the mount of Olives, he sent two of his disciples,

30 Saying, Go ye into the village over against you; in the which at your entering ye shall find a colt tied, whereon yet never man sat: loose him, and bring him hither.

31 And if any man ask you, Why do ye loose him? thus shall ye say unto him, Because the Lord hath need of him.

32 And they that were sent went their way,

Scripture Lessons.

way, and found even as he had said unto them.

33 And as they were loosing the colt, the owners thereof said unto them, Why loose ye the colt ?

34 And they said, The Lord hath need of him.

35 And they brought him to Jesus : and they cast their garments upon the colt, and they set Jesus thereon.

36 And as he went, they spread their clothes in the way.

37 And when he was come nigh, even now at the descent of the mount of Olives, the whole multitude of the disciples began to rejoice and praise God with a loud voice, for all the mighty works that they had seen ;

38 Saying, Blessed be the King that cometh in the name of the Lord : peace in heaven, and glory in the highest.

39 And some of the Pharisees from among the multitude said unto him, Master, rebuke thy disciples.

40 And he answered and said unto them, I tell you that, if these should hold their peace, the stones would immediately cry out.

MATTHEW XXI.

4 All this was done that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying,

5 Tell ye the daughter of Sion, Behold, thy King cometh unto thee, meek, and sitting upon an ass, and a colt the foal of an ass.

The Lord entereth into the Temple, and casteth out those who defile it.

MATTHEW XXI.

10 And when he was come into Jerusalem, all the city was moved, saying, Who is this ?

11 And the multitude said, This is Jesus the prophet of Nazareth of Galilee.

12 ¶ And Jesus went into the temple of God, and cast out all them that sold and bought in the temple, and overthrew the tables of the money-changers, and the seats of them that sold doves,

13 And said unto them, It is written, My house shall be called the house of prayer ; but ye have made it a den of thieves.

14 And the blind and the lame came to him in the temple ; and he healed them.

15 And when the Chief Priests and Scribes saw the wonderful things that he did, and the children crying in the temple, and saying, Hosanna to the Son of David ; they were sore displeased,

16 And said unto him, Hearest thou what these say ? And Jesus saith unto them, Yea ; have ye never read, Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise ?

The Chief Priests conspire against the Lord, and bribe Judas to betray him.

JOHN XI.

47 ¶ Then gathered the Chief Priests and the Pharisees a council, and said, What do we ? for this man doeth many miracles.

48 If we let him thus alone, all men will believe on him : and the Romans shall come and take away both our place and nation.

49 And one of them named Caiaphas, being the High Priest that same year, said unto them, Ye know nothing at all,

50 Nor consider that it is expedient for us, that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not.

51 And this spake he not of himself : but being High Priest that year, he prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation ;

52 And not for that nation only, but that also he should gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad.

53 Then from that day forth they took council together for to put him to death.

LUKE XXII.

1 Now the feast of unleavened bread drew nigh, which is called the Passover.

2 And the Chief Priests and Scribes sought how they might kill him ; for they feared the people.

3 ¶ Then entered Satan into Judas, surnamed Iscariot, being of the number of the twelve.

4 And he went his way, and communed with the Chief Priests and captains, how he might betray him unto them.

5 And they were glad, and covenanted to give him money.

6 And he promised, and sought opportunity to betray him unto them in the absence of the multitude.

The Lord celebrateth the Passover with his Disciples.

JOHN XIII.

1 Now before the feast of the Passover, when Jesus knew that his hour was come that he should depart out of this world unto the Father, having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them unto the end.

LUKE XXII.

7 ¶ Then came the day of unleavened bread, when the Passover must be killed.

8 And he sent Peter and John, saying, Go and prepare us the Passover, that we may eat.

9 And they said unto him, Where wilt thou that we prepare ?

10 And he said unto them, Behold, when ye are entered into the city, there shall a man meet you, bearing a pitcher of water ; follow him into the house where he entereth in.

11 And ye shall say unto the goodman of the house, The Master saith unto thee, Where is the guest-chamber, where I shall eat the Passover with my disciples ?

12 And he shall shew you a large upper room furnished : there make ready.

13 And they went, and found as he had said unto them : and they made ready the Passover.

14 And when the hour was come, he sat down, and the twelve apostles with him.

15 And he said unto them, With desire I have desired to eat this Passover with you before I suffer :

16 For I say unto you, I will not any more eat thereof, until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God.

MATTHEW XXVI.

21 And as they did eat, he said, Verily, I say unto you, that one of you shall betray me.

22 And they were exceeding sorrowful, and began every one of them to say unto him, Lord, is it I?

23 And he answered and said, He that dip-peth his hand with me in the dish, the same shall betray me.

24 The Son of man goeth as it is written of him: but woe unto that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed! it had been good for that man if he had not been born.

25 Then Judas, which betrayed him, answered and said, Master, is it I? He said unto him, Thou hast said.

26 ¶ And as they were eating, Jesus took bread, and blessed it, and brake it, and gave it to the disciples, and said, Take, eat; this is my body.

27 And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it:

28 For this is my blood of the new testa-ment, which is shed for many for the remission of sins.

29 But I say unto you, I will not drink, henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom.

JOHN XIII.

2 And supper being ended, (the devil having now put into the heart of Judas Isca-riot, Simon's son, to betray him;)

3 Jesus knowing that the Father had given all things into his hands, and that he was come from God, and went to God;

4 He riseth from supper, and laid aside his garments; and took a towel, and girded himself.

5 After that he poureth water into a bason, and began to wash the disciple's feet, and to wipe them with the towel wherewith he was girded.

6 Then cometh he to Simon Peter: and Peter said unto him, Lord, dost thou wash my feet?

7 Jesus answered and said unto him, What I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter.

8 Peter saith unto him, Thou shalt never wash my feet. Jesus answered him, If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me.

9 Simon Peter saith unto him, Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head.

10 Jesus saith to him, He that is washed needeth not save to wash his feet, but is clean every whit: and ye are clean, but not all.

11 For he knew who should betray him; therefore said he, Ye are not all clean.

12 So after he had washed their feet, and had taken his garments, and was set down again, he said unto them, Know ye what I have done to you?

13 Ye call me Master and Lord: and ye say well; for so I am.

14 If I then, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet; ye also ought to wash one another's feet.

15 For I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you.

16 Verily, verily, I say unto you, The ser-vant is not greater than his lord; neither he that is sent greater than he that sent him.

17 If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them.

18 ¶ I speak not of you all: I know whom I have chosen: but that the Scripture may be fulfilled, He that eateth bread with me hath lifted up his heel against me.

19 Now I tell you before it come, that, when it is come to pass, ye may believe that I am he.

20 Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that receiveth whomsoever I send, receiveth me; and he that receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me.

21 When Jesus had thus said, he was troubled in spirit, and testified, and said, Verily, verily, I say unto you, that one of you shall betray me.

22 Then the disciples looked one on an-other, doubting of whom he spake.

23 Now there was leaning on Jesus' bo-som one of his disciples, whom Jesus loved.

24 Simon Peter therefore beckoned to him, that he should ask who it should be of whom he spake.

25 He then lying on Jesus' breast, saith unto him, Lord, who is it?

26 Jesus answered, He it is, to whom I shall give a sop, when I have dipped it. And when he had dipped the sop, he gave it to Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon.

27 And after the sop, Satan entered into him. Then said Jesus unto him, That thou doest, do quickly.

28 Now no man at the table knew for what intent he spake this unto him.

29 For some of them thought, because Judas had the bag, that Jesus had said unto him, Buy those things that we have need of against the feast; or, that he should give something to the poor.

30 He then having received the sop, went immediately out: and it was night.

31 ¶ Therefore, when he was gone out, Jesus said, Now is the Son of man glorified, and God is glorified in him.

32 If God be glorified in him, God shall also glorify him in himself, and shall straight-way glorify him.

33 Little children, yet a little while I am with you. Ye shall seek me: and as I said unto the Jews, Whither I go, ye cannot come; so now I say to you.

LUKE XXII.

24 ¶ And there was also a strife among them, which of them should be accounted the greatest.

25 And he said unto them, The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors.

26 But ye shall not be so: but he that is greatest among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that doth serve.

27 For whether is greater, he that sitteth at meat, or he that serveth? is not he that sitteth at meat? but I am among you as he that serveth.

Scripture Lessons.

28 Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations.

29 And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me;

30 That ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel.

31 ¶ And the Lord said, Simon, Simon, behold, Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat:

32 But I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not: and when thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren.

33 And he said unto him, Lord, I am ready to go with thee, both into prison, and to death.

34 And he said, I tell thee, Peter, the cock shall not crow this day, before that thou shalt thrice deny that thou knowest me.

Jesus Christ comforteth and encourageth his Disciples, and promiseth them another Comforter.

JOHN XIV.

1 Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me.

2 In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you.

3 And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also.

4 And whither I go, ye know, and the way ye know.

5 Thomas saith unto him, Lord, we know not whither thou goest; and how can we know the way?

6 Jesus saith unto him, I am the way, and the truth, and the life: no man cometh unto the Father, but by me.

7 If ye had known me, ye should have known my Father also: and from henceforth ye know him, and have seen him.

8 Philip saith unto him, Lord, shew us the Father, and it sufficeth us.

9 Jesus saith unto him, Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? he that hath seen me hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou then, Shew us the Father?

10 Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in me? the words that I speak unto you I speak not of myself: but the Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works.

11 Believe me, that I am in the Father, and the Father in me: or else believe me for the very work's sake.

12 Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do; because I go unto my Father.

13 And whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son.

14 If ye shall ask any thing in my name, I will do it.

15 ¶ If ye love me, keep my commandments.

16 And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever.

17 Even the Spirit of truth; whom the world cannot receive because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him: but ye know him; for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you.

18 I will not leave you comfortless: I will come to you.

19 Yet a little while, and the world seeth me no more; but ye see me: because I live ye shall live also.

20 At that day ye shall know that I am in my Father, and ye in me, and I in you.

21 He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me: and he that loveth me shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him, and will manifest myself to him.

22 Judas saith unto him, (not Iscariot) Lord, how is it that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us and not unto the world?

23 Jesus answered and said unto him, If a man love me, he will keep my words: and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him.

24 He that loveth me not, keepeth not my sayings: and the word which ye hear is not mine, but the Father's which sent me.

25 These things have I spoken unto you being yet present with you.

26 But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you.

27 Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid.

28 Ye have heard how I said unto you, I go away, and come again unto you. If ye loved me, ye would rejoice, because I said, I go unto the Father: for my Father is greater than I.

29 And now I have told you before it come to pass, that when it is come to pass, ye might believe.

30 Hereafter I will not talk much with you: for the prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in me.

31 But that the world may know that I love the Father; and as the Father gave me commandment, even so I do. Arise, let us go hence.

Jesus Christ sheweth the Union between him and his Disciples, and exhorteth them to love one another.

JOHN XV.

1 I am the true vine, and my Father is the husbandman.

2 Every branch in me that beareth not fruit, he taketh away: and every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit.

3 Now ye are clean through the word which I have spoken unto you.

4 Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in me.

5 I am the vine, ye are the branches: He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringing forth much fruit: for without me ye can do nothing.

6 If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered; and men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burned.

7 If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you.

8 Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples.

9 As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you: continue ye in my love.

10 If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love; even as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love.

11 These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full.

12 This is my commandment, That ye love one another, as I have loved you.

13 Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.

14 Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you.

15 Henceforth I call you not servants; for the servant knoweth not what his lord doeth; but I have called you friends; for all things that I have heard of my Father I have made known unto you.

16 Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you, that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain: that whatsoever ye shall ask of the Father in my name, he may give it you.

17 These things I command you, that ye love one another.

18 If the world hate you, ye know that it hated me before it hated you.

19 If ye were of the world, the world would love his own: but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you.

20 Remember the word that I said unto you, The servant is not greater than his lord. If they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you; if they have kept my saying, they will keep your's also.

21 But all these things will they do unto you for my name's sake, because they know not him that sent me.

22 If I had not come and spoken unto them, they had not had sin: but now they have no cloak for their sin.

23 He that hateth me hateth my Father also.

24 If I had not done among them the works which none other man did, they had not had sin; but now have they both seen and hated both me and my Father.

25 But this cometh to pass, that the word might be fulfilled that is written in their law, They hated me without a cause.

26 But when the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which proceeded from the Father, he shall testify of me.

27 And ye also shall bear witness, because ye have been with me from the beginning.

Jesus Christ warneth his Disciples to prepare themselves against Tribulations. He comforteth them, and encourageth them to Prayer.

JOHN XVI.

1 These things have I spoken unto you, that ye should not be offended.

2 They shall put you out of the synagogues: yea, the time cometh, that whosoever killeth you will think that he doeth God service.

3 And these things will they do unto you, because they have not known the Father, nor me.

4 But these things have I told you, that when the time shall come, ye may remember that I told you of them. And these things I said not unto you at the beginning, because I was with you.

5 But now I go my way to him that sent me; and none of you asketh me, Whither goest thou?

6 But because I have said these things unto you, sorrow hath filled your heart.

7 Nevertheless I tell you the truth; It is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you.

8 And when he is come, he will reprove the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment:

9 Of sin, because they believe not on me;

10 Of righteousness, because I go to my Father, and ye see me no more;

11 Of judgment, because the prince of this world is judged.

12 I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now.

13 Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth: for he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak: and he will shew you things to come.

14 He shall glorify me: for he shall receive of mine, and shall shew it unto you.

15 All things that the Father hath are mine: therefore said I that he shall take of mine, and shall shew it unto you.

16 A little while, and ye shall not see me: and again, a little while, and ye shall see me, because I go to the Father.

17 Then said some of his disciples among themselves, What is this that he saith unto us, A little while, and ye shall not see me: and again, a little while, and ye shall see me: and, because I go to the Father?

18 They said therefore, What is this that he saith. A little while? We cannot tell what he saith.

19 Now Jesus knew that they were desirous to ask him, and said unto them, Do ye enquire among yourselves of that I said, A little while, and ye shall not see me: and again a little while, and ye shall see me?

20 Verily, verily, I say unto you, That ye shall weep and lament, but the world shall rejoice: and ye shall be sorrowful, but your sorrow shall be turned into joy.

21 A woman when she is in travail hath sorrow, because her hour is come: but as soon as she is delivered of the child, she remembereth membereth no more the anguish, for joy that a man is born into the world.

Scripture Lessons.

22 And ye now therefore have sorrow : but I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you.

23 And in that day ye shall ask me nothing. Verily, verily, I say unto you, Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, he will give it you.

24 Hitherto have ye asked nothing in my name ; ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full.

25 These things have I spoken unto you in proverbs : but the time cometh, when I shall no more speak unto you in proverbs, but I shall shew you plainly of the Father.

26 At that day ye shall ask in my name : and I say not unto you, that I will pray the Father for you :

27 For the Father himself loveth you, because ye have loved me, and have believed that I came out from God.

28 I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world : again, I leave the world, and go to the Father.

29 His disciples said unto him, Lo, now speakest thou plainly, and speakest no proverb.

30 Now are we sure that thou knowest all things, and needest not that any man should ask thee : by this we believe that thou camest forth from God.

31 Jesus answered them, Do ye now believe ?

32 Behold, the hour cometh, yea, is now come, that ye shall be scattered, every man to his own, and shall leave me alone : and yet I am not alone, because the Father is with me.

33 These things I have spoken unto you, that in me ye might have peace. In the world ye shall have tribulation : but be of good cheer ; I have overcome the world.

The Prayer of Jesus Christ for his Apostles, and those who believe in him.

JOHN XVII.

1 These words spake Jesus, and lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said, Father, the hour is come ; glorify thy Son, that thy Son also may glorify thee :

2 As thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him.

3 And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent.

4 I have glorified thee on the earth : I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do.

5 And now, O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self with the glory which I had with thee before the world was.

6 I have manifested thy name unto the men which thou gavest me out of the world : thine they were, and thou gavest them me ; and they have kept thy word.

7 Now they have known that all things whatsoever thou hast given me are of thee.

8 For I have given unto them the words which thou gavest me ; and they have received them, and have known surely that

I came out from thee, and they have believed that thou didst send me.

9 I pray for them : I pray not for the world, but for them which thou hast given me ; for they are thine.

10 And all mine are thine, and thine are mine ; and I am glorified in them.

11 And now I am no more in the world, but these are in the world, and I come to thee. Holy Father, keep through thine own name those whom thou hast given me, that they may be one, as we are.

12 While I was with them in the world, I kept them in thy name : those that thou gavest me I have kept, and none of them is lost, but the son of perdition ; that the Scripture might be fulfilled.

13 And now come I to thee ; and these things I speak in the world, that they might have my joy fulfilled in themselves.

14 I have given them thy word ; and the world hath hated them, because they are not of the world, even as I am not of the world.

15 I pray not that thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that thou shouldest keep them from the evil.

16 They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world.

17 Sanctify them through thy truth : thy word is truth.

18 As thou hast sent me into the world, even so have I also sent them into the world.

19 And for their sakes I sanctify myself, that they also might be sanctified through the truth.

20 Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word ;

21 That they all may be one ; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us : that the world may believe that thou hast sent me.

22 And the glory which thou gavest me I have given them ; that they may be one, even as we are one :

23 I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one ; and that the world may know that thou hast sent me, and hast loved them, as thou hast loved me.

24 Father, I will that they also, whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am ; that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me : for thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world.

25 O righteous Father, the world hath not known thee : but I have known thee, and these have known that thou hast sent me.

26 And I have declared unto them thy name, and will declare it : that the love wherewith thou hast loved me may be in them, and I in them.

The Agony and Resignation of Our Lord.

MARK XIV.

26 ¶ And when they had sung an hymn, they went out into the mount of Olives.

27 And Jesus saith unto them, All ye shall be offended because of me this night : for it is written, I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered.

28 But after that I am risen, I will go before you into Galilee.

MATTHEW XXVI.

36 ¶ Then cometh Jesus with them unto a place called Gethsemane, and saith unto the disciples, Sit ye here, while I go and pray yonder.

37 And he took with him Peter and the two sons of Zebedee, and began to be sorrowful and very heavy.

38 Then saith he unto them, My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death: tarry ye here, and watch with me.

39 And he went a little farther, and fell on his face, and prayed, saying, O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me: nevertheless not as I will, but as thou wilt.

40 And he cometh unto the disciples, and findeth them asleep, and saith unto Peter, What, could ye not watch with me one hour?

41 Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation: the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak.

42 He went away again the second time, and prayed saying, O my Father, if this cup may not pass away from me, except I drink it, thy will be done.

43 And he came and found them asleep again: for their eyes were heavy.

44 And he left them, and went away again, and prayed the third time, saying the same words.

LUKE XXII.

43 And there appeared an angel unto him from heaven, strengthening him.

44 And being in an agony he prayed more earnestly: and his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground.

45 And when he rose up from prayer, and was come to his disciples, he found them sleeping for sorrow, 46 And said unto them, Why sleep ye? rise and pray, lest ye enter into temptation.

Judas betrayeth the Lord.

JOHN XVIII.

2 And Judas also, which betrayed him, knew the place: for [Jesus oft]times resorted thither with his disciples.

3 Judas then, having received a band of men and officers from the Chief Priests and Pharisees, cometh thither with lanterns and torches and weapons.

MATTHEW XXVI.

48 Now he that betrayed him gave them a sign, saying, Whomsoever I shall kiss, that same is he: hold him fast.

49 And forthwith he came to Jesus, and said, Hail, master; and kissed him.

LUKE XXII.

48 But Jesus said unto him, Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?

JOHN XVIII.

4 Jesus therefore, knowing all things that should come upon him, went forth, and said unto them, Whom seek ye?

5 They answered him, Jesus of Nazareth. Jesus saith unto them, I am he. And Judas also, which betrayed him, stood with them.

510.

6 As soon then as he had said unto them, I am he, they went backward, and fell to the ground.

7 Then asked he them again, Whom seek ye? And they said, Jesus of Nazareth.

8 Jesus answered, I have told you that I am he: if therefore ye seek me, let these go their way:

9 That the saying might be fulfilled, which he spake, Of them which thou gavest me have I lost none.

10 Then Simon Peter having a sword, drew it, and smote the High Priest's servant, and cut off his right ear. The servant's name was Malchus.

LUKE XXII.

51 And Jesus answered and said, Suffer ye thus far. And he touched his ear, and healed him.

MATTHEW XXVI.

52 Then said Jesus unto him, Put up again thy sword into his place: for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword.

53 Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, and he shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels?

54 But how then shall the Scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be?

55 In that same hour said Jesus to the multitudes, Are ye come out as against a thief with swords and staves for to take me? I sat daily with you teaching in the temple, and ye laid no hold on me.

56 But all this was done, that the Scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled. Then all the disciples forsook him, and fled.

MARK XIV.

51 And there followed him a certain young man, having a linen cloth cast about his naked body; and the young men laid hold on him:

52 And he left the linen cloth, and fled from them naked.

SUFFERINGS OF OUR LORD.

He is brought before Caiaphas.

JOHN XVIII.

12 ¶ Then the band and the captain and officers of the Jews took Jesus, and bound him,

13 And led him away to Annas first; for he was father-in-law to Caiaphas, which was the High Priest that same year.

14 Now Caiaphas was he, which gave counsel to the Jews, that it was expedient that one man should die for the people.

15 ¶ And Simon Peter followed Jesus, and so did another disciple: that disciple was known unto the High Priest, and went in with Jesus into the palace of the High Priest.

16 But Peter stood at the door without. Then went out that other disciple, which was known unto the High Priest, and spake unto her that kept the door, and brought in Peter.

M 3

18 And

Scripture Lessons.

18 And the servants and officers stood there, who had made a fire of coals; for it was cold: and they warmed themselves: and Peter stood with them, and warmed himself.

19 ¶ The High Priest then asked Jesus of his disciples, and of his doctrine.

20 Jesus answered him, I spake openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort; and in secret have I said nothing.

21 Why askest thou me? ask them which heard me, what I have said unto them: behold, they know what I said.

22 And when he had thus spoken, one of the officers which stood by struck Jesus with the palm of his hand, saying, Answerest thou the High Priest so?

23 Jesus answered him, If I have spoken evil, bear witness of the evil: but if well, why smitest thou me?

24 Now Annas had sent him bound unto Caiaphas the High Priest.

MARK XIV.

55 And the Chief Priests and all the council sought for witness against Jesus to put him to death; and found none.

56 For many bare false witness against him, but their witness agreed not together.

57 And there arose certain, and bare false witness against him, saying,

58 We heard him say, I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and within three days I will build another made without hands.

59 But neither so did their witness agree together.

60 And the High Priest stood up in the midst, and asked Jesus, saying, Answerest thou nothing? what is it which these witness against thee?

61 But he held his peace, and answered nothing. Again the High Priest asked him, and said unto him, Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?

62 And Jesus said, I am: and ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven.

63 Then the High Priest rent his clothes, and saith, What need we any further witnesses?

64 Ye have heard the blasphemy: what think ye? And they all condemned him to be guilty of death.

65 And some began to spit on him, and to cover his face, and to buffet him, and to say unto him, Prophecy: and the servants did strike him with the palms of their hands.

LUKE XXII.

63 ¶ And the men that held Jesus mocked him, and smote him.

64 And when they had blindfolded him, they struck him on the face, and asked him, saying, Prophecy, who is it that smote thee?

65 And many other things blasphemously spake they against him.

Peter denieth the Lord.

LUKE XXII.

55 And when they had kindled a fire in the midst of the hall, and were set down together, Peter sat down among them.

56 But a certain maid beheld him as he sat by the fire, and earnestly looked upon him, and said, This man was also with him.

57 And he denied him, saying, Woman, I know him not.

58 And after a little while another saw him, and said, Thou art also of them. And Peter said, Man, I am not.

JOHN XVIII.

26 One of the servants of the High Priest, being his kinsman whose ear Peter cut off, saith, Did not I see thee in the garden with him?

LUKE XXII.

60 And Peter said, Man, I know not what thou sayest. And immediately, while he yet spake, the cock crew.

61 And the Lord turned, and looked upon Peter. And Peter remembered the word of the Lord, how he had said unto him, Before the cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice.

62 And Peter went out, and wept bitterly.

The Lord brought before Pilate and Herod.

MATTHEW XXVII.

1 When the morning was come, all the Chief Priests, and elders of the people, took council against Jesus to put him to death:

2 And when they had bound him, they led him away, and delivered him to Pontius Pilate the governor.

3 ¶ Then Judas, which had betrayed him, when he saw that he was condemned, repented himself, and brought again the thirty pieces of silver to the Chief Priests and elders,

4 Saying, I have sinned, in that I have betrayed the innocent blood. And they said, What is that to us? see thou to that.

5 And he cast down the pieces of silver in the temple, and departed, and went and hanged himself.

6 And the Chief Priests took the silver pieces, and said, It is not lawful for to put them into the treasury, because it is the price of blood.

7 And they took counsel, and bought with them the potter's field, to bury strangers in.

8 Wherefore that field was called, The field of blood, unto this day.

9 Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet, saying, And they took the thirty pieces of silver, the price of him that was valued, whom they of the children of Israel did value;

10 And gave them for the potter's field, as the Lord appointed me.

JOHN XVIII.

28 ¶ Then led they Jesus from Caiaphas unto the hall of judgment; and it was early; and they themselves went not into the judgment ment hall, lest they should be defiled; but that they might eat the Passover.

29 Pilate then went out unto them, and said, What accusation bring ye against this man?

30 They answered and said unto him, If he were not a malefactor, we would not have delivered him up unto thee.

31 Then said Pilate unto them, Take ye him, and judge him according to your law. The Jews therefore said unto him, It is not lawful for us to put any man to death:

32 That the saying of Jesus might be fulfilled, which he spake, signifying what death he should die.

33 Then Pilate entered into the judgment hall again, and called Jesus, and said unto him, Art thou the King of the Jews?

34 Jesus answered him, Sayest thou this thing of thyself, or did others tell it thee of me?

35 Pilate answered, Am I a Jew? Thine own nation and the Chief Priests have delivered thee unto me: what hast thou done?

36 Jesus answered, My kingdom is not of this world: if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews: but now is my kingdom not from hence.

37 Pilate therefore said unto him, Art thou a king then? Jesus answered, Thou sayest that I am a king. To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth. Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice.

38 Pilate saith unto him, What is truth? And when he had said this, he went out again unto the Jews, and saith unto them, I find in him no fault at all.

LUKE XXIII.

5 And they were the more fierce, saying, He stirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Jewry, beginning from Galilee to this place.

6 When Pilate heard of Galilee, he asked whether the man were a Galilean.

7 And as soon as he knew that he belonged unto Herod's jurisdiction, he sent him to Herod, who himself also was at Jerusalem at that time.

8 ¶ And when Herod saw Jesus, he was exceeding glad: for he was desirous to see him of a long season, because he had heard many things of him; and he hoped to have seen some miracle done by him.

9 Then he questioned with him in many words; but he answered him nothing.

10 And the Chief Priests and Scribes stood and vehemently accused him.

11 And Herod with his men of war set him at nought, and mocked him, and arrayed him in a gorgeous robe, and sent him again to Pilate.

12 ¶ And the same day Pilate and Herod were made friends together: for before they were at enmity between themselves.

13 ¶ And Pilate, when he had called together the Chief Priests and the rulers and the people,

14 Said unto them, Ye have brought this man unto me, as one that perverteth the people: and, behold, I having examined him before you, have found no fault in this man touching those things whereof ye accuse him:

15 No, nor yet Herod: for I sent you to him; and, lo, nothing worthy of death is done unto him.

MATTHEW XXVII.

15 ¶ Now at that feast the governor was wont to release unto the people a prisoner, whom they would.

16 And they had then a notable prisoner, called Barabbas,

17 Therefore when they were gathered together, Pilate said unto them, Whom will ye that I release unto you? Barabbas or Jesus, which is called Christ?

18 For he knew that for envy they had delivered him.

19 ¶ When he was set down on the judgment seat, his wife sent unto him, saying, Have thou nothing to do with that just man: for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of him.

20 But the Chief Priests and elders persuaded the multitude that they should ask Barabbas, and destroy Jesus.

21 The governor answered and said unto them, Whether of the twain will ye that I release unto you? They said, Barabbas.

22 Pilate saith unto them, What shall I do then with Jesus, which is called Christ? They all say unto him, Let him be crucified.

23 And the governor said, Why, what evil hath he done? But they cried out the more, saying, Let him be crucified.

Jesus Christ is Scourged and Crucified.

JOHN XIX.

1 Then Pilate therefore took Jesus, and scourged him.

2 And the soldiers platted a crown of thorns, and put it on his head, and they put on him a purple robe.

3 And said, Hail, King of the Jews! and they smote him with their hands.

4 Pilate therefore went forth again, and saith unto them, Behold, I bring him forth to you, that ye may know that I find no fault in him.

5 Then came Jesus forth, wearing the crown of thorns, and the purple robe. And Pilate saith unto them, Behold the man!

6 When the Chief Priests therefore and officers saw him, they cried out, saying, Crucify him, crucify him! Pilate saith unto them, take ye him, and crucify him: for I find no fault in him.

7 The Jews answered him, We have a law, and by our law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God.

8 ¶ When Pilate therefore heard that saying, he was the more afraid;

9 And went again into the judgment hall, and saith unto Jesus, Whence art thou? But Jesus gave him no answer.

10 Then saith Pilate unto him, Speakest thou not unto me? knowest thou not that I have power to crucify thee, and have power to release thee?

11 Jesus answered, Thou couldest have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above: therefore he that delivered me unto thee hath the greater sin.

12 And from thenceforth Pilate sought to release him: but the Jews cried out, saying, If thou let this man go, though art not Cæsar's friend: whosoever maketh himself a king, speaketh against Cæsar.

13 ¶ When Pilate therefore heard that saying, he brought Jesus forth, and sat down in the judgment seat in a place that is called the Pavement, but in the Hebrew, Gabbatha.

14 And it was the preparation of the Passover, and about the sixth hour: and he saith unto the Jews, Behold your King!

15 But they cried out, Away with him, away with him, crucify him. Pilate saith unto them, Shall I crucify your King? The Chief Priests answered, We have no king but Cæsar.

MATTHEW XXVII.

24 ¶ When Pilate saw that he could prevail nothing, but that rather a tumult was made, he took water, and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person: see ye to it.

25 Then answered all the people, and said, His blood be on us, and on our children.

LUKE XXIII.

23 And they were instant with loud voices, requiring that he might be crucified. And the voices of them and of the Chief Priests prevailed.

24 And Pilate gave sentence that it should be as they required.

25 And he released unto them him that for sedition and murder was cast into prison, whom they had desired; but he delivered Jesus to their will.

MARK XV.

16 And the soldiers led him away into the hall, called Prætorium; and they call together the whole band.

17 And they clothed him with purple, and platted a crown of thorns, and put it about his head,

18 And began to salute him, Hail, King of the Jews!

19 And they smote him on the head with a reed, and did spit upon him, and bowing their knees, worshipped him.

20 And when they had mocked him, they took off the purple from him, and put his own clothes on him, and led him out to crucify him.

LUKE XXIII.

26 And as they led him away, they laid hold upon one Simon, a Cyrenian, coming out of the country, and on him they laid the cross, that he might bear it after Jesus.

27 ¶ And there followed him a great company of people, and of women, which also bewailed and lamented him.

28 But Jesus turning unto them said, Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me, but weep for yourselves, and for your children.

29 For, behold, the days are coming, in which they shall say, Blessed are the barren, and the wombs that never bare, and the paps which never gave suck, 30 Then shall they begin to say to the mountains, Fall on us; and to the hills, Cover us.

31 For if they do these things in a green tree, what shall be done in the dry?

MATTHEW XXVII.

33 And when they were come unto a place called Golgotha, that is to say, a place of a skull.

34 ¶ They gave him vinegar to drink mingled with gall: and when he had tasted thereof, he would not drink.

LUKE XXIII.

32 And there were also two others, malefactors, led with him to be put to death.

33 And when they were come to the place, which is called Calvary, there they crucified him, and the malefactors, one on the right hand, and the other on the left.

MARK XV.

28 And the Scripture was fulfilled, which saith, And he was numbered with the transgressors.

LUKE XXIII.

34 ¶ Then said Jesus, Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do.

JOHN XIX.

19 ¶ And Pilate wrote a title, and put it on the cross. And the writing was, JESUS OF NAZARETH, THE KING OF THE JEWS.

20 This title then read many of the Jews: for the place where Jesus was crucified was nigh to the city: and it was written in Hebrew, and Greek, and Latin.

21 Then said the Chief Priests of the Jews to Pilate, Write not, The King of the Jews; but that he said, I am King of the Jews.

22 Pilate answered, What I have written, I have written.

23 ¶ Then the soldiers, when they had crucified Jesus, took his garments, and made four parts, to every soldier a part; and also his coat: now the coat was without seam, woven from the top throughout.

24 They said therefore among themselves, Let us not rend it, but cast lots for it, whose it shall be: that the Scripture might be fulfilled, which saith, They parted my raiment among them, and for my vesture they did cast lots. These things therefore the soldiers did.

MATTHEW XXVII.

39 ¶ And they that passed by reviled him, wagging their heads.

40 And saying, Thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, save thyself. If thou be the Son of God, come down from the cross.

41 Likewise

41 Likewise also the Chief Priests mocking him, with the Scribes and elders, said,

42 He saved others; himself he cannot save. If he be the King of Israel, let him now come down from the cross, and we will believe him.

43 He trusted in God; let him deliver him now, if he will have him: for he said, I am the Son of God.

LUKE XXIII.

39 ¶ And one of the malefactors which were hanged, railed on him, saying, If thou be Christ, save thyself and us.

40 But the other answering, rebuked him, saying, Dost not thou fear God, seeing thou art in the same condemnation?

41 And we indeed justly; for we receive the due reward of our deeds: but this man hath done nothing amiss.

42 And he said unto Jesus, Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom.

43 And Jesus said unto him, Verily, I say unto thee, To day shalt thou be with me in paradise.

JOHN XIX.

25 ¶ Now there stood by the cross of Jesus his mother, and his mother's sister, Mary the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene.

26 When Jesus therefore saw his mother, and the disciple standing by, whom he loved, he saith unto his mother, Woman, behold thy son!

27 Then saith he to the disciple, Behold thy mother! And from that hour that disciple took her unto his own home.

MATTHEW XXVII.

45 Now from the sixth hour there was darkness over all the land unto the ninth hour.

46 And about the ninth hour Jesus cried with a loud voice, saying Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani? that is to say, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?

47 Some of them that stood there, when they heard that, said, This man calleth for Elias.

JOHN XIX.

28 ¶ After this, Jesus knowing that all things were now accomplished, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, saith, I thirst.

29 Now there was set a vessel full of vinegar: and they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it upon hyssop, and put it to his mouth.

30 When Jesus therefore had received the vinegar, he said, It is finished.

LUKE XXIII.

46 ¶ And when Jesus had cried with a loud voice, he said, Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit: and having said thus, he gave up the ghost.

MATTHEW XXVII.

51 And, behold, the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom; and the earth did quake, and the rocks rent;

52 And the graves were opened; and many bodies of the saints which slept arose, 510.

53 And came out of the graves after his resurrection, and went into the holy city, and appeared unto many.

54 Now when the centurion, and they that were with him, watching Jesus, saw the earthquake, and those things that were done, they feared greatly, saying, Truly, this was the Son of God.

55 And many women were there beholding afar off, which followed Jesus from Galilee, ministering unto him:

56 Among which was Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James and Joses, and the mother of Zebedee's children.

LUKE XXIII.

48 And all the people that came together to that sight, beholding the things which were done, smote their breasts, and returned.

JOHN XIX.

31 The Jews therefore, because it was the preparation, that the bodies should not remain upon the cross on the sabbath day, (for that sabbath day was an high day,) besought Pilate that their legs might be broken, and that they might be taken away.

32 Then came the soldiers, and brake the legs of the first, and of the other which was crucified with him.

33 But when they came to Jesus, and saw that he was dead already, they brake not his legs.

34 But one of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side, and forthwith came thereout blood and water.

35 And he that saw it bare record, and his record is true: and he knoweth that he saith true, that ye might believe.

36 For these things were done, that the Scripture should be fulfilled, A bone of him shall not be broken.

37 And again another Scripture saith, They shall look on him whom they pierced.

MARK XV.

43 Joseph of Arimathea, an honourable counsellor, which also waited for the kingdom of God, came, and went in boldly unto Pilate, and craved the body of Jesus

44 And Pilate marvelled if he were already dead; and calling unto him the centurion, he asked him whether he had been any while dead.

45 And when he knew it of the centurion, he gave the body to Joseph.

JOHN XIX.

39 And there came also Nicodemus, which at the first came to Jesus by night, and brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about an hundred pound weight.

MATTHEW XXVII.

59 And when Joseph had taken the body, he wrapped it in a clean linen cloth,

60 And laid it in his own new tomb, which he had hewn out in the rock: and he rolled a great stone to the door of the sepulchre, and departed.

61 And there was Mary Magdalene, and the the other Mary, sitting over against the sepulchre.

62 ¶ Now the next day, that followed the day of the preparation, the Chief Priests and Pharisees came together unto Pilate,

63 Saying, Sir, we remember that that deceiver said, while he was yet alive, After three days I will rise again.

64 Command therefore that the sepulchre be made sure until the third day, lest his disciples come by night, and steal him away, and say unto the people, He is risen from the dead: so the last error shall be worse than the first.

65 Pilate said unto them, Ye have a watch: go your way, make it as sure as ye can.

66 So they went, and made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone, and setting a watch.

The Resurrection of Our Lord.

MATTHEW XVIII.

1 In the end of the sabbath, as it began to dawn toward the first day of the week, came Mary Magdalene and the other Mary to see the sepulchre.

2 And, Behold, there was a great earthquake: for the angel of the Lord descended from heaven, and came and rolled back the stone from the door, and sat upon it.

3 His countenance was like lightning, and his raiment white as snow:

4 And for fear of him the keepers did shake, and became as dead men.

5 And the angel answered and said unto the women, Fear not ye: for I know that ye seek Jesus, which was crucified.

6 He is not here: for he is risen, as he said. Come, see the place where the Lord lay.

7 And go quickly, and tell his disciples that he is risen from the dead; and, behold, he goeth before you into Galilee; there shall ye see him: lo, I have told you.

8 And they departed quickly from the sepulchre with fear and great joy, and did run to bring his disciples word.

LUKE XXIV.

10 It was Mary Magdalene, and Joanna, and Mary the Mother of James, and other women that were with them, which told these things unto the apostles.

11 And their words seemed to them as idle tales, and they believed them not.

JOHN XX.

3 Peter therefore went forth, and that other disciple, and came to the sepulchre.

4 So they ran both together: and the other disciple did outrun Peter, and came first to the sepulchre.

5 And he stooping down, and looking in, saw the linen clothes lying; yet went he not in.

6 Then cometh Simon Peter following him, and went into the sepulchre, and seeth the linen clothes lie,

7 And the napkin, that was about his head, not lying with the linen clothes, but wrapped together in a place by itself.

8 Then went in also that other disciple, which came first to the sepulchre, and he saw, and believed.

9 For as yet they knew not the Scripture, that he must rise again from the dead.

10 Then the disciples went away again unto their own home.

11 ¶ But Mary stood without at the sepulchre weeping: and as she wept, she stooped down, and looked into the sepulchre,

12 And seeth two angels in white sitting, the one at the head, and the other at the feet, where the body of Jesus had lain.

13 And they say unto her, Woman, why weepest thou? She saith unto them, Because they have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him.

14 And when she had thus said, she turned herself back, and saw Jesus standing, and knew not that it was Jesus.

15 Jesus saith unto her, Woman, why weepest thou? whom seekest thou, She, supposing him to be the gardener, saith unto him, Sir, if thou have borne him hence, tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away.

16 Jesus saith unto her, Mary. She turned herself, and saith unto him, Rabboni; which is to say, Master.

17 Jesus saith unto her, Touch me not; for I am not yet ascended to my Father: but go to my brethren, and say unto them, I ascend unto my Father, and your Father; and to my God, and your God.

18 Mary Magdalene came, and told the disciples that she had seen the Lord, and that he had spoken these things unto her.

MATTHEW XXVIII.

11 ¶ Now when they were going, behold, some of the watch came into the city, and shewed unto the Chief Priests all the things that were done.

12 And when they were assembled with the elders, and had taken counsel, they gave large money unto the soldiers, 13 Saying, Say ye, His disciples came by night, and stole him away while we slept.

14 And if this come to the governor's ears, we will persuade him, and secure you.

15 So they took the money, and did as they were taught: and this saying is commonly reported among the Jews until this day.

Jesus Christ appeareth unto two of his Disciples as they went to Emmaus.

LUKE XXIV.

13 ¶ And, behold, two of them went that same day to a village called Emmaus, which was from Jerusalem about threescore furlongs.

14 And they talked together of all these things which had happened.

15 And it came to pass, that, while they communed together and reasoned, Jesus himself drew near, and went with them.

16 But their eyes were holden that they should not know him.

17 And he said unto them, What manner of communications are these that ye have one to another, as ye walk, and are sad?

18 And the one of them, whose name was Cleopas, answering, said unto him, Art thou only a stranger in Jerusalem, and hast not known

known the things which are come to pass there in these days ?

19 And he said unto them, What things ? And they said unto him, Concerning Jesus of Nazareth, which was a prophet mighty in deed and word before God and all the people :

20 And how the Chief Priests and our rulers delivered him to be condemned to death, and have crucified him.

21 But we trusted that it had been he which should have redeemed Israel : and beside all this, to day is the third day since these things were done.

22 Yea, and certain women also of our company made us astonished, which were early at the sepulchre ;

23 And when they found not his body, they came, saying, that they had also seen a vision of angels, which said that he was alive.

24 And certain of them which were with us went to the sepulchre, and found it even so as the women had said : but him they saw not.

25 Then he said unto them, O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken :

26 Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory ?

27 And beginning at Moses and all the Prophets, he expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself.

28 And they drew nigh unto the village, whither they went : and he made as though he would have gone further.

29 But they constrained him, saying, Abide with us : for it is toward evening, and the day is far spent. And he went in to tarry with them.

30 And it came to pass, as he sat at meat with them, he took bread, and blessed it, and brake, and gave to them.

31 And their eyes were opened, and they knew him ; and he vanished out of their sight.

32 And they said one to another, Did not our heart burn within us, while he talked with us by the way, and while he opened to us the Scriptures ?

33 And they rose up the same hour, and returned to Jerusalem, and found the eleven gathered together, and them that were with them, 34 Saying, The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon.

35 And they told what things were done in the way, and how he was known of them in breaking of bread.

He appeareth to the Apostles.

LUKE XXIV.

36 ¶ And as they thus spake, Jesus himself stood in the midst of them, and saith unto them, Peace be unto you.

37 But they were terrified and affrighted, and supposed that they had seen a spirit.

38 And he said unto them, Why are ye troubled ? and why do thoughts arise in your hearts ?

39 Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself : handle me, and see ; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have.

510.

40 And when he had thus spoken, he shewed them his hands and his feet.

41 And while they yet believed not for joy, and wondered, he said unto them, Have ye here any meat ?

42 And they gave him a piece of a broiled fish, and of an honey-comb.

43 And he took it, and did eat before them.

44 And he said unto them, These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning me.

45 Then opened he their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures.

JOHN XX.

21 Then said Jesus to them again, Peace be unto you : as my Father hath sent me, even so send I you.

22 And when he had said this, he breathed on them, and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost :

23 Whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them ; and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained.

24 ¶ But Thomas, one of the twelve, called Didymus, was not with them when Jesus came.

25 The other disciples therefore said unto him, We have seen the Lord, But he said unto them, Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into his side, I will not believe.

26 ¶ And after eight days again his disciples were within, and Thomas with them : then came Jesus, the doors being shut, and stood in the midst, and said Peace be unto you.

27 Then saith he to Thomas, Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands : and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side : and be not faithless, but believing.

28 And Thomas answered and said unto him, My Lord and my God.

29 Jesus saith unto him, Thomas, because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed : blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed.

30 ¶ And many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book :

31 But these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God ; and that believing, ye might have life through his name.

Christ maketh himself known to his Disciples at the Sea of Tiberias.

JOHN XXI.

1 After these things Jesus shewed himself again to the disciples at the sea of Tiberias ; and on this wise shewed he himself.

2 There were together Simon Peter and Thomas called Didymus, and Nathanael of Cana in Galilee, and the sons of Zebedee, and two other of his disciples.

3 Simon Peter saith unto them, I go a fishing. They say unto him, We also go with thee. They went forth and entered into a ship

N 2

Scripture Lessons.

a ship immediately; and that night they caught nothing.

4 But when the morning was now come, Jesus stood on the shore: but the disciples knew not that it was Jesus.

5 Then Jesus saith unto them, Children, have ye any meat? They answered him, No.

6 And he said unto them, Cast the net on the right side of the ship, and ye shall find. They cast therefore, and now they were not able to draw it for the multitude of fishes.

7 Therefore that disciple whom Jesus loved saith unto Peter, It is the Lord. Now when Simon Peter heard that it was the Lord, he girt his fisher's coat unto him, (for he was naked,) and did cast himself into the sea.

8 And the other disciples came in a little ship: (for they were not far from land, but as it were two hundred cubits,) dragging the net with fishes.

9 As soon then as they were come to land, they saw a fire of coals there, and fish laid thereon, and bread.

10 Jesus saith unto them, Bring of the fish which ye have now caught.

11 Simon Peter went up, and drew the net to land full of great fishes, an hundred and fifty and three: and for all there were so many, yet was not the net broken.

12 Jesus saith unto them, Come and dine. And none of the disciples durst ask him, Who art thou? knowing that it was the Lord.

13 Jesus then cometh, and taketh bread, and giveth them, and fish likewise.

14 This is now the third time that Jesus showed himself to his disciples, after that he was risen from the dead.

15 ¶ So when they had dined, Jesus saith to Simon Peter, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these? He saith unto him, Yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee. He saith unto him, Feed my lambs.

16 He saith to him again the second time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me? He saith unto him, Yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee. He saith unto him, Feed my sheep.

17 He saith unto him the third time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me? Peter was grieved because he said unto him the third time, Lovest thou me? And he said unto him, Lord, thou knowest all things: thou knowest that I love thee. Jesus saith unto him, Feed my sheep.

18 Verily, verily, I say unto thee, When thou wast young, thou girdest thyself, and walkedst whither thou wouldest; but when thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldest not.

19 This spake he, signifying by what death he should glorify God. And when he had spoken this, he saith unto him, Follow me.

20 Then Peter, turning about, seeth the disciple whom Jesus loved following; which also leaned on his breast at supper, and said, Lord, which is he that betrayeth thee?

21 Peter seeing him, saith to Jesus, Lord, and what shall this man do?

22 Jesus saith unto him, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? follow thou me.

The Ascension of Our Lord.

MATTHEW XXVIII.

16 ¶ Then the eleven disciples went away into Galilee, into a mountain where Jesus had appointed them.

17 And when they saw him, they worshipped him: but some doubted.

18 And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth.

19 ¶ Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost:

20 Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world. Amen.

ACTS I.

4 And being assembled together with them, commanded them that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father, which, saith he, ye have heard of me.

5 For John truly baptized with water: but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost not many days hence.

6 When they therefore were come together, they asked of him, saying, Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?

7 And he said unto them, It is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power.

8 But ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you: and ye shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth.

9 And when he had spoken these things, while they beheld, he was taken up; and a cloud received him out of their sight.

10 And while they looked stedfastly toward heaven as he went up, behold, two men stood by them in white apparel;

11 Which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven.

12 Then returned they unto Jerusalem from the mount called Olivet, which is from Jerusalem a sabbath day's journey.

LESSONS SELECTED FROM THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.

The Day of Pentecost.

ACTS II.

1 And when the day of Pentecost was fully come, they were all with one accord in one place.

2 And suddenly there came a sound from heaven, as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting.

3 And there appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them.

4. And

4 And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance.

5 And there were dwelling at Jerusalem Jews, devout men, out of every nation under heaven.

6 Now when this was noised abroad, the multitude came together, and were confounded, because that every man heard them speak in his own language.

7 And they were all amazed and marvelled, saying one to another, Behold, are not all these which speak Galileans?

8 And how hear we every man in our own tongue, wherein we were born?

9 Parthians, and Medes, and Elamites, and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, and in Judea, and Cappadocia, in Pontus and Asia.

10 Phrygia, and Pamphylia, in Egypt, and in the parts of Libya about Cyrene, and strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes.

11 Cretes and Arabians, we do hear them speak in our tongues the wonderful works of God.

12 And they were all amazed, and were in doubt, saying one to another, What meaneth this?

13 Others mocking said, These men are full of new wine.

14 ¶ But Peter, standing up with the eleven, lifted up his voice, and said unto them, Ye men of Judea, and all ye that dwell at Jerusalem, be this known unto you, and hearken to my words:

15 For these are not drunken, as ye suppose, seeing it is but the third hour of the day.

16 But this is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel;

17 And it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out of my Spirit upon all flesh: and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams:

18 And on my servants and on my handmaidens I will pour out in those days of my Spirit; and they shall prophesy:

19 And I will shew wonders in heaven above, and signs in the earth beneath; blood, and fire, and vapour of smoke:

20 The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before that great and notable day of the Lord come.

21 And it shall come to pass, that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord, shall be saved.

22 Ye men of Israel, hear these words; Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God among you by miracles and wonders and signs, which God did by him in the midst of you, as ye yourselves also know:

23 Him, being delivered by the determinate counsel and fore-knowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain:

24 Whom God hath raised up, having loosed the pains of death: because it was not possible that he should be holden of it.

25 For David speaketh concerning him, I foresaw the Lord always before my face, for he is on my right hand, that I should not be moved:

26 Therefore did my heart rejoice, and my tongue was glad; moreover also my flesh shall rest in hope:

27 Because thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption.

28 Thou hast made known to me the ways of life; thou shalt make me full of joy with thy countenance.

29 Men and brethren, let me freely speak unto you of the patriarch David, that he is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us unto this day.

30 Therefore being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne;

31 He seeing this before, spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell, neither his flesh did see corruption.

32 This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we all are witnesses.

33 Therefore being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath shed forth this, which ye now see and hear.

34 For David is not ascended into the heavens: but he saith himself, The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, 35 Until I make thy foes thy footstool.

36 Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus, whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ.

40 And with many other words did he testify and exhort, saying, Save yourselves from this untoward generation.

41 ¶ Then they that gladly received his word were baptized: and the same day there were added unto them about three thousand souls.

42 And they continued stedfastly in the apostle's doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers.

43 And fear came upon every soul: and many wonders and signs were done by the apostles.

44 And all that believed were together, and had all things common;

45 And sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all men, as every man had need.

46 And they, continuing daily with one accord in the temple, and breaking bread from house to house, did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart.

47 Praising God, and having favour with all the people. And the Lord added to the Church daily such as should be saved.

Peter cureth the Lamé Man.

ACTS III.

1 Now Peter and John went up together into the temple at the hour of prayer, being the ninth hour.

2 And a certain man, lame from his mother's womb, was carried, whom they laid daily at the gate of the temple which is called Beautiful, to ask alms of them that entered into the temple;

3 Who seeing Peter and John about to go into the temple, asked an alms.

Scripture Lessons.

4 And Peter, fastening his eyes upon him with John, said, Look on us.

5 And he gave heed unto them, expecting to receive something of them.

6 Then Peter said, Silver and gold have I none; but such as I have give I thee: In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, rise up and walk.

7 And he took him by the right hand, and lifted him up: and immediately his feet and ancle bones received strength.

8 And he leaping up stood, and walked, and entered with them into the temple, walking, and leaping, and praising God.

9 And all the people saw him walking and praising God:

10 And they knew that it was he which sat for alms at the Beautiful gate of the temple: and they were filled with wonder and amazement at that which had happened unto him.

11 And as the lame man which was healed held Peter and John, all the people ran together unto them in the porch that is called Solomon's, greatly wondering.

12 ¶ And when Peter saw it, he answered unto the people, Ye men of Israel, why marvel ye at this? or why look ye so earnestly on us, as though by our own power or holiness we had made this man to walk?

13 The God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob, the God of our fathers, hath glorified his Son Jesus; whom ye delivered up, and denied him in the presence of Pilate, when he was determined to let him go.

14 But ye denied the Holy One and the Just, and desired a murderer to be granted unto you;

15 And killed the Prince of life, whom God hath raised from the dead; whereof we are witnesses.

16 And his name, through faith in his name, hath made this man strong, whom ye see and know: yea, the faith which is by him, hath given him this perfect soundness in the presence of you all.

17 And now, brethren, I wot that through ignorance ye did it, as did also your rulers.

18 But those things, which God before had shewed by the mouth of all his prophets, that Christ should suffer, he hath so fulfilled.

19 ¶ Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord;

20 And he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you:

21 Whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began.

22 For Moses truly said unto the fathers, A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me; him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever he shall say unto you.

23 And it shall come to pass, that every soul, which will not hear that prophet, shall be destroyed from among the people.

24 Yea, and all the prophets, from Samuel and those that follow after, as many as have spoken, have likewise foretold of these days.

25 Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, And in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed.

26 Unto you first God, having raised up his Son Jesus, sent him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities.

Imprisonment of Peter and John.

ACTS IV.

1 And as they spake unto the people, the Priests, and the captain of the temple, and the Sadducees, came upon them,

2 Being grieved that they taught the people, and preached through Jesus the resurrection from the dead.

3 And they laid hands on them, and put them in hold unto the next day: for it was now eventide.

4 Howbeit many of them which heard the word believed; and the number of the men was about five thousand.

5 ¶ And it came to pass on the morrow, that their rulers, and elders, and Scribes,

6 And Annas the High Priest, and Caiaphas, and John, and Alexander, and as many as were of the kindred of the High Priest, were gathered together at Jerusalem.

7 And when they had set them in the midst, they asked, By what power, or by what name, have ye done this?

8 Then Peter, filled with the Holy Ghost, said unto them, Ye rulers of the people, and elders of Israel,

9 If we this day be examined of the good deed done to the impotent man, by what means he is made whole;

10 Be it known unto you all, and to all the people of Israel, that by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, whom God raised from the dead, even by him doth this man stand here before you whole.

11 This is the stone which was set at nought of you builders, which is become the head of the corner.

12 Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved.

13 ¶ Now when they saw the boldness of Peter and John, and perceived that they were unlearned and ignorant men, they marvelled; and they took knowledge of them, that they had been with Jesus.

14 And beholding the man which was healed standing with them, they could say nothing against it.

15 But when they had commanded them to go aside out of the council, they conferred among themselves,

16 Saying, What shall we do to these men? for that indeed a notable miracle hath been done by them, is manifest to all them that dwell in Jerusalem; and we cannot deny it.

17 But that it spread no further among the people, let us straitly threaten them, that they speak henceforth to no man in this name.

18 And they called them, and commanded them not to speak at all, nor teach in the name of Jesus.

19 But Peter and John answered and said unto them, Whether it be right in the sight of of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye.

20 For we cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard.

21 So when they had further threatened them, they let them go, finding nothing how they might punish them, because of the people: for all men glorified God for that which was done.

22 For the man was above forty years old, on whom this miracle of healing was shewed.

23 ¶ And being let go, they went to their own company, and reported all that the Chief Priests and elders had said unto them.

24 And when they heard that, they lifted up their voice to God with one accord, and said, Lord, thou art God, which hast made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all that in them is?

25 Who by the mouth of thy servant David hast said, Why did the heathen rage, and the people imagine vain things.

26 The kings of the earth stood up, and the rulers were gathered together against the Lord, and against his Christ.

27 For of a truth against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles, and the people of Israel, were gathered together.

28 For to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done.

29 And now, Lord, behold their threatenings: and grant unto thy servants, that with all boldness they may speak thy word,

30 By stretching forth thine hand to heal; and that signs and wonders may be done by the name of thy holy child Jesus.

31 ¶ And when they had prayed, the place was shaken where they were assembled together; and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and they spake the word of God with boldness.

32 And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul: neither said any of them that ought of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common.

33 And with great power gave the apostles witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus: and great grace was upon them all.

Death of Ananias and Sapphira.

ACTS V.

1 But a certain man named Ananias, with Sapphira his wife, sold a possession.

2 And kept back part of the price, his wife also being privy to it, and brought a certain part, and laid it at the apostle's feet.

3 But Peter said, Ananias, why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie to the Holy Ghost, and to keep back part of the price of the land?

4 Whiles it remained, was it not thine own? and after it was sold, was it not in thine own power? why hast thou conceived this thing in thy heart? thou hast not lied unto men, but unto God.

5 And Ananias hearing these words fell down, and gave up the ghost: and great fear came on all them that heard these things.

6 And the young men arose, wound him up, and carried him out, and buried him.

510.

7 And it was about the space of three hours after, when his wife, not knowing what was done, came in.

8 And Peter answered unto her, Tell me whether ye sold the land for so much? And she said, Yea, for so much.

9 Then Peter said unto her, How is it that ye have agreed together to tempt the Spirit of the Lord? behold, the feet of them which have buried thy husband are at the door, and shall carry thee out.

10 Then fell she down straightway at his feet, and yielded up the ghost: and the young men came in and found her dead, and, carrying her forth, buried her by her husband.

11 And great fear came upon all the Church, and upon as many as heard these things.

Miraculous Deliverance of the Apostles.

ACTS V.

12 ¶ And by the hands of the apostles were many signs and wonders wrought among the people; (and they were all with one accord in Solomon's porch.

13 And of the rest durst no man join himself to them: but the people magnified them.

14 And believers were the more added to the Lord, multitudes both of men and women.)

15 Insomuch that they brought forth the sick into the streets, and laid them on beds and couches, that at least the shadow of Peter passing by might overshadow some of them.

16 There came also a multitude out of the cities round about unto Jerusalem, bringing sick folks, and them which were vexed with unclean spirits: and they were healed every one.

17 ¶ Then the High Priest rose up, and all they that were with him, (which is the sect of the Sadducees,) and were filled with indignation.

18 And laid their hands on the apostles, and put them in the common prison.

19 But the angel of the Lord by night open'd the prison doors, and brought them forth and said.

20 Go, stand and speak in the temple to the people all the words of this life.

21 And when they heard that, they entered into the temple early in the morning, and taught. But the High Priest came, and they that were with him, and called the council together, and all the senate of the children of Israel, and sent to the prison to have them brought.

22 But when the officers came, and found them not in the prison, they returned, and told,

23 Saying, The prison truly found we shut with all safety, and the keepers standing without before the doors: but when we had opened, we found no man within.

24 Now when the High Priest, and the captain of the temple, and the Chief Priests heard these things, they doubted of them whereunto this would grow.

25 Then came one and told them, saying, Behold, the men whom ye put in prison are standing in the temple, and teaching the people.

N 4

26 Then

Scripture Lessons.

26 Then went the captain with the officers, and brought them without violence: for they feared the people, lest they should have been stoned.

27 And when they had brought them, they set them before the council: and the High Priest asked them,

28 Saying, Did not we straitly command you that ye should not teach in this name? and, behold, ye have filled Jerusalem with your doctrine, and intend to bring this man's blood upon us.

29 ¶ Then Peter and the other apostles answered and said, We ought to obey God rather than men.

30 The God of our fathers raised up Jesus, whom ye slew and hanged on a tree.

31 Him hath God exalted with his right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance to Israel, and forgiveness of sins.

32 And we are his witnesses of these things; and so is also the Holy Ghost, whom God hath given to them that obey him.

33 ¶ When they heard that, they were cut to the heart, and took counsel to slay them.

34 Then stood there up one in the council, a Pharisee, named Gamaliel, a doctor of the law, had in reputation among all the people, and commanded to put the apostles forth a little space;

35 And said unto them, Ye men of Israel, take heed to yourselves what ye intend to do as touching these men.

36 For before these days rose up Theudas, boasting himself to be somebody; to whom a number of men, about four hundred, joined themselves: who was slain; and all, as many as obeyed him, were scattered, and brought to nought.

37 After this man rose up Judas of Galilee in the days of the taxing, and drew away much people after him: he also perished; and all, even as many as obeyed him, were dispersed.

38 And now I say unto you, Refrain from these men, and let them alone: for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to nought:

39 But if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it; lest haply ye be found even to fight against God.

40 And to him they agreed: and when they had called the apostles, and beaten them, they commanded that they should not speak in the name of Jesus, and let them go.

41 ¶ And they departed from the presence of the council, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for his name.

42 And daily in the temple, and in every house, they ceased not to teach and preach Jesus Christ.

Stephen the first Martyr.

ACTS VI.

7 And the word of God increased; and the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly; and a great company of the Priests were obedient to the faith.

8 ¶ And Stephen, full of faith and power, did great wonders and miracles among the people.

9 ¶ Then there arose certain of the synagogue, which is called the synagogue of the Libertines, and Cyrenians, and Alexandrians and of them of Cilicia and of Asia, disputing with Stephen.

10 And they were not able to resist the wisdom and the spirit by which he spake.

11 Then they suborned men, which said, We have heard him speak blasphemous words against Moses, and against God.

12 And they stirred up the people, and the elders, and the Scribes, and came upon him, and caught him, and brought him to the council,

13 And set up false witnesses, which said, This man ceaseth not to speak blasphemous words against this holy place, and the law:

14 For we have heard him say, that this Jesus of Nazareth shall destroy this place, and shall change the customs which Moses delivered us.

15 And all that sat in the council, looking stedfastly on him, saw his face as it had been the face of an angel.

ACTS VII.

1 Then said the High Priest, Are these things so?

2 And he said, Men, brethren, and fathers, hearken: The God of glory appeared unto our father Abraham, when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran,

3 And said unto him, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and come into the land which I shall shew thee.

4 Then came he out of the land of the Chaldæans, and dwelt in Charran: and from thence, when his father was dead, he removed him into this land, wherein ye now dwell.

5 And he gave him none inheritance in it, no, not so much as to set his foot on: yet he promised that he would give it to him for a possession, and to his seed after him, when as yet he had no child.

6 And God spake on this wise, That his seed should sojourn in a strange land; and that they should bring them into bondage, and entreat them evil four hundred years.

7 And the nation to whom they shall be in bondage will I judge, said God: and after that shall they come forth, and serve me in this place.

8 And he gave him the covenant of circumcision; and so Abraham begat Isaac, and circumcised him the eighth day; and Isaac begat Jacob; and Jacob begat the twelve patriarchs.

9 And the patriarchs, moved with envy, sold Joseph into Egypt: but God was with him,

10 And delivered him out of all his afflictions, and gave him favour and wisdom in the sight of Pharaoh king of Egypt; and he made him governor over Egypt and all his house.

11 Now there came a dearth over all the land of Egypt and Canaan, and great affliction: and our fathers found no sustenance.

12 But when Jacob heard that there was corn in Egypt, he sent out our fathers first.

13 And at the second time Joseph was made known to his brethren; and Joseph's kindred was made known unto Pharaoh.

14 Then

14 Then sent Joseph, and called his father Jacob to him, and all his kindred, threescore and fifteen souls.

15 So Jacob went down into Egypt, and died, he, and our fathers,

16 And were carried over into Sychem, and laid in the sepulchre that Abraham bought for a sum of money of the sons of Emmor, the father of Sychem.

17 But when the time of the promise drew nigh, which God had sworn to Abraham, the people grew and multiplied in Egypt,

18 Till another King arose, which knew not Joseph.

19 The same dealt subtilly with our kindred, and evil entreated our fathers, so that they cast out their young children, to the end they might not live.

20 In which time Moses was born, and was exceeding fair, and nourished up in his father's house three months:

21 And when he was cast out, Pharaoh's daughter took him up, and nourished him for her own son.

22 And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in words and in deeds.

23 And when he was full forty years old, it came into his heart to visit his brethren the children of Israel.

24 And seeing one of them suffer wrong, he defended him, and avenged him that was oppressed, and smote the Egyptian:

25 For he supposed his brethren would have understood how that God by his hand would deliver them: but they understood not.

26 And the next day he shewed himself unto them as they strove, and would have set them at one again, saying, Sirs, ye are brethren; why do ye wrong one to another?

27 But he that did his neighbour wrong, thrust him away, saying, Who made thee a ruler and a judge over us?

28 Wilt thou kill me, as thou didst the Egyptian yesterday?

29 Then fled Moses at this saying, and was a stranger in the land of Madian, where he begat two sons.

30 And when forty years were expired, there appeared to him in the wilderness of mount Sina, an angel of the Lord in a flame of fire in a bush.

31 When Moses saw it, he wondered at the sight: and as he drew near to behold it, the voice of the Lord came unto him, 32 Saying, I am the God of thy fathers, the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. Then Moses trembled, and durst not behold.

33 Then said the Lord to him, Put off thy shoes from thy feet: for the place where thou standest is holy ground.

34 I have seen, I have seen the affliction of my people which is in Egypt, and I have heard their groaning, and am come down to deliver them. And now come, I will send thee into Egypt.

35 This Moses whom they refused, saying, Who made thee a ruler and a judge? the same did God send to be a ruler and a deliverer, by the hand of the angel which appeared to him in the bush.

36 He brought them out, after that he had shewed wonders and signs in the land of Egypt, and in the Red sea, and in the wilderness, forty years.

37 ¶ This is that Moses, which said unto the children of Israel, A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me: him shall ye hear.

38 This is he, that was in the Church in the wilderness with the angel which spake to him in the mount Sina, and with our fathers: who received the lively oracles to give unto us:

39 To whom our fathers would not obey, but thrust him from them, and in their hearts turned back again into Egypt.

40 Saying unto Aaron, Make us gods to go before us: for as for this Moses, which brought us out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him.

41 And they made a calf in those days, and offered sacrifice unto the idol, and rejoiced in the works of their own hands.

42 Then God turned, and gave them up to worship the host of heaven; as it is written in the book of the prophets, O ye house of Israel have ye offered to me slain beasts and sacrifices by the space of forty years in the wilderness?

43 Yea, ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, and the star of your god Remphan, figures which ye made to worship them: and I will carry you away beyond Babylon.

44 Our fathers had the tabernacle of witness in the wilderness, as he had appointed, speaking unto Moses, that he should make it according to the fashion that he had seen.

45 Which also our fathers that came after brought in with Jesus into the possession of the Gentiles, whom God drave out before the face of our fathers, unto the days of David;

46 Who found favour before God, and desired to find a tabernacle for the God of Jacob.

47 But Solomon built him an house.

48 Howbeit the most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands; as saith the prophet,

49 Heaven is my throne, and earth is my footstool: what house will ye build me? saith the Lord: or what is the place of my rest?

50 Hath not my hand made all these things?

51 ¶ Ye stiffnecked and uncircumcised in heart and ears, ye do always resist the Holy Ghost: as your fathers did, so do ye.

52 Which of the prophets have not your fathers persecuted? and they have slain them which shewed before of the coming of the Just One; of whom ye have been now the betrayers and murderers:

53 Who have received the law by the disposition of angels, and have not kept it.

54 ¶ When they heard these things, they were cut to the heart, and they gnashed on him with their teeth.

55 But he, being full of the Holy Ghost, looked up steadfastly into heaven, and saw the glory of God, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God.

56 And said, Behold, I see the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing on the right hand of God.

O

57 Then

Scripture Lessons.

57 Then they cried out with a loud voice, and stopped their ears, and ran upon him with one accord.

58 And cast him out of the city, and stoned him: and the witnesses laid down their clothes at a young man's feet, whose name was Saul.

59 And they stoned Stephen, calling upon God, and saying, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit.

60 And he kneeled down, and cried with a loud voice, Lord, lay not this sin to their charge. And when he had said this, he fell asleep.

Conversion of an Ethiopian by Philip.

ACTS VIII.

26 And the angel of the Lord spake unto Philip, saying, Arise, and go toward the south unto the way that goeth down from Jerusalem unto Gaza, which is desert.

27 And he arose and went: and, behold, a man of Ethiopia, an eunuch of great authority under Candace queen of the Ethiopians, who had the charge of all her treasure, and had come to Jerusalem for to worship, 28 Was returning, and sitting in his chariot, read Esaias the prophet.

29 Then the Spirit said unto Philip, Go near, and join thyself to this chariot.

30 And Philip ran thither to him, and heard him read the prophet Esaias, and said, Understandest thou what thou readest?

31 And he said, How can I, except some man should guide me? And he desired Philip that he would come up and sit with him.

32 The place of the Scripture which he read was this, He was led as a sheep to the slaughter; and like a lamb dumb before his shearer, so opened he not his mouth:

33 In his humiliation his judgment was taken away: and who shall declare his generation? for his life is taken from the earth.

34 And the eunuch answered Philip, and said, I pray thee, of whom speaketh the prophet this? of himself, or of some other man?

35 Then Philip opened his mouth, and began at the same Scripture, and preached unto him Jesus.

36 And as they went on their way, they came unto a certain water: and the eunuch said, See, here is water; what doth hinder me to be baptized?

37 And Philip said, If thou believest with all thine heart, thou mayest. And he answered and said, I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God.

38 And he commanded the chariot to stand still: and they went down both into the water, both Philip and the eunuch; and he baptized him.

39 And when they were come up out of the water, the Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip, that the eunuch saw him no more: and he went on his way rejoicing.

Conversion of the Apostle Paul.

ACTS IX.

1 And Saul, yet breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord, went unto the High Priest.

2 And desired of him letters to Damascus to the synagogues, that if he found any of this way, whether they were men or women, he might bring them bound unto Jerusalem.

3 And as he journeyed, he came near Damascus: and suddenly there shined round about him a light from heaven:

4 And he fell to the earth, and heard a voice saying unto him, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?

5 And he said, Who art thou, Lord? And the Lord said, I am Jesus, whom thou persecutest: it is hard for thee to kick against the pricks.

6 And he, trembling and astonished said, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? And the Lord said unto him, Arise, and go into the city, and it shall be told thee what thou must do.

7 And the men which journeyed with him stood speechless, hearing a voice, but seeing no man.

8 And Saul arose from the earth; and when his eyes were opened, he saw no man: but they led him by the hand, and brought him into Damascus.

9 And he was three days without sight, and neither did eat nor drink.

10 ¶ And there was a certain disciple at Damascus, named Ananias; and to him said the Lord in a vision, Ananias. And he said, Behold, I am here, Lord.

11 And the Lord said unto him, Arise, and go into the street which is called Straight, and enquire in the house of Judas for one called Saul, of Tarsus: for behold, he prayeth, 12 And hath seen in a vision a man named Ananias coming in, and putting his hand on him, that he might receive his sight.

13 Then Ananias answered, Lord, I have heard by many of this man, how much evil he hath done to thy saints at Jerusalem:

14 And here he hath authority from the Chief Priests to bind all that call on thy name.

15 But the Lord said unto him, Go thy way: for he is a chosen vessel unto me, to bear my name before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel:

16 For I will show him how great things he must suffer for my name's sake.

17 And Ananias went his way, and entered into the house; and putting his hands on him said, Brother Saul, the Lord, even Jesus, that appeared unto thee in the way as thou camest, hath sent me, that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost.

18 And immediately there fell from his eyes as it had been scales: and he received sight forthwith, and arose, and was baptized.

19 And when he had received meat, he was strengthened. Then was Saul certain days with the disciples which were at Damascus.

20 And

20 And straightway he preached Christ in the synagogues, that he is the Son of God.

21 But all that heard him were amazed, and said; Is not this he that destroyed them which called on this name in Jerusalem, and came hither for that intent, that he might bring them bound unto the Chief Priests?

22 But Saul increased the more in strength, and confounded the Jews which dwelt at Damascus, proving that this is very Christ.

The Gospel preached to the Gentiles. They receive the Holy Ghost.

ACTS X.

1 There was a certain man in Cæsarea called Cornelius, a centurion of the band called the Italian band,

2 A devout man, and one that feared God with all his house, which gave much alms to the people, and prayed to God alway.

3 He saw in a vision evidently about the ninth hour of the day, an angel of God coming in to him, and saying unto him, Cornelius.

4 And when he looked on him, he was afraid, and said, What is it, Lord? And he said unto him, Thy prayers and thine alms are come up for a memorial before God.

5 And now send men to Joppa, and call for one Simon, whose surname is Peter:

6 He lodged with one Simon a tanner, whose house is by the sea side: he shall tell thee what thou oughtest to do.

7 And when the Angel which spake unto Cornelius was departed, he called two of his household servants, and a devout soldier of them that waited on him continually;

8 And when he had declared all these things unto them, he sent them to Joppa.

9 ¶ On the morrow, as they went on their journey, and drew nigh unto the city, Peter went up upon the housetop to pray about the sixth hour:

10 And he became very hungry, and would have eaten: but while they made ready, he fell into a trance.

11 And saw heaven opened, and a certain vessel descending unto him, as it had been a great sheet knit at the four corners, and let down to the earth:

12 Wherein were all manner of fourfooted beasts of the earth, and wild beasts, and creeping things, and fowls of the air.

13 And there came a voice to him, Rise, Peter; kill, and eat.

14 But Peter said, Not so, Lord; for I have never eaten any thing that is common or unclean.

15 And the voice spake unto him again the second time, What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common.

16 This was done thrice: and the vessel was received up again into heaven.

17 Now while Peter doubted in himself what this vision which he had seen should mean, behold, the men which were sent from Cornelius had made enquiry for Simon's house, and stood before the gate,

18 And called, and asked whether Simon, which was surnamed Peter, were lodged there.

19 ¶ While Peter thought on the vision, 510.

the Spirit said unto him, Behold, three men seek thee.

20 Arise therefore, and get thee down, and go with them, doubting nothing: for I have sent them.

21 Then Peter went down to the men which were sent unto him from Cornelius: and said, Behold, I am he whom ye seek, what is the cause wherefore ye are come?

22 And they said, Cornelius the centurion, a just man, and one that feareth God, and of good report among all the nation of the Jews, was warned from God by an holy angel, to send for thee into his house, and to hear words of thee.

23 Then called he them in, and lodged them. And on the morrow Peter went away with them, and certain brethren from Joppa accompanied him.

24 And the morrow after they entered into Cæsarea. And Cornelius waited for them, and had called together his kinsmen and near friends.

25 And as Peter was coming in, Cornelius met him, and fell down at his feet, and worshipped him.

26 But Peter took him up, saying, Stand up; I myself also am a man.

27 And as he talked with him, he went in, and found many that were come together.

28 And he said unto them, Ye know how that it is an unlawful thing for a man that is a Jew to keep company, or come unto one of another nation; but God hath shewed me that I should not call any man common or unclean.

29 Therefore came I unto you without gainsaying, as soon as I was sent for: I ask therefore for what intent ye have sent for me?

30 And Cornelius said, Four days ago I was fasting until this hour; and at the ninth hour I prayed in my house, and, behold, a man stood before me in bright clothing,

31 And said, Cornelius, thy prayer is heard, and thine alms are had in remembrance in the sight of God.

32 Send therefore to Joppa, and call hither Simon, whose surname is Peter; he is lodged in the house of one Simon a tanner, by the sea side: who, when he cometh, shall speak unto thee.

33 Immediately therefore I sent to thee; and thou hast well done that thou art come. Now therefore are we all here present before God, to hear all things that are commanded thee of God.

34 ¶ Then Peter opened his mouth, and said, Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons:

35 But in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him.

36 The word which God sent unto the children of Israel, preaching peace by Jesus Christ: (he is Lord of all:)

37 That word, I say, ye know, which was published throughout all Judæa, and began from Galilee, after the baptism which John preached;

38 How God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power: who went about doing good, and healing all that were were oppressed of the devil; for God was with him.

39 And we are witnesses of all things which he did both in the land of the Jews, and in Jerusalem; whom they slew and hanged on a tree:

40 Him God raised up the third day, and shewed him openly;

41 Not to all the people, but unto witnesses chosen before of God, even to us, who did eat and drink with him after he rose from the dead.

42 And he commanded us to preach unto the people, and to testify that it is he which was ordained of God to be the Judge of quick and dead.

43 To him give all the prophets witness, that through his name whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins.

44 ¶ While Peter yet spake these words, the Holy Ghost fell on all them which heard the word.

45 And they of the circumcision which believed were astonished, as many as came with Peter, because that on the Gentiles also was poured out the gift of the Holy Ghost.

46 For they heard them speak with tongues, and magnify God. Then answered Peter, 47 Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized, which have received the Holy Ghost as well as we?

48 And he commanded them to be baptized in the name of the Lord. Then prayed they him to tarry certain days.

ACTS XI.

1 And the apostles and brethren that were in Judæa heard that the Gentiles had also received the word of God.

2 And when Peter was come up to Jerusalem, they that were of the circumcision contended with him,

3 Saying, Thou wentest in to men uncircumcised, and didst eat with them.

4 But Peter rehearsed the matter from the beginning, and expounded it by order unto them.

18 When they heard these things, they held their peace, and glorified God, saying, Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life.

The Imprisonment of Peter, and his Deliverance.

ACTS XII.

1 Now about that time Herod the king stretched forth his hands to vex certain of the Church.

2 And he killed James the brother of John with the sword.

3 And because he saw it pleased the Jews, he proceeded further to take Peter also. (Then were the days of unleavened bread.)

4 And when he had apprehended him, he put him in prison, and delivered him to four quaternions of soldiers to keep him; intending after Easter to bring him forth to the people.

5 Peter therefore was kept in prison: but prayer was made without ceasing of the Church unto God for him.

6 And when Herod would have brought him forth, the same night Peter was sleeping between two soldiers, bound with two chains: and the keepers before the door kept the prison.

7 And, behold, the angel of the Lord came upon him, and a light shined in the prison: and he smote Peter on the side, and raised him up, saying, Arise up quickly, And his chains fell off from his hands.

8 And the angel said unto him, Gird thyself, and bind on thy sandals. And so he did. And he saith unto him, Cast thy garment about thee, and follow me.

9 And he went out, and followed him: and wist not that it was true which was done by the angel; but thought he saw a vision.

10 When they were past the first and the second ward, they came unto the iron gate that leadeth unto the city; which opened to them of his own accord: and they went out, and passed on through one street; and forthwith the angel departed from him.

11 And when Peter was come to himself, he said, Now I know of a surety, that the Lord hath sent his angel, and hath delivered me out of the hand of Herod, and from all the expectation of the people of the Jews.

Paul preacheth in the Synagogue at Antioch, in Pisidia.

ACTS XIII.

13 Now when Paul and his company loosed from Paphos, they came to Perga in Pamphylia: and John departing from them returned to Jerusalem.

14 ¶ But when they departed from Perga, they came to Antioch in Pisidia, and went into the synagogue on the sabbath day, and sat down.

15 And after the reading of the Law and the Prophets, the rulers of the synagogue sent unto them, saying, Ye men and brethren, if ye have any word of exhortation for the people, say on.

16 Then Paul stood up, and beckoning with his hand, said, Men of Israel, and ye that fear God, give audience.

17 The God of this people of Israel chose our fathers, and exalted the people when they dwelt as strangers in the land of Egypt, and with an high arm brought he them out of it.

18 And about the time of forty years suffered he their manners in the wilderness.

19 And when he had destroyed seven nations in the land of Canaan, he divided their land to them by lot.

20 And after that he gave unto them judges about the space of four hundred and fifty years, until Samuel the prophet.

21 And afterward they desired a king: and God gave unto them Saul, the son of Cis, a man of the tribe of Benjamin, by the space of forty years.

22 And when he had removed him, he raised up unto them David to be their king; to whom also he gave testimony, and said, I have found David the son of Jesse, a man after mine own heart, which shall fulfil all my will.

23 Of this man's seed hath God, according to his promise, raised unto Israel a Saviour, Jesus:

26 Men

26 Men and brethren, children of the stock of Abraham, and whosoever among you feareth God, to you is the word of this salvation sent.

27 For they that dwell at Jerusalem, and their rulers, because they knew him not, nor yet the voices of the Prophets which are read every sabbath day, they have fulfilled them in condemning him.

28 And though they found no cause of death in him, yet desired they Pilate that he should be slain.

29 And when they had fulfilled all that was written of him, they took him down from the tree, and laid him in a sepulchre.

30 But God raised him from the dead:

31 And he was seen many days of them which came up with him from Galilee to Jerusalem, who are his witnesses unto the people

32 And we declare unto you glad tidings, how that the promise which was made unto the fathers,

33 God hath fulfilled the same unto us their children, in that he hath raised up Jesus again; as it is also written in the second psalm, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee.

34 And as concerning that he raised him up from the dead, now no more to return to corruption, he said on this wise, I will give you the sure mercies of David.

35 Wherefore he saith also in another psalm, Thou shalt not suffer thine Holy One to see corruption.

36 For David, after he had served his own generation by the will of God, fell on sleep, and was laid unto his fathers, and saw corruption:

37 But he, whom God raised again saw, no corruption.

38 ¶ Be it known unto you therefore, men and brethren, that through this man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins:

39 And by him all that believe are justified from all things, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses.

40 Beware therefore, lest that come upon you, which is spoken of in the prophets:

41 Behold, ye despisers, and wonder, and perish: for I work a work in your days, a work which ye shall in no wise believe, though a man declare it unto you.

Imprisonment of Paul and Silas at Philippi, and the Conversion of the Jailor.

ACTS XVI.

22 And the multitude rose up together against them: and the magistrates rent off their clothes, and commanded to beat them.

23 And when they had laid many stripes upon them, they cast them into prison, charging the jailor to keep them safely:

24 Who, having received such a charge, thrust them into the inner prison, and made their feet fast in the stocks.

25 ¶ And at midnight Paul and Silas prayed, and sang praises unto God: and the prisoners heard them.

26 And suddenly there was a great earthquake, so that the foundations of the prison were shaken: and immediately all the doors were opened, and every one's bands were loosed.

27 And the keeper of the prison awaking out of his sleep, and seeing the prison doors open, he drew out his sword, and would have killed himself, supposing that the prisoners had been fled.

28 But Paul cried with a loud voice, saying, Do thyself no harm: for we are all here.

29 Then he called for a light, and sprang in, and came trembling, and fell down before Paul and Silas, 30 And brought them out, and said, ir s, what must I do to be saved?

31 And they said, Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house.

32 And they spake unto him the word of the Lord, and to all that were in his house.

33 And he took them the same hour of the night, and washed their stripes; and was baptized, he, and all his straightway.

34 And when he had brought them into his house, he set meat before them, and rejoiced, believing in God with all his house.

Paul preaching at Athens.

ACTS XVII.

16 ¶ Now while Paul waited for them at Athens, his spirit was stirred in him, when he saw the city wholly given to idolatry.

17 Therefore disputed he in the synagogue with the Jews, and with the devout persons, and in the market daily with them that met with him.

18 Then certain philosophers of the Epicureans, and of the Stoicks, encountered him. And some said, What will this babbler say? other some, He seemeth to be a setter forth of strange gods: because he preached unto them Jesus, and the resurrection.

19 And they took him, and brought him unto Areopagus, saying, May we know what this new doctrine, whereof thou speakest, is?

20 For thou bringest certain strange things to our ears: we would know therefore what these things mean.

21 (For all the Athenians and strangers which were there, spent their time in nothing else but either to tell or to hear some new thing).

22 ¶ Then Paul stood in the midst of Mars' hill, and said, Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things ye are too superstitious.

23 For as I passed by, and beheld your devotions, I found an altar with this inscription: TO THE UNKNOWN GOD. Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you.

24 God that made the world and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands;

25 Neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though he needed any thing, seeing he giveth to all life, and breath, and all things;

26 And hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation;

27 That they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him, and find him, him, though he be not far from every one of us :

28 For in him we live, and move, and have our being; as certain also of your own poets have said, For we are also his offspring.

29 Forasmuch then as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the God-head is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device.

Discourse of Paul to the Pastors of the Church at Ephesus.

ACTS XX.

17 ¶ And from Miletus he sent to Ephesus, and called the elders of the church.

18 And when they were come to him, he said unto them, Ye know, from the first day that I came into Asia, after what manner I have been with you at all seasons,

19 Serving the Lord with all humility of mind, and with many tears, and temptations, which befell me by the lying in wait of the Jews :

20 And how I kept back nothing that was profitable unto you, but have shewed you, and have taught you publickly, and from house to house.

22 And now, behold, I go bound in the spirit unto Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there :

23 Save that the Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city, saying, that bonds and afflictions abide me.

24 But none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the Gospel of the grace of God.

25 And now, behold, I know that ye all, among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God, shall see my face no more.

26 Wherefore I take you to record this day, that I am pure from the blood of all men.

27 For I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God.

28 ¶ Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the Church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood.

29 For I know this, that after my departing, shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock.

30 Also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them.

31 Therefore watch, and remember, that by the space of three years I ceased not to warn every one night and day with tears.

32 And now, brethren, I commend you to God, and to the word of his grace, which is able to build you up, and to give you an inheritance among all them which are sanctified.

33 I have coveted no man's silver, or gold, or apparel.

34 Yea, ye yourselves know, that these hands have ministered unto my necessities, and to them that were with me.

35 I have shewed you all things, how that so labouring, ye ought to support the weak, and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, It is more blessed to give than to receive.

36 ¶ And when he had thus spoken, he kneeled down, and prayed with them all.

37 And they all wept sore, and fell on Paul's neck, and kissed him,

38 Sorrowing most of all for the words which he spake, that they should see his face no more. And they accompanied him unto the ship.

Defence of Paul before Felix.

ACTS XXIV.

10 Then Paul, after that the governor had beckoned unto him to speak, answered, Forasmuch as I know that thou hast been of many years a judge unto this nation, I do the more cheerfully answer for myself :

11 Because that thou mayest understand, that there are yet but twelve days since I went up to Jerusalem for to worship.

12 And they neither found me in the temple disputing with any man, neither raising up the people, neither in the synagogues, nor in the city :

13 Neither can they prove the things whereof they now accuse me.

14 But this I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things which are written in the Law and in the Prophets :

15 And have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust.

16 And herein do I exercise myself, to have always a conscience void of offence toward God, and toward men.

17 Now after many years I came to bring alms to my nation, and offerings.

18 Whereupon certain Jews from Asia found me purified in the temple, neither with multitude, nor with tumult.

19 Who ought to have been here before thee, and object, if they had ought against me.

20 Or else let these same here say, if they have found any evil doing in me, while I stood before the council,

21 Except it be for this one voice, that I cried standing among them, Touching the resurrection of the dead I am called in question by you this day.

22 And when Felix heard these things, having more perfect knowledge of that way, he deferred them, and said, When Lysias the chief captain shall come down, I will know the uttermost of your matter.

23 And he commanded a centurion to keep Paul, and to let him have liberty, and that he should forbid none of his acquaintance to minister or come unto him.

24 And after certain days, when Felix came with his wife Drusilla, which was a Jewess, he sent for Paul, and heard him concerning the faith in Christ.

25 And as he reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, Felix trembled, and answered, Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season, I will call for thee.

Defence of Paul before King Agrippa.

ACTS XXVI.

1 Then Agrippa said unto Paul, Thou art permitted to speak for thyself. Then Paul stretched forth the hand, and answered for himself:

2 I think myself happy, king Agrippa, because I shall answer for myself this day before thee, touching all the things whereof I am accused of the Jews:

3 Especially because I know thee to be expert in all customs and questions which are among the Jews: wherefore I beseech thee to hear me patiently.

4 My manner of life from my youth, which was at the first among mine own nation at Jerusalem, know all the Jews;

5 Which knew me from the beginning, if they would testify, that after the most straitest sect of our religion I lived a Pharisee.

6 And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers:

7 Unto which promise our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come. For which hope's sake, king Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews.

8 Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you, that God should raise the dead?

9 I verily thought with myself, that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth.

10 Which thing I also did in Jerusalem: and many of the saints did I shut up in prison, having received authority from the Chief Priests; and when they were put to death, I gave my voice against them.

11 And I punished them oft in every synagogue, and compelled them to blaspheme; and being exceedingly mad against them, I persecuted them even unto strange cities.

12 Whereupon as I went to Damascus with authority and commission from the Chief Priests,

13 At midday, O king, I saw in the way a light from heaven, above the brightness of the sun, shining round about me and them which journeyed with me.

14 And when we were all fallen to the earth, I heard a voice speaking unto me, and saying in the Hebrew tongue, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? it is hard for thee to kick against the pricks.

15 And I said, Who art thou, Lord? And he said, I am Jesus, whom thou persecutest.

16 But rise, and stand upon thy feet: for I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness both of these things which thou hast seen, and of those things in the which I will appear unto thee;

17 Delivering thee from the people, and from the Gentiles, unto whom now I send thee,

18 To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among them which are sanctified by faith that is in me.

19 Whereupon, O king Agrippa, I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision.

510.

21 For these causes the Jews caught me in the temple, and went about to kill me.

22 Having therefore obtained help of God, I continue unto this day, witnessing both to small and great, saying none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come:

23 That Christ should suffer, and that he should be the first that should rise from the dead, and should shew light unto the people, and to the Gentiles.

24 And as he thus spake for himself Festus said with a loud voice, Paul, thou art beside thyself; much learning doth make thee mad.

25 But he said, I am not mad, most noble Festus; but speak forth the words of truth and soberness.

26 For the king knoweth of these things, before whom also I speak freely: for I am persuaded that none of these things are hidden from him; for this thing was not done in a corner.

27 King Agrippa, believest thou the prophets? I know that thou believest.

28 Then Agrippa said unto Paul, Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian.

29 And Paul said, I would to God, that not only thou, but also all that hear me this day, were both almost, and altogether such as I am, except these bonds.

30 And when he had thus spoken, the king rose up, and the governor, and Bernice, and they that sat with them:

31 And when they were gone aside, they talked between themselves, saying, This man doeth nothing worthy of death or of bonds.

32 Then said Agrippa unto Festus, This man might have been set at liberty, if he had not appealed unto Cæsar.

Paul's Voyage and Shipwreck.

ACTS XXVII.

1 And when it was determined that we should sail into Italy, they delivered Paul and certain other prisoners unto one named Julius, a centurion of Augustus' band.

2 And entering into a ship of Adramyttium, we launched, meaning to sail by the coasts of Asia;

9 ¶ Now when much time was spent, and when sailing was now dangerous, because the fast was now already past, Paul admonished them,

10 And said unto them, Sirs, I perceive that this voyage will be with hurt and much damage, not only of the lading and ship, but also of our lives.

11 Nevertheless the centurion believed the master and the owner of the ship, more than those things which were spoken by Paul.

12 And because the haven was not commodious to winter in, the more part advised to depart thence also, if by any means they might attain to Phenice, and there to winter; which is an haven of Crete, and lieth toward the south west and north west.

13 And when the south wind blew softly, supposing that they had obtained their purpose, loosing thence, they sailed close by Crete.

14 But not long after there arose against it a tempestuous wind, called Euroclydon.

O 4

15 And

Scripture Lessons.

15 And when the ship was caught, and could not bear up into the wind, we let her drive.

16 And running under a certain island which is called Claudia, we had much work to come by the boat :

17 Which when they had taken up, they used helps, undergirding the ship; and, fearing lest they should fall into the quicksands, strake sail, and so were driven.

18 And we being exceedingly tossed with a tempest, the next day they lightened the ship ;

19 And the third day we cast out with our own hands the tackling of the ship.

20 And when neither sun nor stars in many days appeared, and no small tempest lay on us, all hope that we should be saved was then taken away.

21 But after long abstinence Paul stood forth in the midst of them, and said, Sirs, ye should have hearkened unto me, and not have loosed from Crete, and to have gained this harm and loss.

22 And now I exhort you to be of good cheer : for there shall be no loss of any man's life among you, but of the ship.

23 For there stood by me this night the angel of God, whose I am, and whom I serve, 24 Saying, fear not, Paul ; thou must be brought before Cæsar : and, lo, God hath given thee all them that sail with thee.

25 Wherefore, sirs, be of good cheer : for I believe God, that it shall be even as it was told me.

26 Howbeit we must be cast upon a certain island.

27 But when the fourteenth night was come, as we were driven up and down in Adria, about midnight the shipmen deemed that they drew near to some country :

28 And sounded, and found it twenty fathoms : and when they had gone a little further, they sounded again, and found it fifteen fathoms.

29 Then fearing lest they should have fallen upon rocks, they cast four anchors out of the stern, and wished for the day.

30 And as the shipmen were about to flee out of the ship, when they had let down the boat into the sea, under colour as though they would have cast anchors out of the foreship,

31 Paul said to the centurion and to the soldiers, Except these abide in the ship, ye cannot be saved.

32 Then the soldiers cut off the ropes of the boat, and let her fall off.

33 And while the day was coming on, Paul besought them all to take meat, saying, This day is the fourteenth day that ye have tarried and continued fasting, having taken nothing.

34 Wherefore I pray you to take some meat : for this is for your health : for there shall not an hair fall from the head of any of you.

35 And when he had thus spoken, he took bread, and gave thanks to God in presence of them all : and when he had broken it, he began to eat.

36 Then were they all of good cheer, and they also took some meat.

37 And we were in all in the ship two hundred threescore and sixteen souls.

38 And when they had eaten enough, they lightened the ship, and cast out the wheat into the sea.

39 And when it was day, they knew not the land : but they discovered a certain creek with a shore, into the which they were minded, if it were possible, to thrust in the ship.

40 And when they had taken up the anchors, they committed themselves unto the sea, and loosed the rudder bands, and hoisted up the mainsail to the wind, and made toward shore.

41 And falling into a place where two seas met, they ran the ship aground ; and the forepart stuck fast, and remained unmoveable, but the hinder part was broken with the violence of the waves.

42 And the soldiers' counsel was to kill the prisoners, lest any of them should swim out, and escape.

43 But the centurion, willing to save Paul, kept them from their purpose ; and commanded that they which could swim should cast themselves first into the sea, and get to land :

44 And the rest, some on boards, and some on broken pieces of the ship. And so it came to pass, that they escaped all safe to land.

The Humanity of the People at Melita, and the arrival of Paul at Rome.

ACTS XXVIII.

1 And when they were escaped, then they knew that the island was called Melita.

2 And the barbarous people shewed us no little kindness : for they kindled a fire, and received us every one, because of the present rain, and because of the cold.

3 And when Paul had gathered a bundle of sticks, and laid them on the fire, there came a viper out of the heat, and fastened on his hand.

4 And when the barbarians saw the venomous beast hang on his hand, they said among themselves, No doubt this man is a murderer, whom, though he hath escaped the sea, yet vengeance suffereth not to live.

5 And he shook off the beast into the fire, and felt no harm.

6 Howbeit they looked when he should have swollen, or fallen down dead suddenly : but after they had looked a great while, and saw no harm come to him, they changed their minds, and said that he was a god.

7 In the same quarters were possessions of the chief man of the island, whose name was Publius ; who received us, and lodged us three days courteously.

8 And it came to pass, that the father of Publius lay sick of a fever and of a bloody flux : to whom Paul entered in, and prayed, and laid his hands on him, and healed him.

9 So when this was done, others also, which had diseases in the island, came, and were healed :

10 Who also honoured us with many honours ; and when we departed, they laded us with such things as were necessary.

11 And after three months we departed in a ship of Alexandria, which had wintered in the isle, whose sign was Castor and Pollux.

12 And

1113

12 And landing at Syracuse, we tarried there three days.

13 And from thence we fetched a compass, and came to Rhegium: and after one day the south wind blew, and we came the next day to Puteoli:

14 Where we found brethren, and were desired to tarry with them seven days: and so we went toward Rome.

15 And from thence, when the brethren heard of us, they came to meet us as far as Appii forum, and The three taverns: whom when Paul saw, he thanked God and took courage.

16 And when we came to Rome, the centurion delivered the prisoners to the captain of the guard: but Paul was suffered to dwell by himself with a soldier that kept him.

17 And it came to pass, that after three days Paul called the chief of the Jews together: and when they were come together, he said unto them, Men and brethren, though I have committed nothing against the people, or customs of our fathers, yet was I delivered prisoner from Jerusalem into the hands of the Romans.

18 Who, when they had examined me, would have let me go, because there was no cause of death in me.

19 But when the Jews spake against it, I was constrained to appeal unto Cæsar; not that I had ought to accuse my nation of.

20 For this cause therefore have I called for you, to see you, and to speak with you: because that for the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain.

21 And they said unto him, We neither received letters out of Judæa concerning thee, neither any of the brethren that came, shewed or spake any harm of thee,

22 But we desire to hear of thee what thou thinkest: for as concerning this sect, we know that every where it is spoken against.

23 And when they had appointed him a day, there came many to him into his lodging; to whom he expounded and testified the kingdom of God, persuading them concerning Jesus, both out of the Law of Moses, and out of the Prophets, from morning till evening.

24 And some believed the things which were spoken, and some believed not.

25 And when they agreed not among themselves, they departed, after that Paul had spoken one word, Well spake the Holy Ghost by Esaias the prophet unto our fathers, Saying, Go unto this people, and say, Hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and not perceive:

27 For the heart of this people is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes have they closed; lest they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their hearts, and should be converted, and I should heal them.

28 Be it known therefore unto you, that the salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and that they will hear it.

29 And when he had said these words, the Jews departed, and had great reasoning among themselves.

30 And Paul dwelt two whole years in his own hired house, and received all that came in unto him, 31 Preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding him.

CHRISTIAN LESSONS;

Referred to in the Letter of the Most Rev. Dr. Murray, dated the 20th of December 1826.

Printed from the amended Copy transmitted by him.

LESSON I.

Prophecies respecting Christ.

WHEN our first parents, Adam and Eve, forfeited the garden of Eden by disobedience, and entailed the guilt of sin upon their descendants, the Lord in his mercy promised, that in time one should be born of woman, by whom sin should be overcome. This promise he renewed to Abraham, when he said, "In thy seed all the nations of the earth shall be blessed." To David it was revealed, that he who had been promised to Abraham his forefather, should be of his line; that he should reign over all the nations of the earth, and that his kingdom should have no end. From this time, the Jews spoke of the Holy One whom they expected, as "the Messiah," or "Christ." It was foretold, that he should be born of a virgin: that Bethlehem in Judea should be the place of his birth, and that a messenger should go before him, to prepare the way of the Lord.

LESSON II.

The miraculous Conception of Christ by the Virgin Mary.

Now when the fulness of time was come, God sent forth his Son, Jesus Christ our Lord, to be the Saviour of the world; and the coming of our Lord was in this wise. There was in the days of Herod King of Judea, a priest named Zacharias, whose wife was of the daughters of Aaron, and her name was Elizabeth. They were both just before God, walking in all the commandments of the Lord. To them the Lord ordained, that there should be born a son, and that he should be the messenger spoken of by the prophets, who should go before, and prepare the way of the Messiah. And it came to pass, while Zacharias was executing the priest's office in the Temple of the Lord, and the people were praying without, that the Angel of the Lord appeared unto him, and told him that his wife Elizabeth should conceive, and should bear a son, and that his name should be called John; and that he should go before the Lord, in the spirit and power of Elias, to prepare for the Lord a perfect people. And Zacharias enquired of the Angel, how he should know this; and the Angel told him, that he should be dumb, and should not be able to speak until those things should come to pass, because he believed not what the Angel had told him; and when he came out he could not speak, and he made signs to the people; and they understood that he had seen a vision in the Temple. And after this time his wife Elizabeth conceived. And in the sixth month after her conception, the Angel Gabriel was sent from God unto Nazareth, to a virgin espoused to a man whose name was Joseph, of the house of David; and the virgin's name was Mary. And the Angel said to her, "Behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name JESUS. He shall be great, and shall be called the son of the Most High, and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of David, his father, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end."

And Mary enquired of the Angel, how this should be, as she knew not man; but the Angel told her that the Holy Ghost should come upon her, and that the power of the Most High should over-shadow her, and that the Holy One which should be born of her, should be called the Son of God. And the Angel told her, that Elizabeth, her cousin, had conceived in her old age, for that nothing was impossible to God. And Mary said, Behold the handmaid of the Lord, be it done unto me according to thy word. And the Angel departed from her.

LESSON III.

Mary's Visit to Elizabeth—Birth of John the Baptist.

MARY afterwards went to a city of Judah, where Zacharias and Elizabeth dwelt, and entering their house, she saluted Elizabeth. And it came to pass, that when Elizabeth heard the salutation of Mary, the infant whom she had conceived leaped in her womb, and Elizabeth was filled with the Holy Ghost. And she cried out with a loud voice, and said: Blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb.

And when Elizabeth's time was come, she brought forth a son, and her neighbours and kinsfolks rejoiced with her. And it came to pass, that on the eighth day they came to circumcise the child, and they proposed to call him by his father's name, Zacharias. And his mother answering, said, Not so; but he shall be called John. And they said to her, there is none of thy kindred that is called by this name. And they made signs to his father, to learn how he would have him called. And he wrote, John is his name. And they all wondered. And immediately his mouth was opened, and his tongue was loosed, and he spoke, blessing God. And fear came upon the whole neighbourhood.

And the people said one to another, What manner of person shall this child be? the hand of the Lord is with him.

LESSON IV.

Birth of Christ—His Circumcision.

WHEN Joseph, the husband of Mary, found, before they came together, that she was with child, being ignorant of her mysterious conception, he was minded to put her away privately. But while he thought on these things, behold the Angel of the Lord appeared to him in his sleep, saying, "Joseph, son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary, thy wife, for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost. And she shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name JESUS; for he shall save his people from their sins." And Joseph did as the Angel of the Lord had commanded him.

And it came to pass in those days, that Cæsar ordered all the people in his empire to be enrolled, in order to be taxed. And all went to be enrolled, each to his own city; and Joseph went with Mary from Nazareth to Bethlehem, the city of David, because he was of the house of David, there to be enrolled; and while they were there, the days were accomplished that Mary should be delivered, and she brought forth her son, and wrapt him in swaddling-clothes, and laid him in a manger, because there was no room for them in the inn.

And there were in the same country, shepherds in the fields, keeping night-watch over their flocks; and an Angel appeared unto them, and said, Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people; for this day is born to you in the city of David, a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord; and this shall be a sign to you: you shall find the Child wrapped in swaddling-clothes, and laid in a manger. And there suddenly appeared with the Angel a multitude of the heavenly host, singing glory to God on high, and peace upon earth unto men. And the shepherds came unto Bethlehem, and they found Joseph and Mary, and the Infant laid in a manger; and they returned, glorifying God for all that they had heard and seen. And when our Lord was eight days old, he was circumcised, and his name was called Jesus, according to the word spoken by the Angel before he was conceived in the womb.

LESSON V.

The Wise Men of the East visit Christ—Massacre of Infants by Herod.

Now when Jesus was born, there came wise men from the East to Jerusalem, saying, where is he that is born king of the Jews, for we have seen his star in the East, and we are come to adore him? And Herod the king, hearing this, was troubled, for he understood not that the Messiah's kingdom was spiritual, not temporal; and thinking that he was to be an earthly prince, he trembled for his own sovereignty; wherefore assembling together all the chief priests, and the scribes of of the people, he enquired of them, where Christ should be born? But they told him, in Bethlehem of Judah, for that so it was written by the prophet.

Then Herod, intending, when he should discover where the child was, to put him to death, privately enquired of the wise men the time of the star's appearing to them; and when they told him, he sent them to Bethlehem, desiring them to search diligently after the child, and when they had found him, to bring him word, that he might come and adore him. The wise men, having heard the king, went their way. And the star which they had seen in the East, went before them, until it came and stood over the house where the child was. When they saw the star they rejoiced; and going into the house, they found the child with Mary his mother, and they knelt down and worshipped him, and presented him with gold, frankincense, and myrrh. They were afterwards warned in a dream, not to return to Herod, and they therefore returned by another way into their own country.

When Herod found that the wise men did not return, he was exceeding wroth, and gave an order for a general massacre of all male infants in the city of Bethlehem and the neighbourhood, from two years old, and under, according to what he supposed must be the age of Jesus, from what he had been told by the wise men; for he hoped that in the general destruction, he should cut off the object of his jealousy and fear; but the Lord frustrated his design: for Joseph being warned in a dream, of what Herod intended, took the child and his mother into Egypt: now, after they had fled, the edict of Herod was put in force, and Herod himself soon afterwards died. After the death of Herod, Joseph, by divine direction, removed the child and his mother into the land of Galilee, and came and dwelt at Nazareth. Thus was fulfilled what was spoken by the Lord through the prophet, saying, "Out of Egypt have I called my Son;" and thus also was fulfilled the prophecy, that he should be called a Nazarene.

LESSON VI.

Christ visits the Temple at Twelve Years of Age.

WHEN Jesus was of the age of twelve years, Joseph and Mary took him with them to Jerusalem, to the feast of the passover; and when they had performed the ceremonies of the feast, and were returning, they missed the child; wherefore they went back to Jerusalem sorrowing: and it came to pass, that after three days they found him in the Temple, sitting in the midst of the doctors, hearing them, and asking them questions. And all that heard him were astonished at his wisdom and his answers. And he afterwards returned with Joseph and Mary to Nazareth, and was subject to them, until he was about thirty years of age, when the time came for his entering on his public ministry.

LESSON VII.

Preaching of John the Baptist.

Now at this time John, the son of Zacharias, came preaching in the wilderness, that the kingdom of Heaven was at hand. Then went out to him Jerusalem and all Judea, and all the country about Jordan, and they were baptized by him, confessing their sins; and as the people were thinking of John, whether he were the Christ; John said, I am not Christ. I am the voice of one crying out in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the Lord. And he said, Behold there is one coming after me, who is preferred before me, because he was before me, the latchet even of whose shoe I am unworthy to loose. I baptize with water, but he will baptize in fire and the Holy Ghost.

LESSON VIII.

Baptism of Our Lord.

AND it came to pass, that Jesus came from Nazareth of Galilee to the Jordan, unto John, to be baptized by him. And John said to Jesus, I ought to be baptized by thee, and comest thou to me? Jesus answering, said to him, Suffer it now. And John baptized him.

And when Jesus was baptized, he came out of the water, and behold the Heavens opened, and the Spirit of God descended as a dove upon him, and remained upon him. And a voice came from the Heavens, saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. And John testified of him, that he was the Lamb of God; and he said, I saw the Spirit descending from Heaven like a dove, and it abode upon him; and I knew him not; but he that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me, Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending and remaining, the same is he who baptizeth with the Holy Ghost; and I saw, and testify, that this is the Son of God.

LESSON IX.

Temptation of Our Lord.

JESUS being full of the Holy Ghost, returned from the Jordan, and he was led by the Spirit into the desert. And he fasted for the space of forty days and forty nights, and he was tempted by the Devil, and at length he commanded him to depart, saying, Depart, Satan, for it is written, thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God. And the Devil departed from him; and behold, Angels came and ministered to him.

COMMENCEMENT OF OUR LORD'S MINISTRY.

LESSON X.

Our Lord's Teaching.

AFTER our Lord's baptism and temptation, he commenced his public ministry, and he went about all Galilee, teaching in the synagogues, and preaching the Gospel of the kingdom: and healing all manner of sickness, and every infirmity among the people. And he taught as one having authority, and not as the scribes; and he taught sometimes in plain discourse, and sometimes in parables; and he taught to the following effect.

Who are blessed.

Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted. Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the land. Blessed are they who hunger and thirst after justice: for they shall be filled. Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy. Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God. Blessed are the peace-makers: for they shall be called the children of God. Blessed are they who are persecuted for justice's sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are you, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad: for great is your reward in heaven: For so persecuted they the prophets that were before you.

Against Malice.

You have heard that it was said of old, Thou shalt not kill; and whosoever shall kill, shall be in danger of the judgment: But I say unto to you, Whosoever is angry with his brother without cause, shall be in danger of the judgment: and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council; but whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire. Therefore, if thou bring thy offering to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath ought against thee, leave thy gift before the altar; go first and be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift. Agree with thine adversary while thou art in the way with him; lest the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison. I say unto thee, Thou shalt by no means come out thence, till thou hast paid the uttermost farthing.

Wrong should be borne patiently.

You have heard that it hath been said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth: But I say unto you, Resist not evil: if one shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also. And if any man shall sue thee at law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also. And whosoever shall compel thee to go with him one mile, go with him two. Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee, turn not away.

To love our Enemies, and to aim at Perfection.

You have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour and hate thine enemy: But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that persecute you; That you may be the children of your Father who is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. For if you love them who love you, what reward have you? do not even the publicans the same? And if you salute your brethren only, what do you more than others? do not even the publicans the same? Be therefore perfect, even as your Father who is in heaven is perfect.

Of Forgiving our Brethren, and doing Good to all Men.

If you forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you: But if you forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses.

All things whatsoever ye would that men do to you, do you even so to them, for this is the Law and the Prophets.

Against Swearing.

You have heard that it hath been said of old, Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform thine oaths unto the Lord: But I say unto you, Swear not at all: neither by heaven; for it is God's throne: nor by the earth; for it is his footstool: neither by Jerusalem; for it is the city of the great King. Neither shalt thou swear by thy head, because thou canst not make one hair white or black: But let your words be, Yea, yea; No, no; for whatsoever is more than these, is of evil.

LESSON XI.

Of Avarice and Alms-giving.

LAY not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust destroy, and where thieves break through and steal: But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth destroy, and where thieves do not break through nor steal: for where your treasure is, there will your heart be also.

But when thou doest alms, do not sound a trumpet before thee, as the hypocrites do in the synagogues and in the streets, that they may have glory of men. Verily I say unto unto you, They have received their reward. But when thou doest alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth: That thine alms may be in secret; and thy Father, who seeth in secret, will reward thee.

Of Adoration and Prayer.

God is a Spirit, and they who adore him, must adore in spirit and in truth.

Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them.

Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and you shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you: For every one that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened.—Or what man is there of you, whom if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone? Or if he ask a fish, will he give him a serpent? If you then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father, who is in heaven, give good things to them that ask him?

When thou prayest, thou shalt not be as the hypocrites are: for they love to pray standing in the synagogues, and in the corners of the streets, that they may be seen of men. I say unto you, They have received their reward. But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy chamber, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father in secret; and thy Father, who seeth in secret, will reward thee.

Of Fasting.

When ye fast, be not as the hypocrites, of a sad countenance: for they disfigure their faces, that they may appear unto men to fast. Verily I say unto you, They have received their reward. But thou, when thou fastest, anoint thine head, and wash thy face; that thou appear not unto men to fast, but unto thy Father, who is in secret: and thy Father, who seeth in secret, shall reward thee.

Of Purity in Thought as well as Act; and of Divorce.

You have heard, that it was said by them of old, Thou shalt not commit adultery: But I say unto you, That whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart.

The light of the body is the eye: if therefore thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light: But if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness. If therefore the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness! And if thy right eye cause thee to offend, pluck it out, and cast it from thee: for it is better that one of thy members should perish, than that thy whole body should be cast unto hell. It hath been said, Whosoever shall put away his wife, let him give her a writing of divorcement; but I say unto you, That whosoever shall put away his wife, except for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery: and whosoever shall marry her that is divorced, committeth adultery.

LESSON XII.

Christ exhorteth not to be anxious about Worldly Things, but principally to seek God's Kingdom.

TAKE heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with the cares of this life.

No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or he will hold to the one, and despise the other. You cannot serve God and mammon. Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what you shall eat, or what you shall drink: nor for your body, what you shall put on. Is not the life more than meat, and the body more than raiment? Behold the fowls of the air: for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are you not of more value than they? Which of you, by taking thought, can add one cubit unto his stature? And why take you thought for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin: And yet I say unto you, That Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith? Seek first the kingdom of God, and all these things shall be added unto you. Take therefore no thought for the morrow: for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof.

Take heed, and beware of covetousness. For a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth. How hard is it for them that trust in riches, to enter into the kingdom of God.

If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me. He that taketh not his cross, and followeth after me, is not worthy of me. Whosoever forsaketh not all that he hath; his father, and mother and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple. But there is no man that hath left house, or parents, or brethren, or wife, or children, for the kingdom of God's sake, who shall not receive manifold more in this present time, and in the world to come life everlasting. And what shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? Be not afraid of them that kill the body, but cannot kill the soul; rather fear him, who hath power to destroy both soul and body in hell.

To beware of False Prophets, who may be known by their Fruits.

Beware of false prophets, who come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves. You shall know them by their fruits. Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles? Even so every good tree bringeth forth good fruit; but an evil tree bringeth forth evil fruit. A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can an evil tree bring forth good fruit. Every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit shall be hewn down, and cast into the fire. Wherefore by their fruits you shall know them.

Christian Lessons.

LESSON XIII.

Christ condemns rash Judgment.

JUDGE not, that ye be not judged. For with what judgment you judge, you shall be judged; and with what measure you mete, it shall be measured to you again. And why seest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but seest not the beam that is in thine own eye? Or canst thou say to thy brother, Let me take the mote out of thine eye; when behold a beam is in thine own eye? Thou hypocrite, first cast the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see to cast the mote out of thy brother's eye.

LESSON XIV.

Of our Duty to pay Taxes to the State.

RENDER to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's. This was said by our Lord, when the Jews came unto him, to enquire whether it was lawful for them to pay tribute to Cæsar, under whose government they lived.

LESSON XV.

Of Humility.

WHOSOEVER shall humble himself as a little child, the same is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven.

Be ye not as the Scribes and the Pharisees, who love the uppermost places at feasts, and the chief seats in the synagogues, and greetings in the markets, and to be called of men, Rabbi, Rabbi; who do all their works to be seen of men. And be not as the chief rulers among the Jews, who love the praise of men more than the praise of God. How can ye believe, who receive glory one of another, and seek not the glory that cometh from God only?

When thou art invited by any man to a wedding, sit not down in the first seat, lest a more honourable man than thou be invited by him; and he that invited thee and him, come and say to thee, Give this man place; and thou begin with shame to take the lowest place: but, when thou art invited, go and sit down in the lowest place, that when he that invited thee cometh, he may say unto thee, Friend, go up higher: then shalt thou have glory in the presence of them that sit at meat with thee. For whosoever exalteth himself shall be humbled; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted.

There are those who trust in themselves that they are righteous, and despise others; and yet are they full of hypocrisy and iniquity. Wo unto you, hypocrites; who strain out a gnat, and swallow a camel; who devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayers. Ye are they who justify yourselves before men, but God knoweth your hearts. For that which is highly esteemed amongst men, is oftentimes abomination in the sight of God. Ye are like unto whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones, and all uncleanness; even so ye also outwardly appear righteous unto men, but within ye are full of hypocrisy and iniquity.

LESSON XVI.

Of Mercy.

It is lawful to do a good act on the Sabbath-day, for the Lord will have mercy, rather than sacrifice. Wo unto you that pay tithe of mint, and anise, and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith. These ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone. Give alms of such things as ye have; and behold all things are clean unto you. When thou makest a feast, call the poor, the maimed, the lame, and the blind, for they cannot recompense thee; but thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just. For the Son of man shall come in his majesty, and all the Angels with him, and all nations shall be gathered together before him, and he shall separate them one from another, as the shepherd separateth the sheep from the goats: and he shall set the sheep on his right hand, and the goats on his left. Then shall he say to them that shall be on his right hand: Come, ye blessed of my Father, possess you the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. For I was hungry, and you gave me to eat: I was thirsty, and you gave me to drink: I was a stranger, and you took me in: naked, and you covered me: sick, and you visited me: I was in prison, and you came to me.

Then shall the just answer him, saying: Lord, when did we see thee hungry, and feed thee; thirsty, and gave thee drink? And when did we see thee a stranger, and took thee in? or naked, and covered thee? or when did we see thee sick, or in prison, and came to thee? And he answering, shall say to them: Amen I say to you, as long as you did it to one of these my least brethren, you did it to me. Then he shall say to them also that shall be on his left hand: Depart from me, you cursed, into everlasting fire which was prepared for the devil and his angels. For I was hungry, and you gave me not to eat: I was thirsty, and you gave me not to drink: I was a stranger, and you took me not in: naked, and you covered me not: sick, and in prison, and you did not visit me.

Then they also shall answer him, saying: Lord, when did we see thee hungry, or thirsty, or a stranger, or naked, or sick, or in prison, and did not minister to thee? Then he shall answer them, saying: Amen I say to you, as long as you did it not to one of these least, neither did you do it to me. And these shall go into everlasting punishment; but the just, into life everlasting.

LESSON XVII.

Of Faith in Christ—and keeping the Commandments.

GOD so loved the world as to give his only begotten Son; that whosoever believeth in him, may not perish, but may have life everlasting. He that believeth in him is not condemned. But he that doth not believe, is already condemned; because he believeth not in the name of the only begotten Son of God. But not every one that saith, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; he only that doth the will of his Father who is in heaven, shall enter into the joy of the Lord. If then thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it: Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets.

Christ compareth Doers of the Word to Houses built on a Rock: those that are Hearers only, to Houses built on the Sand.

Therefore whosoever heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them, I will liken him unto a wise man, who built his house upon a rock: and the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell not: for it was founded upon a rock. And every one that heareth these my words, and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man, that built his house upon the sand: and the rain descended, and the floods came, and the wind blew, and beat upon the house; and it fell: and great was the fall of it.

PARABLES OF OUR LORD.

LESSON XVIII.

THE UNMERCIFUL SERVANT.

If we hope for Mercy, we must shew Mercy.

THE kingdom of heaven is likened to a king, who would take an account of his servants. And when he had begun to take the account, one was brought to him that owed him ten thousand talents: and as he had not wherewith to pay it, his lord commanded that he should be sold, and his wife, and children, and all that he had, and payment to be made. But that servant falling down, besought him, saying, Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all. And the lord of that servant being moved with pity, let him go, and forgave him the debt. But when that servant was gone out, he found one of his fellow-servants that owed him an hundred pence: and laying hold of him, he throttled him, saying, Pay what thou owest. And his fellow servant falling down, besought him, saying, Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all. And he would not; but went and cast him into prison, till he paid the debt. Now his fellow-servants seeing what was done, were very much grieved; and they came and told their lord all that was done. Then his lord called him, and said to him, Thou wicked servant, I forgave thee all the debt, because thou besoughtest me: shouldest not thou then have had compassion also on thy fellow-servant, even as I had compassion on thee? And his lord, being angry, delivered him to the tortures, until he paid all the debt. So also shall my heavenly Father do to you, if you forgive not every one his brother from your hearts.

LESSON XIX.

THE TALENTS.

We must account for the Means which God affords us of Improvement.

A MAN going from home, delivered unto his servants his goods—to one he gave five talents; to another, two; and to another, one. After some time, the Lord of these servants returned; and he that received the five talents, said to him, lord, thou deliveredst unto me five talents: behold, I have gained five more. He also that received two talents, came and said, Lord, thou deliveredst unto me two talents: behold, I have gained two more. The lord said to each of these servants, Well done, good and faithful servant, thou hast been faithful over a few things:—I will make thee ruler over many; enter thou into the joy of the Lord.—Then he who had received one talent, brought to the lord that one talent, saying, That he had hid it in the earth to keep it for him; and the lord was angry with that servant, and took from him the one talent, and gave it to the servant who had ten. And that unprofitable servant who brought back the one talent, was cast into outer darkness. There shall be weeping, and gnashing of teeth.

LESSON XX.

THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

All Men are our Neighbours, and we are bound to do them all the good in our power, whatever may be their Nation or Religion.

A CERTAIN man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves, who stripped him of his raiment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead. And by chance, there came down a certain Priest that way; and when he saw him, he passed by on the other side. And likewise a Levite, when he was at the place, came and looked on him, and passed by on the other side.

But a certain Samaritan, as he journeyed, came where he was: and when he saw him, he had compassion on him, and went to him, and bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine; and set him on his own beast, and brought him to an inn, and took care of him. And on the morrow, when he departed, he took out two-pence, and gave them to the host, and said unto him, "Take care of him; and whatsoever thou spendest more, when I come again, I will repay thee."

Christian Lessons.

"Which now of these three, thinkest thou, was neighbour unto him that fell among the thieves?" And the Lawyer said, "He that shewed mercy on him." Then said Jesus unto him, "Go, and do thou likewise."

LESSON XXI.

THE RICH FOOL.

The end of him that layeth up Treasure for himself, and is not rich towards God.

THE ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully. And he thought within himself, saying, what shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits? And he said, This will I do; I will pull down my barns, and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods. And I will say to my soul—"Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease; eat, drink, and be merry." But God said unto him, "Thou fool! this night thy soul shall be required of thee: then whose shall those things be which thou hast provided?" So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich towards God.

LESSON XXII.

THE BARREN FIG-TREE.

God permits Sinners to live, that they may have time to repent.

A CERTAIN man had a fig-tree planted in his vineyard, and he came and sought fruit thereon, and found none. Then said he unto the dresser of his vineyard, "Behold! these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig-tree, and find none: cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground?" And he, answering, said unto him, "Lord, let it alone this year also, till I shall dig about it, and dung it; and if it bear fruit, well; and if not, then after that thou shalt cut it down."

LESSON XXIII.

THE PRODIGAL SON.

God is always ready to forgive Sinners, who sincerely repent, and apply to him for pardon through Jesus Christ.

A CERTAIN man had two sons; and the younger of them said to his father; "Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth to me." And he divided unto them his substance. And not many days after, the younger son gathered all together, and took his journey into a far country, and there wasted his substance with riotous living.

And when he had spent all, there arose a mighty famine in that land; and he began to be in want. And he went and joined himself to a citizen of that country, who sent him into the fields to feed swine. And he would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat: and no man gave unto him. And he said to himself, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare; and I perish with hunger! I will arise, and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son; make me as one of thy hired servants.

And he arose and came to his father. But when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him. And the son said unto him, "Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight; and am no more worthy to be called thy son."

But the father said to his servants, "Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him, and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet. And bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it; and let us eat and be merry. For this my son was dead, and is now come to life again; he was lost, and is found." And they began to be merry.

Now his elder son was in the field; and as he came and drew nigh to the house, he heard music and dancing. And he called one of the servants, and asked what these things meant. And he said unto him, Thy brother is come; and thy father hath killed the fatted calf, because he hath received him safe and sound. And he was angry, and would not go in: therefore came his father out, and entreated him.—And he answering, said to his father, "Lo, these many years do I serve thee; neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment; and yet thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends; but as soon as this thy son was come, who hath devoured his substance with harlots, thou hast killed for him the fatted calf." And he said unto him, "Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine. It is meet that we should make merry, and be glad; for this thy brother was dead, and is alive again; and was lost, and is found."

LESSON XXIV.

THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS.

They who do not do good here, according to their means, will be severely punished in a future state; and they who suffer poverty and sickness in this life, with a pious and contented mind, will be eternally happy hereafter.

THERE was a certain rich man, who was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day. And there was a certain beggar named Lazarus, who lay at his gate, full of sores, and desiring to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table; moreover, the dogs came and licked his sores. And it came to pass that the beggar died, and was carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom: the rich man also died, and was buried. And in hell he lift up his eyes, being in torments, and seeth Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom. And he cried, and said, "Father Abraham, have mercy on me; and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and and cool my tongue, for I am tormented in this flame."

But Abraham said, "Son, remember that thou in thy life-time receivedst good things, and Lazarus evil things; but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented. And besides all this, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed: so that they who would pass from hence to you, cannot; neither, can they pass to us, that would come from thence." Then he said, "I pray thee therefore, father, that thou wouldest send him to my father's house; for I have five brethren; that he may testify unto them, lest they also come into this place of torment." Abraham said unto him, "They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them." And he said, "Nay, father Abraham; but if one went unto them from the dead, they will repent." And he said unto him, "If they fear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one arose from the dead."

LESSON XXV.

THE PHARISEE AND PUBLICAN.

God will accept the prayers of the humble Penitent, but not those of the proud and presumptuous.

Two men went up into the Temple to pray; the one a Pharisee, and the other a Publican. The Pharisee stood, and prayed thus with himself: "God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men are; extortioners, unjust, adulterers; or even as this Publican. I fast twice in the week; I give tithes of all that I possess."—And the Publican standing afar off, would not so much as lift up his eyes unto heaven; but smote his breast, saying, "God, be merciful to me, a sinner."—I tell you, this man went down to his house justified rather than the other; for every one that exalteth himself, shall be humbled; and he that humbleth himself, shall be exalted.

LESSON XXVI.

THE SOWER.

If we would profit by the doctrines of Christianity, we must receive them with an humble and teachable disposition.

A SOWER went out to sow his seed; and as he sowed, some fell by the way-side, and the fowls of the air devoured it. And some fell upon stony places, and as soon as it was sprung up, it withered away for want of root. And some fell among thorns, and the thorns sprang up with it and choked them. And other fell on good ground, and sprang up, and bare fruit plentifully. Now the parable is this: When any one heareth the word of God, and understandeth it not, then cometh the wicked one, and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart: this is he that received seed by the way-side. But he that received the seed upon stony ground, the same is he that heareth the word, and with joy receiveth it; yet hath he not root in himself, but dureth for a while: for when tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the word, he fails. He also that received seed among the thorns, is he that heareth the word; and the care of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, choke the word, and he becometh unfruitful. But he that received seed into the good ground, is he that heareth the word, and understandeth it: he beareth fruit, and bringeth forth, some an hundredfold, some sixty, some thirty.

LESSON XXVII.

THE TARES.

Though God does not separate good from bad Christians, but permits them to live together in this world; yet in the next he will make a due distinction between them, and reward or punish them accordingly.

THE kingdom of heaven is likened unto a man, who sowed good seed in his field; but while men slept, his enemy came, and sowed tares among the wheat, and went his way. But when the blade was sprung up, and brought forth fruit, then appeared the tares also. So the servants of the householder came and said unto him, Sir, didst not thou sow good seed in thy field? from whence then hath it tares? He said unto them, An enemy hath done this. The servants said unto him, Wilt thou then that we go and gather them up? But he said, No; lest while ye gather up the tares, ye root up also the wheat with them. Let both grow together until the harvest; and in the time of harvest I will say to the reapers, Gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them: but gather the wheat into my barn. Now he that soweth the good seed is the Son of man; the field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom; but the tares are the children of the wicked one; the enemy that sowed them is the devil; the harvest is the end of the world; and the reapers are the angels. As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire; so shall it be in the end of this world. The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them who do iniquity; and shall cast them into a furnace of fire: there shall be wailing, and gnashing of teeth. Then shall the just shine forth as the sun, in the kingdom of their Father. Who hath ears to hear, let him hear.

LESSON XXVIII.

THE JEWEL OF GREAT PRICE.

The Gospel of Jesus Christ is of such value and importance, that we may safely sacrifice all our earthly possessions for its value.

AGAIN the kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchant-man, seeking goodly pearls; who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had, and bought it.

LESSON XXIX.

THE TEN VIRGINS.

God will admit none into his everlasting kingdom, but those whom he finds in a state of watchfulness and preparation at his coming.

THE kingdom of heaven shall be likened unto ten virgins, who took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom. And five of them were wise, and five were foolish. They that were foolish took their lamps, and took no oil with them: but the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps. While the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept. And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him. Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps. And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil, for our lamps are gone out. But the wise answered saying, Not so; lest there be not enough for us and you: go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves. And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came, and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage, and the door was shut. Afterwards came also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open to us. But he answered, and said, I know you not. Watch, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour, wherein the Son of man cometh.

LESSON XXX.

THE RELAPSED DEMONIAK.

He who has once escaped from the dominion of sin, if he does not carefully guard his heart against its future assaults, will become a greater slave to it than he was before, and sin will enter into that heart which it finds prepared for its reception.

WHEN the unclean spirit is gone out of a man, he walketh through dry places, seeking rest, and findeth none. Then he saith, I will return into my house from whence I came out; and when he is come, he findeth it empty, swept, and garnished. Then goeth he, and taketh with himself seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and they enter in and dwell there; and the last state of that man is worse than the first. Even so shall it be also unto this wicked generation.

MIRACLES OF OUR LORD.

LESSON XXXI.

Our Lord's Works testify of Him.

ALL power was given unto Jesus in heaven and in earth; and the works that he did, bare witness of him; for the winds and the sea obeyed him. With authority and power he commanded the unclean spirits, and they obeyed him. And there were also many other wonderful things that Jesus did, which no other man did.

LESSON XXXII.

Jesus Christ changeth Water into Wine.

THERE was a marriage in Cana of Galilee; and the mother of Jesus was there. And Jesus also was called, and his disciples, to the marriage. And they wanted wine; and Jesus desired the servants to fill the water-pots with water; and they filled them up to the brim. And he said unto them, Draw out now, and bear unto the governor of the feast. And they bare it.

When the ruler of the feast had tasted the water that was made wine, and knew not whence it was (but the servants who drew the water knew); the governor of the feast called the bridegroom, and said unto him, Every man at the beginning doth set forth good wine; and when men have well drunk, then that which is worse: but thou hast kept the good wine until now.

This beginning of miracles did Jesus in Cana of Galilee, and manifested forth his glory; and his disciples believed in him.

LESSON XXXIII.

The Centurion's Servant Healed.

WHEN Jesus was entered into Capernaum, there came unto him a centurion, beseeching him, and saying, Lord, my servant lieth at home sick of the palsy, grievously tormented. And Jesus said unto him, I will come and heal him. The centurion answered and said, Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldest come under my roof: but speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed. For I am a man under authority, having soldiers under me: and I say to this man, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come and he cometh; and to my servant, Do this, and he doeth it.

When Jesus heard this, he marvelled, and said to them that followed, I say unto you, I have not found so great faith in Israel. And I say unto you, That many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven. But the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. And Jesus said unto the centurion, Go thy way; and as thou hast believed, so be it done unto thee. And his servant was healed in the same hour.

LESSON XXXIV.

The Tempest appeased.

AND the same day, when the evening was come, he saith unto them, Let us pass over unto the other side. And when they had sent away the multitude, they took him even as he was in the ship. And there were also with him other ships. And there arose a great storm of wind, and the waves beat into the ship, so that it was filled. And he was in the hinder part of the ship, asleep on a pillow: and they awake him, and say unto him, Master, carest thou not that we perish?

And he arose, and rebuked the wind, and said unto the sea, Peace, be still. And the wind ceased, and there was a great calm. And he said unto them, Why are ye so fearful? How is it that ye have no faith? And they feared exceedingly, and said one to another, What manner of man is this, that even the wind and the sea obey him?

LESSON XXXV.

The Lord walketh upon the Sea.

JESUS constrained his disciples to get into a ship, and to go before him unto the other side of a certain channel of the sea, while he sent the multitudes away. And when he had sent the multitudes away, he went up into a mountain apart to pray: and when the evening was come, he was there alone. But the ship was now in the midst of the sea, tossed with waves; for the wind was contrary. And in the fourth watch of the night Jesus went unto them, walking on the sea.

And when the disciples saw him walking on the sea, they were troubled, saying, It is a spirit; and they cried out for fear. But Jesus spake unto them, saying, Be of good cheer; it is I: be not afraid. And Peter answered him and said, Lord, if it be thou, bid me come unto thee on the water. And he said, Come. And when Peter was come down out of the ship, he walked on the water, to go to Jesus. But when he saw the wind boisterous, he was afraid; and beginning to sink, he cried, saying, Lord, save me. And immediately Jesus stretched forth his hand, and caught him, and said unto him, O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt? And when they were come into the ship, the wind ceased. Then they that were in the ship came and worshipped him, saying, Of a truth thou art the Son of God.

LESSON XXXVI.

The Lord raiseth the Daughter of Jairus from the Dead.

THERE came one of the rulers of the synagogue, Jairus by name, unto Jesus; and when he saw him, he fell at his feet, and besought him greatly, saying, My daughter lieth at the point of death: I pray thee, come and lay thy hands on her, that she may be healed; and she shall live. While he yet spake, there came one from the ruler of the synagogue's house, who said, Thy daughter is dead: why troublest thou the Master any further?

As soon as Jesus heard the word that was spoken, he said unto the ruler of the synagogue, Be not afraid, only believe. And he suffered no man to follow him, save Peter, and James, and John the brother of James. And he cometh to the house of the ruler of the synagogue, and seeth the tumult, and people weeping and wailing much. And when he was come in, he saith unto them, Why make ye this ado, and weep? the damsel is not dead, but sleepeth. And they laughed him to scorn. But when he had put them all out, he taketh the father and the mother of the damsel, and them that were with him, and entereth in where the damsel was lying. And he took the damsel by the hand, and said unto her, Talitha cumi; which is, being interpreted, Damsel, I say unto thee, Arise. And straightway the damsel arose, and walked; and she was of the age of twelve years. And they were astonished with a great astonishment. And he charged them strictly, that no man should know it; and commanded that something should be given her to eat.

LESSON XXXVII.

The Man with a Withered Hand cured.

OUR Lord being in the synagogue, behold, there was a man who had his hand withered. And they asked him, saying, Is it lawful to heal on the Sabbath-day? that they might accuse him.

And he said unto them, What man shall there be among you, that shall have one sheep, and if it fall into a pit on the Sabbath-day, will he not lay hold on it, and lift it out? How much then is a man better than a sheep? Wherefore it is lawful to do on the Sabbath-days a good deed. Then said he to the man, Stretch forth thine hand. And he stretched it forth; and it was restored whole, like as the other.

LESSON XXXVIII.

Christ feedeth the Multitude by a Miracle.

WHEN it was evening, his disciples came to him, saying, This is a desert place, and the time is now past; send the multitude away, that they may go into the villages and buy themselves victuals. But Jesus said unto them, They need not depart; give ye them to eat. And they answered, We have here but five loaves and two fishes. He said, Bring them hither to me.

And he commanded the multitude to sit down on the grass, and took the five loaves and the two fishes, and looking up to heaven, he blessed, and brake, and gave the loaves to his disciples, and the disciples to the multitude. And they did all eat, and were filled: and they took up of the fragments that remained, twelve baskets full. And they that had eaten were about five thousand men, beside women and children.

LESSON XXXIX.

Christ healeth the Daughter of the Woman of Canaan.

JESUS having departed into the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, behold, a woman of Canaan came out of the same coasts, and cried unto him, saying, Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou son of David: my daughter is grievously troubled with a devil. But he answered her not a word. And his disciples came

and

and besought him, saying, Send her away ; for she crieth after us. But he answered and said, I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel.

Then came she and worshipped him, saying, Lord, help me. But he answered and said, It is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it to dogs. And she said, Truth, Lord ; yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their master's table.

Then Jesus answered, and said unto her, O woman, great is thy faith : be it unto thee even as thou wilt. And her daughter was made whole from that very hour.

LESSON XL.

The Lord cures a Lunatic.

THE Lord, having descended from a mountain, came to the multitude ; and there came to him a certain man, kneeling down to him, and saying, Lord have mercy on my son ; for he is lunatic, and suffereth much : for oftentimes he falleth into the fire, and oft into the water. And I brought him to thy disciples, and they could not cure him.

Then Jesus answered and said, O faithless and perverse generation, how long shall I be with you ? how long shall I suffer you ? bring him hither to me. And Jesus rebuked the devil, and he departed out of him : and the child was cured from that very hour.

Then came the disciples to Jesus apart, and said, Why could not we cast him out ? And Jesus said unto them, Because of your unbelief : for I say unto you, If ye have faith as a grain of mustard-seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place ; and it shall remove ; and nothing shall be impossible unto you. Howbeit this kind goeth not out but by prayer and fasting.

LESSON XLI.

The Lord restoreth to Bartimeus his Sight.

AND they came to Jericho ; and as he went out of Jericho with his disciples and a great number of people, blind Bartimeus, the son of Timeus, sat by the highway side begging. And when he heard that it was Jesus of Nazareth, he began to cry out, and say, Jesus, thou son of David, have mercy on me. And many charged him that he should hold his peace : but he cried the more a great deal, Thou son of David, have mercy on me.

And Jesus stood still, and commanded him to be called ; and they call the blind man, saying unto him, Be of good comfort, rise ; he calleth thee. And he, casting away his garment, rose, and came to Jesus. And Jesus answered, and said unto him, What wilt thou that I should do unto thee ? The blind man said unto him, Lord, that I may receive my sight. And Jesus said unto him, Go thy way ; thy faith hath made thee whole. And immediately he received his sight, and followed Jesus in the way.

LESSON XLII.

The Lord healeth the Deaf and Dumb.

AND they brought unto him one that was deaf and dumb ; and they beseech him to put his hand upon him. And he took him aside from the multitude, and put his fingers into his ears, and he spit, and touched his tongue ; and looking up to heaven, he sighed, and saith unto him, Ephphatha, that is, Be opened. And immediately his ears were opened, and the string of his tongue was loosed, and he spake plain.

And he charged them that they should tell no man : but the more he charged them, so much the more a great deal they published it ; and were beyond measure astonished, saying, He hath done all things well : he maketh both the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak.

LESSON XLIII.

The Miraculous Draught of Fishes.

OUR Lord, having taught the multitude from a ship, when he had left speaking, said unto Simon, Launch out into the deep, and let down your nets for a draught. And Simon answering, said unto him, Master, we have toiled all the night, and have taken nothing : nevertheless, at thy word I will let down the net. And when they had this done, they enclosed a great multitude of fishes : and their net brake. And they beckoned unto their partners, that were in the other ship, that they should come and help them. And they came, and filled both the ships, so that they were almost sinking.

When Simon Peter saw this, he fell down at Jesus' knees, saying, Depart from me ; for I am a sinful man, O Lord. For he was astonished, and all that were with him, at the draught of the fishes which they had taken : And so were also James, and John, the sons of Zebedee, who were partners with Simon. And Jesus said unto Simon, Fear not ; from henceforth thou shalt catch men. And when they had brought their ships to land, they forsook all and followed him.

LESSON XLIV.

The Lord healeth one sick of the Palsy.

THE fame of Jesus went abroad, and great multitudes came together to hear, and to be healed by him of their infirmities. And it came to pass on a certain day, as he was teaching, that there were Pharisees and doctors of the law sitting by, that were come out of every town of Galilee, and Judea, and Jerusalem : and the power of the Lord was present to heal them.

And, behold, men brought in a bed, a man who was taken with a palsy : and they sought means to bring him in, and to lay him before him. And when they could not find by what way they might bring him in because of the multitude, multitude, they went upon the house-top, and let him down through the tiling, with his couch into the midst before Jesus. And when he saw their faith, he saith unto him, Man, thy sins are forgiven thee.

And the Scribes and the Pharisees began to reason, saying, Who is this who speaketh blasphemies? Who can forgive sins, but God alone? But when Jesus perceived their thoughts, he said unto them, What reason ye in your hearts? Which is easier, to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Rise up and walk? But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power upon earth to forgive sins (he said unto the sick of the palsy), I say unto thee, Arise, and take up thy couch, and go unto thine house. And immediately he rose up before them, and took up that whereon he lay, and departed to his own house, glorifying God. And they were all amazed, and they glorified God, and were filled with fear, saying, We have seen strange things to-day.

LESSON XLV.

He raiseth the Widow's Son.

AND it came to pass, that he went into a city called Nain; and his disciples went with him, and much people.

Now when he came nigh to the gate of the city, behold, there was a dead man carried out, the only son of his mother, and she was a widow: and much people of the city was with her. And when the Lord saw her, he had compassion on her, and said unto her, Weep not. And he came and touched the bier: and they that bare him stood still. And he said, Young man, I say unto thee, Arise.

And he that was dead sat up, and began to speak. And he delivered him to his mother. And there came a fear on all: and they glorified God, saying, That a great prophet is risen up among us; and, that God hath visited his people. And the rumour of him went forth throughout all Judæa, and throughout all the region round about.

LESSON XLVI.

Ten Lepers cured.

AND it came to pass, as he went to Jerusalem, that he passed through the midst of Samaria and Galilee. And as he entered into a certain village, there met him ten men that were lepers, who stood afar off: and they lifted up their voices, and said, Jesus, Master, have mercy on us.

And when he saw them, he said unto them, Go, shew yourselves unto the priests. And it came to pass, that, as they went, they were cleansed. And one of them, when he saw that he was healed, turned back, and with a loud voice glorified God. And fell down on his face at his feet, giving him thanks: and he was a Samaritan. And Jesus answering, said, Were there not ten cleansed? but where are the nine? There is no one found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger. And he said unto him, Arise, go thy way: thy faith hath made thee whole.

LESSON XLVII.

Jesus Christ cures a Blind Man.

AND as Jesus passed by, he saw a man who was blind from his birth. And his disciples asked him, Master, who did sin, this man, or his parents, that he was born blind? Jesus answered, Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents: but that the works of God should be made manifest in him. I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work. As long as I am in the world, I am the light of the world.

When he had thus spoken, he spat on the ground, and made clay of the spital, and he anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay, and said unto him, Go, wash in the pool of Siloam, (which is by interpretation, Sent.) He went his way therefore, and washed, and came seeing. The neighbours therefore, and they who before had seen that he was blind, said, Is not this he that sat and begged? Some said, This is he: others said, He is like him: but he said, I am he. Therefore said they unto him, How were thine eyes opened? He answered and said, A man that is called Jesus, made clay, and anointed mine eyes, and said unto me, Go to the pool of Siloam, and wash: and I went and washed, and I received sight. Then said they unto him, Where is he? He said, I know not. Then they brought this man to the Pharisees. And it was the sabbath-day when Jesus made the clay, and opened his eyes. Then the Pharisees also asked him how he had received his sight. He said unto them, He put clay upon mine eyes, and I washed and do see. Therefore, said some of the Pharisees, he is not of God, because he keepeth not the Sabbath. Others said, How can a man that is a sinner do such miracles? And there was a division among them.

They say unto the blind man again, What sayest thou of him, that he hath opened thine eyes? He said he is a prophet. But the Jews did not believe concerning him, that he had been blind, and received his sight, until they called the parents of him that had received his sight. And they asked them, saying, Is this your son, who ye say was born blind? How then doth he now see? His parents answered them and said, We know that this is our son, and that he was born blind: but by what means he now seeth, we know not; or who hath opened his eyes, we know not: he is of age; ask him, he shall speak for himself.

These words spake his parents, because they feared the Jews: for the Jews had agreed already, that if any man did confess that he was Christ, he should be put out of the synagogue. Therefore, said his parents, He is of age; ask him. Then again called they the man that was blind, and said unto him, Give glory to God: we know that this man is a sinner. He answered and said, Whether he be a sinner or no, I know not: one thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see. Then said they to him again, What did he to thee? how opened he thine eyes? He answered them, I have told you already, already, and ye did hear : wherefore would ye hear it again ? will ye also be his disciples ? Then they reviled him, and said, Be thou his disciple ; but we are the disciples of Moses.

We know that God spake unto Moses : as for this man, we know not from whence he is. The man answered, and said unto them, Why herein is a marvellous thing, that ye know not from whence he is, and yet he hath opened mine eyes. Now we know that God heareth not sinners : but if any man be a worshipper of God, and doeth his will, him he heareth. Since the world began, it was not heard that any man opened the eyes of one that was born blind. If this man were not of God, he could do nothing. They answered and said unto him, Thou wast altogether born in sins, and dost thou teach us ? And they cast him out.

Jesus heard that they had cast him out ; and when he had found him, he said unto him, Dost thou believe in the Son of God ? He answered, and said, Who is he, Lord, that I may believe in him ? And Jesus said unto him, Thou hast both seen him, and it is he that talketh with thee. And he said, Lord, I believe. And falling down, he adored him.

LESSON XLVIII.

Jesus Christ raises Lazarus.

Now a certain man was sick, named Lazarus, of Bethania, the town of Mary and her sister Martha. Now Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus ; therefore they sent unto him, saying, Lord, behold, he whom thou lovest is sick. When Jesus heard that, he said, This sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of God might be glorified thereby. When he had heard therefore that he was sick, he abode two days still in the same place where he was. Then after that, saith he to his disciples, Let us go into Judea again. His disciples said unto him, Master, the Jews of late sought to stone thee ; and goest thou thither again ? Jesus answered, Are there not twelve hours in the day ? If any man walk in the day, he stumbleth not, because he seeth the light of this world. But if a man walk in the night, he stumbleth, because there is no light in him.

These things said he ; and after that he said unto them, Our friend Lazarus sleepeth ; but I go that I may awake him out of sleep. Then said his disciples, Lord, if he sleep, he shall do well. Now Jesus spake of his death : but they thought that he had spoken of taking of rest in sleep. Then said Jesus unto them plainly, Lazarus is dead. And I am glad for your sakes that I was not there, to the intent ye may believe ; nevertheless let us go unto him. Then said Thomas, who is called Didymus, unto his fellow disciples, Let us also go, that we may die with him. Then when Jesus came, he found that he had lain in the grave four days already.

Now Bethania was nigh unto Jerusalem, about fifteen furlongs off : and many of the Jews came to Martha and Mary, to comfort them concerning their brother. Then Martha, as soon as she heard that Jesus was coming, went and met him : but Mary sat still in the house. Then said Martha unto Jesus, Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died. But I know that even now, whatsoever thou wilt ask of God, God will give it thee. Jesus saith unto her, thy brother shall rise again. Martha said unto him, I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day. Jesus said unto her, I am the resurrection and the life : he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live : and whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die. Believest thou this ? She saith unto him, Yea, Lord : I believe that thou art the Christ the Son of God. And when she had so said, she went her way, and called Mary her sister secretly, saying, The Master is come, and calleth for thee. As soon as she heard that, she arose quickly, and came unto him.

Now Jesus was not yet come into the town, but was in that place where Martha met him. The Jews then who were with her in the house, and comforted her, when they saw Mary, that she rose up hastily and went out, followed her, saying, She goeth unto the grave to weep there. Then when Mary was come where Jesus was, and saw him, she fell down at his feet, saying unto him, Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died. When Jesus therefore saw her weeping, and the Jews also weeping who came with her, he groaned in the spirit, and troubled himself, and said, Where have ye laid him ? They said unto him, Lord, come and see.

Jesus wept. Then said the Jews, Behold how he loved him ! And some of them said, Could not this man, who opened the eyes of the blind, have caused that even this man should not have died ? Jesus therefore again groaning in himself, cometh to the grave. It was a cave, and a stone lay upon it.

Jesus said, Take ye away the stone. Martha, the sister of him that was dead, saith unto him, Lord, by this time he stinketh : for he hath been dead four days. Jesus saith unto her, Said I not unto thee, that if thou wouldest believe, thou shouldest see the glory of God ? Then they took away the stone from the place where the dead was laid. And Jesus lifted up his eyes, and said, Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me. And I knew that thou hearest me always : but because of the people who stand by I said it, that they may believe that thou hast sent me. And when he thus had spoken, he cried with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth ! And he that was dead came forth, bound hand and foot with grave-clothes, and his face was bound about with a napkin. Jesus saith unto them, Loose him, and let him go.

Then many of the Jews who came to Mary, and had seen the things which Jesus did, believed in him.

LESSON XLIX.

The Call of The Twelve Apostles.

WHILE our Lord was diffusing the Gospel by his own discourses and his works, he chose from amongst his disciples, twelve, whom he named apostles, and commissioned also to go forth and preach, and work miracles in his name. Now the names of the twelve apostles are these: the first, Simon, who is called Peter, and Andrew his brother; James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother; Philip, and Bartholomew; Thomas, and Matthew the publican; James the son of Alphaeus, and Thaddeus; Simon the Canaanite and Judas Iscariot, who also betrayed him. These twelve Jesus sent forth, and commanded them, saying, Go not into the way of the Gentiles; and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not; but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. And going, preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand. Heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead, cast out devils; freely ye have received, freely give. Do not possess gold, nor silver, nor brass in your purses, nor scrip for your journey, neither two coats, neither shoes, nor a staff: for the workman is worthy of his meat. And into whatsoever city or town ye shall enter, enquire who in it is worthy; and there abide till ye go thence. And when ye come into an house, salute it. And if the house be worthy, let your peace come upon it: but if it be not worthy, let your peace return to you. And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear your words, when ye depart out of that house, or city, shake off the dust of your feet. I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for that city. Behold, I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves: be ye therefore wise as serpents, and simple as doves. But beware of men: for they will deliver you up to the councils, and they will scourge you in their synagogues: and ye shall be brought before governors and kings for my sake, for a testimony to them and to the Gentiles. But when they deliver you up, take no thought how or what ye shall speak: for it shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak. For it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father that speaketh in you. And ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake: but he that persevereth to the end shall be saved. Whosoever therefore shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father who is in heaven. But whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father who is in heaven. He that receiveth you, receiveth me; and he that receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me. He that receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet, shall receive a prophet's reward; and he that receiveth a just man in the name of a just man, shall receive a just man's reward. And whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only, in the name of a disciple, I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward.

LESSON L.

Jesus sends forth Seventy-two Disciples also.

AFTER these things the Lord appointed other seventy-two also, and sent them two and two before his face, into every city and place, whither he himself would come; and he instructed them as he did the twelve; and they went forth, and they returned again with joy, saying, Lord, even the devils are subject unto us through thy name. And he said unto them, I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven. Behold, I give unto you power to tread on serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy: and nothing shall by any means hurt you. Notwithstanding in this rejoice not, that the spirits are subject unto you; but rather rejoice, because your names are written in heaven.

LESSON LI.

The Apostles return.—Confession of Peter; and the Lord's Promise thereupon.

THE apostles, when they returned, gathered themselves unto Jesus, and told him all things, both what they had done and what they had taught; and after this time, when Jesus came into the coasts of Cesarea Philippi, he asked his disciples, saying, "Whom do men say that I the Son of man am?" And they said, Some say that thou art John the Baptist; some, Elias; and others, Jeremias, or one of the prophets. He saith unto them, "But whom say ye that I am?" And Simon Peter answered and said, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. And Jesus answered and said unto him, "Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father who is in heaven. And I say also unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven." Then charged he his disciples, that they should tell no man that he was Jesus the Christ.

LESSON LII.

The Transfiguration of Our Lord.

AND it came to pass about eight days after these sayings, he took Peter, and John, and James, and went up into a mountain to pray. And as he prayed, the fashion of his countenance was altered, and his raiment was white and glittering. And, behold, there talked with him two men, who were Moses and Elias, who appeared in glory, and spake of his decease, which he should accomplish at Jerusalem. But Peter, and they that were with him, were heavy with sleep: and when they were awake, they saw his glory, and the two men that stood with him. And it came to pass, as they departed from him, Peter said unto Jesus, Master, it is good for us to be here: and let us make three tabernacles; one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias: not knowing what he said.

Christian Lessons.

While he thus spake, there came a cloud, and overshadowed them; and they feared as they entered into the cloud. And there came a voice out of the cloud, saying, This is my beloved Son: hear him. And while the voice was uttered, Jesus was found alone. And they kept it close, and told no man in those days any of those things which they had seen. And as they came down from the mountain, Jesus charged them, saying, Tell the vision to no man, until the Son of man be risen again from the dead.

LESSON LIII.

Our Lord proceeds towards Jerusalem—False Zeal condemned.

AND it came to pass, when the time was come, that he stedfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem, and sent messengers before him; who went, and entered into a village of the Samaritans, to make ready for him. And they did not receive him, because his face was as though he would go to Jerusalem; for the Samaritans hated those who worshipped at Jerusalem. And when his disciples James and John saw this, they said, Lord, wilt thou that we command fire to come down from heaven, and consume them, even as Elias did? But he turned and rebuked them, and said, Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of. For the Son of man is not come to destroy, but to save. And they went to another village.

LESSON LIV.

Jesus Christ predicteth his Death and Resurrection.

AND as they were in the way going up to Jerusalem, he took again the twelve, and began to tell them what things should happen unto him, saying, Behold, we go up to Jerusalem; and the Son of man shall be delivered unto the chief priests, and unto the scribes; and they shall condemn him to death, and shall deliver him to the Gentiles: and they shall mock him, and shall scourge him, and shall spit upon him, and shall kill him: and the third day he shall rise again. Even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many. Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone: but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit. He that loveth his life shall lose it; and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal. If any man serve me, let him follow me; and where I am, there shall also my servant be: if any man serve me, him will my Father honour. Now is my soul troubled; and what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour: but for this cause came I unto this hour. Father glorify thy name.

Then came there a voice from heaven, saying, I HAVE BOTH GLORIFIED IT, AND WILL GLORIFY IT AGAIN. The people therefore, that stood by, and heard it, said that it thundered: others said, An angel spake to him. Jesus answered and said, This voice came not because of me, but for your sakes. Now is the judgment of this world: now shall the prince of this world be cast out. And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all unto me.

This he said, signifying what death he should die.

LESSON LV.

Mary anointeth the Feet of Jesus.

THEN Jesus, six days before the passover, came to Bethania, where Lazarus was, whom he raised from the dead. There they made him a supper; and Martha served: but Lazarus was one of them that sat at the table with him. Then took Mary a pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly, and anointed the feet of Jesus, and wiped his feet with her hair: and the house was filled with the odour of the ointment.

Then saith one of his disciples, Judas Iscariot, who was to betray him, Why was not this ointment sold for three hundred pence, and given to the poor? This he said, not that he cared for the poor; but because he was a thief, and had the bag, and what was put therein. And Jesus said, Let her alone; why trouble ye her? she hath wrought a good work on me. For ye have the poor with you always, and whensoever ye will, ye may do them good: but me ye have not always. She hath done what she could: she is come aforehand to anoint my body for the burial. I say unto you, Wheresoever this gospel shall be preached throughout the world, this also that she hath done shall be spoken of for a memorial for her.

LESSON LVI.

The Lamentation of our Lord over Jerusalem.

AND when he was come near, he beheld the city, and wept over it, saying, If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace, but now are they hid from thine eyes. For the days shall come upon thee, that thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and shall compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side; and shall lay thee even with the ground, and thy children within thee; and they shall not leave in thee one stone upon another, because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation.

O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! Behold your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you, Ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.

LESSON

LESSON LVII.

The Entrance of Jesus Christ into Jerusalem.

AND when they drew nigh unto Jerusalem, and were come to Bethphage, unto the mount of Olives, then sent Jesus two disciples, saying unto them, Go into the village over against you, and straightway ye shall find an ass tied, and a colt with her: loose them, and bring them unto me. And if any man say ought unto you, ye shall say, The Lord hath need of them; and straightway he will send them.

All this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying, Tell ye the daughter of Sion, Behold, thy king cometh unto thee, meek, and sitting upon an ass, and a colt, the foal of her that is used to the yoke. And the disciples went, and did as Jesus commanded them, and brought the ass, and the colt, and put on them their clothes, and they set him thereon. And a very great multitude spread their garments in the way; others cut down branches from the trees, and strewed them in the way. And the multitudes that went before, and that followed, cried, saying, Hosanna to the son of David: Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord; Hosanna in the highest.

And when he was come into Jerusalem, all the city was moved, saying, Who is this? And the multitude said, This is Jesus, the prophet of Nazareth of Galilee. And some of the Pharisees from among the multitude said unto him, Master, rebuke thy disciples. And he answered and said unto them, I tell you, that if these should hold their peace, the stones would immediately cry out.

LESSON LVIII.

The Lord entereth into the Temple, and casteth out those who defile it.

AND Jesus went into the temple of God, and cast out all them that sold and bought in the temple, and overthrew the tables of the money-changers, and the seats of them that sold doves; and said unto them, It is written, My house shall be called the house of prayer; but ye have made it a den of thieves.

And the blind and the lame came to him in the temple: and he healed them. And when the chief priests and scribes saw the wonderful things that he did, and the children crying in the temple, and saying, Hosanna to the son of David, these were sore displeased; and said unto him, Hearest thou what they say? And Jesus said unto them, Yea: Have ye never read, Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise?

LESSON LIX.

The Lord celebrates the Last Supper with his Disciples.

Now before the feast of the passover, when Jesus knew that his hour was come, that he should depart out of this world unto the Father, having loved his own who were in the world, he loved them unto the end. Then came the day of unleavened bread, when the passover must be killed. And he sent Peter and John, saying, Go and prepare us the passover, that we may eat. And they said unto him, Where wilt thou that we prepare? And he said unto them, Behold, when ye are entered into the city, there shall a man meet you, bearing a pitcher of water: follow him into the house where he entereth in. And ye shall say unto the good man of the house, The Master saith unto thee, Where is the guest chamber where I shall eat the passover with my disciples? And he shall shew you a large room furnished: there make ready.

And they went, and found as he had said unto them: and they made ready the passover. And when the hour was come, he sat down, and the twelve apostles with him. And he said unto them, With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer: For I say unto you, I will not any more eat thereof, until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God.

And he took the cup (or chalice), and gave thanks, and said, Take and divide it among you: for I say to you, that I will not drink of the fruit of the vine, until the kingdom of God is at hand. And as they were eating, he took bread, and blessed it, and broke it, and gave it to his disciples, saying, Take, eat, this is my body which is given for you; do this in remembrance of me: likewise also the chalice, or cup, after supper, saying, This cup is the New Testament in my blood, which shall be shed for you.

And supper being ended, Jesus knowing that the Father had given all things into his hands, and that he was come from God, and went to God; he riseth from supper, and laid aside his garments; and took a towel, and girded himself. After that he poureth water into a bason, and began to wash the disciples' feet, and to wipe them with the towel wherewith he was girded. Then cometh he to Simon Peter; and Peter said unto him, Lord, dost thou wash my feet? Jesus answered and said unto him, What I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter. Peter said unto him, Thou shalt never wash my feet. Jesus answered him, If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me. Simon Peter saith unto him, Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head. Jesus saith to him, he that is washed needeth not but to wash his feet, he is clean wholly: and ye are clean, but not all. For he knew who would betray him: therefore, said he, Ye are not all clean.

So after he had washed their feet, and had taken his garments, and was set down again, he said unto them, Know ye what I have done to you? Ye call me Master and Lord: and ye say well: for so I am. If I then, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet; ye also ought to wash one another's feet. For I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you. Verily, verily, I say unto you, The servant is not greater than his lord; neither is he who is sent, greater than he that sent him. If ye know know these things, happy are ye if ye do them. I speak not of you all: I know whom I have chosen: but that the Scripture may be fulfilled, He that eateth bread with me hath lifted up his heel against me. Now I tell you before it come, that, when it is come to pass, ye may believe that I am he. Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that receiveth whomsoever I send, receiveth me: and he that receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me.

When Jesus had thus said, he was troubled in spirit, and testified, and said, Verily, verily, I say unto you, that one of you shall betray me. Then the disciples looked one on another, doubting of whom he spake. Now there was leaning on Jesus' bosom one of his disciples, whom Jesus loved. Simon Peter therefore beckoned to him, that he should ask who it should be of whom he spake. He then, lying on Jesus' breast, saith unto him, Lord, who is it? Jesus answered, He it is, to whom I shall give a morsel of bread when I have dipped it. And when he had dipped the morsel, he gave it to Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon. And after the morsel, Satan entered into him. Then said Jesus unto him, What thou doest, do quickly. Now no man at the table knew for what intent he spake this unto him. For some of them thought, because Judas had the purse, that Jesus had said unto him, Buy those things that we have need of against the festival day: or, that he should give something to the poor. He then, having received the morsel, went immediately out; and it was night. Therefore, when he was gone out, Jesus said, Now is the Son of man glorified, and God is glorified in him. If God be glorified in him, God shall also glorify him in himself, and shall straightway glorify him. Little children, yet a little while I am with you. Ye shall seek me: and as I said unto the Jews, Whither I go, ye cannot come; so now I say to you. A new commandment I give unto you, That ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another. By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one for another.

And he said unto them, the kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them: and they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors. But ye shall not be so: he that is greatest among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that doth serve. For whether is greater, he that sitteth at table, or he that serveth? is not he that sitteth at table? but I am among you as he that serveth. Ye are they who have continued with me in my temptations. And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me; that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel.

And the Lord said, Simon, Simon, behold, Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat; but I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not: and when thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren. And he said unto him, Lord, I am ready to go with thee, both into prison and to death. And he said, I tell thee, Peter, the cock shall not crow this day, before that thou shalt thrice deny that thou knowest me.

LESSON LX.

Jesus Christ comforteth and encourageth his Disciples, and promiseth them another Comforter.

LET not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you that. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also. And whither I go ye know, and the way ye know.

Thomas saith unto him, Lord, we know not whither thou goest; and how can we know the way? Jesus saith unto him, I am the way, the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by me. If ye had known me, ye should have known my Father also: and from henceforth ye know him, and have seen him.

Philip saith unto him, Lord, shew us the Father, and it sufficeth us. Jesus saith unto him, Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? he that hath seen me hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou then, Shew us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in me? the words that I speak unto you, I speak not of myself: but the Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works. Believe me that I am in the Father, and the Father in me: or else believe me for the very works' sake. Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that believeth in me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do; because I go unto my Father. And whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son. If ye shall ask any thing in my name, I will do it. If ye love me, keep my commandments. And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever; even the Spirit of truth; whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him: but ye shall know him; for he shall dwell with you, and shall be in you. I will not leave you orphans: I will come to you. Yet a little while, and the world seeth me no more; but ye see me: because I live, ye shall live also. At that day ye shall know that I am in my Father, and ye in me, and I in you. He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me: and he that loveth me shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him, and will manifest myself to him.

Judas saith unto him, (but not Iscariot, who was to betray him,) Lord, how is it that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us, and not unto the world? Jesus answered, and said unto him, If a man love me, he will keep my words: and my Father will love him, and we we will come unto him, and make our abode with him. He that loveth me not, keepeth not my sayings: and the word which ye hear is not mine, but the Father's, who sent me. These things have I spoken unto you, being yet present with you. But the Comforter, the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you. Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid.

Ye have heard how I said unto you, I go away, and come again unto you. If ye loved me, ye would rejoice, because I said, I go unto the Father: for my Father is greater than I. And now I have told you before it come to pass, that when it is come to pass, ye may believe. I will not now talk much with you: for the prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in me. But that the world may know that I love the Father; and as the Father gave me commandment, even so I do. Arise, let us go hence.

LESSON LXI.

Christ sheweth the Union between himself and his Disciples, and exhorteth them to love one another.

I AM the true vine, and my Father is the husbandman. Every branch in me that beareth not fruit, he taketh away: and every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit. Now ye are clean through the word which I have spoken unto you. Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in me. I am the vine, ye are the branches: he that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringing forth much fruit; for without me ye can do nothing. If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered; and men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burned. If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you. Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples. As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you: continue ye in my love. If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love; even as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love.

These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full. This is my commandment, That ye love one another, as I have loved you. Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends. Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you. Henceforth I call you not servants; for the servant knoweth not what his lord doeth: but I have called you friends; for all things that I have heard of my Father, I have made known unto you. Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and appointed you, that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain: that whatsoever ye shall ask of the Father in my name, he may give it you. These things I command you, that ye love one another. If the world hate you, ye know that it hated me before it hated you. If ye were of the world, the world would love its own: but because ye are not of the world but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you. Remember the word that I said unto you, The servant is not greater than his lord. If they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you; if they have kept my saying, they will keep yours also. But all these things will they do unto you for my name's sake, because they know not him that sent me. If I had not come and spoken unto them, they had not had sin: but now they have no excuse for their sin. He that hateth me hateth my Father also. If I had not done among them the works that no other man did, they had not had sin: but now have they both seen and hated both me and my Father. But that the word might be fulfilled that is written in their law, They hated me without a cause. But when the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, the Spirit of truth, who proceedeth from the Father, he shall testify of me: and ye also shall bear witness, because ye have been with me from the beginning.

LESSON LXII.

Jesus Christ warneth his Disciples to prepare themselves against Tribulations—He comforteth them, and encourageth them to Prayer.

THESE things have I spoken unto you, that ye should not be scandalized. They shall put you out of the synagogues: yea, the time cometh, that whosoever killeth you will think that he doeth God service. And these things will they do unto you, because they have not known the Father, nor me. But these things have I told you, that when the time shall come, ye may remember that I told you of them. And these things I said not unto you at the beginning, because I was with you.

But now I go my way to him that sent me; and none of you asketh me, Whither goest thou? But because I have said these things unto you, sorrow hath filled your heart. Nevertheless I tell you the truth; it is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you.

I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now. Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth: for he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak: and he will shew you things to come. He shall glorify me: for he shall receive of mine, and shall shew it unto you. All things that the Father hath are mine: therefore said I, That he shall take of mine, and shew it unto you. A little while, and ye shall not see me: and again, a little while, and ye shall see me, because I go to the Father.

Then said some of his disciples among themselves, themselves, What is this that he saith unto us, A little while, and ye shall not see me: and again, A little while, and ye shall see me: and, Because I go to the Father? They said therefore, What is this that he saith, A little while? we know not what he saith.

Now Jesus knew that they were desirous to ask him, and said unto them, Of this do ye enquire among yourselves, that I said, A little while, and ye shall not see me: and again, A little while, and ye shall see me? Verily, verily, I say unto you, That ye shall weep and lament, but the world shall rejoice: and ye shall be sorrowful, but your sorrow shall be turned into joy. A woman when she is in labour, hath sorrow, because her hour is come: but as soon as she is delivered of the child, she remembereth no more the anguish, for joy that a man is born into the world. And ye now therefore have sorrow: but I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man shall take from you. And in that day ye shall ask me nothing. Verily, verily, I say unto you, Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, he will give it you. Hitherto have ye asked nothing in my name: ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full.

These things have I spoken unto you in proverbs: but the time cometh, when I shall no more speak unto you in proverbs, but I shall shew you plainly of the Father. At that day ye shall ask in my name: and I say not unto you, that I will pray the Father for you: for the Father himself loveth you, because ye have loved me, and have believed that I came out from God. I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world: again, I leave the world and go to the Father. His disciples said unto him, Lo, now speakest thou plainly, and speakest no proverb. Now are we sure that thou knowest all things, and needest not that any man should ask thee; by this we believe that thou camest forth from God.

Jesus answered them, Do ye now believe? Behold, the hour cometh, yea, is now come, that ye shall be scattered, every man to his own, and shall leave me alone: and yet I am not alone, because the Father is with me. These things I have spoken unto you, that in me ye may have peace. In the world ye shall have tribulation: but be of good cheer: I have overcome the world.

LESSON LXIII.

The Prayer of Jesus Christ for his Apostles, and those who believe in him.

THESE words spake Jesus, and lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said, Father, the hour is come; glorify thy Son, that thy Son also may glorify thee: as thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to all whom thou hast given him. And this is life eternal, that they may know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent. I have glorified thee on the earth: I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do. And now, O

Father, glorify thou me with thyself, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was. I have manifested thy name unto the men whom thou gavest me out of the world: thine they were, and thou gavest them me; and they have kept thy word. Now they have known that all things whatsoever thou hast given me, are of thee. For I have given unto them the words which thou gavest me; and they have received them, and have known surely that I came out from thee, and they have believed that thou didst send me. I pray for them: I pray not for the world, but for them whom thou hast given me; for they are thine. And all my things are thine, and thine are mine: and I am glorified in them.

And now I am no more in the world, but these are in the world, and I come to thee. Holy Father, keep them in thy name whom thou hast given me, that they may be one, as we are. While I was with them in the world, I kept them in thy name: those that thou gavest me I have kept, and none of them is lost, but the son of perdition; that the Scripture might be fulfilled. And now come I to thee; and these things I speak in the world, that they may have my joy fulfilled in themselves. I have given them thy word, and the world hath hated them, because they are not of the world, even as I am not of the world. I pray not that thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that thou shouldest keep them from evil. They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world. Sanctify them in thy truth: thy word is truth. As thou hast sent me into the world, even so have I also sent them into the world. And for their sakes I sanctify myself, that they also may be sanctified in the truth. Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also who shall believe in me through their word; that they all may be one; as thou, Father, in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us: that the world may believe that thou hast sent me. And the glory which thou gavest me I have given them; that they may be one even as we are one. I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one; and that the world may know that thou hast sent me, and hast loved them, as thou hast loved me.

Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am: that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me: for thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world. The world hath not known thee: but I have known thee, and these have known that thou hast sent me. And I have declared unto them thy name, and will declare it: that the love wherewith thou hast loved me may be in them, and I in them.

LESSON LXIV.

The Agony and Resignation of Our Lord.

WHEN Jesus had spoken these words, he went forth with his disciples over the brook Cedron, where was a garden, into the which he entered, and his disciples.

Then

Then cometh Jesus with them unto a place called Gethsemane, and saith unto the disciples, Sit ye here, while I go and pray yonder. And he took with him Peter and the two sons of Zebedee, and began to be sorrowful. Then saith he unto them, My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death: stay ye here, and watch with me. And he went a little farther, and fell on his face, and prayed, saying, O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me: nevertheless not as I will, but as thou wilt. And he cometh unto the disciples, and findeth them asleep, and saith unto Peter, What, could ye not watch with me one hour? Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation: the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak. He went away again the second time, and prayed saying, O my Father, if this cup may not pass away from me, but I must drink it, thy will be done. And he came again, and found them asleep: for their eyes were heavy. And he left them, and went away again, and prayed the third time, saying the same words.

And there appeared an angel unto him from heaven, strengthening him. And being in an agony, he prayed more earnestly; and his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground. And when he rose up from prayer, and was come to his disciples, he found them sleeping for sorrow: and said unto them, Why sleep ye? rise and pray, lest ye enter into temptation.

LESSON LXV.

Judas betrayeth the Lord.

Now the chief priests and scribes sought how they might put Jesus to death; but they feared the people. Then entered Satan into Judas, surnamed Iscariot, being of the number of the twelve. And he went away, and plotted with the chief priests and captains, how he might betray him unto them. And they were glad, and covenanted to give him money. And he promised, and sought opportunity to betray him unto them in the absence of the multitude. Judas then, having received a band of men and officers from the chief priests and pharisees, cometh to the place where Jesus was, with lanterns and torches, and weapons: and he gave them a sign, saying, Whomsoever I shall kiss, that same is he: hold him fast. And forthwith he came to Jesus, and said, Hail, Master! and kissed him. But Jesus said unto him, Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?

Jesus therefore, knowing all things that should come upon him, went forth, and said unto them, Whom seek ye? They answered him, Jesus of Nazareth. Jesus saith unto them, I am he. And Judas also, who betrayed him, stood with them. As soon then as he had said unto them, I am he, they went backward, and fell to the ground. Then asked he them again, Whom seek ye? And they said, Jesus of Nazareth. Jesus answered, I have told you that I am he: if therefore ye seek me, let these go their way: that the saying might be fulfilled, which he spake, Of them whom thou gavest me have I lost none.

Then Simon Peter having a sword, drew it, and smote the high priest's servant, and cut off his right ear. The servant's name was Malchus. And Jesus answered and said, Suffer ye thus far. And he touched his ear, and healed him. Then said Jesus unto him, Put up again thy sword into its place; for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword. Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, and he will presently give me more than twelve legions of angels? But how then shall the Scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be? In that same hour said Jesus to the multitudes, Are ye come out as against a thief, with swords and staves for to take me? I sat daily with you teaching in the temple, and ye laid no hold on me. But all this was done, that the Scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled. Then all the disciples forsook him, and fled.

SUFFERINGS OF OUR LORD.

LESSON LXVI.

Jesus Christ is brought before Caiaphas.

THEN the band of the Jews took Jesus, and bound him, and led him away to Annas first; for he was father-in-law to Caiaphas, who was the high priest that same year.

Now Caiaphas had given counsel to the Jews, that it was expedient that one man should die for the people.

And the servants and officers stood there, who had made a fire: for it was cold; and they warmed themselves: and Peter stood with them, and warmed himself.

The high priest then asked Jesus concerning his disciples, and of his doctrine. Jesus answered him, I have spoken openly to the world; I have always taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort; and in secret have I said nothing. Why asketh thou me? ask those who heard me, what I have said unto them: behold, they know what I said. And when he had thus spoken, one of the officers who stood by, struck Jesus with the palm of his hand, saying, Answerest thou the high priest so? Jesus answered him, If I have spoken evil, bear witness of the evil: but if well, why smitest thou me? Now Annas sent him bound unto Caiaphas the high priest.

And they led Jesus away to the high priest: and with him were assembled all the chief priests and the elders and the scribes. And Peter followed him afar off, even into the palace of the high priest; and he sat with the servants and warmed himself at the fire. And the chief priests and all the council sought for witness against Jesus to put him to death: and found none. For many bare false witness against him, but their witness agreed not. And there arose some who bore false witness against him, saying, We heard him say, I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and within three days I will build another, made without hands. But neither did their testimony agree. And the high priest stood up in the midst, and asked Jesus, saying, Answerest thou nothing to what these witness against thee? But he held his peace, and answered nothing. Again the high priest asked him, and said unto him, Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed God? And Jesus said, I am: and ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of the power of God, and coming in the clouds of heaven. Then the high priest rent his clothes, and saith, What need we any further witnesses? Ye have heard the blasphemy: what think ye? And they all condemned him to be guilty of death. And some began to spit on him, and to cover his face, and to buffet him, and to say unto him, Prophecy: and the servants did strike him with the palms of their hands. And the men that held Jesus mocked him, and smote him. And when they had blindfolded him, they struck him on the face, and said, Prophecy, who is it that smote thee? And many other things blasphemously spake they against him.

Christian Lessons.

LESSON LXVII.

Peter denieth the Lord.

AND when they had kindled a fire in the midst of the hall, and were sat down together, Peter sat down among them. But a certain maid beheld him as he sat by the fire, and earnestly looked upon him, and said, This man was also with him. And he denied him, saying, Woman, I know him not. And after a little while another saw him, and said, Thou art also of them. And Peter said, Man, I am not. And about the space of one hour after, another confidently affirmed, saying, Of a truth this man also was with him; for he is a Galilean. And Peter said, Man, I know not what thou sayest. And immediately, while he yet spake, the cock crew. And the Lord turned, and looked upon Peter. And Peter remembered the word of the Lord, how he had said unto him, Before the cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice. And Peter went out, and wept bitterly.

LESSON LXVIII.

The Lord brought before Pilate.

WHEN the morning was come, all the chief priests, and elders of the people, took counsel against Jesus to put him to death: and when they had bound him, they led him away, and delivered him to Pontius Pilate the governor.

Then led they Jesus from Caiaphas unto the hall of judgment; and it was early; and they themselves went not into the judgment hall, lest they should be defiled; but that they might eat the passover. Pilate then went out unto them, and said, What accusation bring ye against this man? They answered and said unto him, If he were not a malefactor, we would not have delivered him up unto thee. Then said Pilate unto them, Take ye him, and judge him according to your law. The Jews therefore said unto him, It is not lawful for us to put any man to death: that the saying of Jesus might be fulfilled, which he spake, signifying what death he should die. Then Pilate entered into the judgment hall again, and called Jesus, and said unto him, Art thou the King of the Jews? Jesus answered him, Sayest thou this thing of thyself, or did others tell it thee of me? Pilate answered, Am I a Jew? Thine own nation and the chief priests have delivered thee unto me: what hast thou done? Jesus answered, My kingdom is not of this world: if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews: but now is my kingdom not from hence. Pilate therefore said unto him, Art thou a king then? Jesus answered, Thou sayest that I am a king. To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth. Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice. Pilate saith unto him, What is truth? And when he had said this, he went out again unto the Jews, and saith unto them, I find in him no fault at all. And they were the more fierce, saying, He stirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Judea, beginning from Galilee, to this place.

When Pilate heard of Galilee, he asked whether the man were a Galilean. And as soon as he knew that he belonged unto Herod's jurisdiction, he sent him to Herod, who himself also was at Jerusalem at that time. And when Herod saw Jesus, he was exceeding glad: for he was desirous to see him of a long time, because he had heard many things of him; and he hoped to see some miracle done by him. Then he questioned him in many words; but he answered him nothing. And the chief priests and scribes stood and vehemently accused him. And Herod with his soldiers set him at nought, and mocked him, and arrayed him in a white robe, and sent him again to Pilate. And the same day Pilate and Herod were made friends together: for before, they were at enmity between themselves. And Pilate, when he had called together the chief priests and the rulers and the people, said unto them, Ye have brought this man unto me, as one that perverteth the people: and, behold, I, having examined him before you, have found no fault in this man touching those things whereof ye accuse him: No, nor yet Herod: for I sent you to him; and, lo, nothing worthy of death is done unto him.

Now at that feast the governor was wont to release unto the people a prisoner, whom they would. And they had then a notorious prisoner, called Barabbas. Therefore, when they were gathered together, Pilate said unto them, Whom will ye that I release unto you? Barabbas, or Jesus, which is called Christ? For he knew that for envy they had delivered him. When he was set down on the judgment seat, his wife sent unto him, saying, Have thou nothing to do with that just man; for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of him. But the Chief Priests and elders persuaded the multitude that they should ask Barabbas, and destroy destroy Jesus. The governor answered and said unto them, Whether of the two will ye that I release unto you? They said, Barabbas. Pilate saith unto them, What shall I do then with Jesus, who is called Christ? They all say unto him, Let him be crucified. And the governor said, Why, what evil hath he done? But they cried out the more, saying, Let him be crucified.

LESSON LXIX.

Judas hangeth himself.

THEN Judas, who had betrayed him, when he saw that he was condemned, repented himself, and brought again the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests and elders, saying, I have sinned, in betraying innocent blood. And they said, What is that to us? see thou to that. And he cast down the pieces of silver in the temple, and departed, and went and hanged himself. And the chief priests took the silver pieces, and said, It is not lawful to put them into the treasury, because it is the price of blood. And they took counsel, and bought with them the potter's field, to bury strangers in. Wherefore that field was called, The field of blood, unto this day. Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet, saying, And they took the thirty pieces of silver, the price of him that was valued, whom they of the children of Israel did value; and gave them for the potter's field, as the Lord appointed to me.

LESSON LXX.

Jesus Christ is Scourged and Crucified.

THEN Pilate therefore took Jesus, and scourged him. And the soldiers platted a crown of thorns, and put it on his head, and they put on him a purple robe, and said, Hail, King of the Jews! and they smote him with their hands. Pilate therefore went forth again, and saith unto them, Behold, I bring him forth to you, that ye may know that I find no fault in him. Then came Jesus forth, wearing the crown of thorns, and the purple robe. And Pilate said unto them, Behold the man! When the chief priests therefore and officers saw him, they cried out, saying, Crucify him, crucify him. Pilate saith unto them, Take ye him, and crucify him; for I find no fault in him. The Jews answered him, We have a law, and by our law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God. When Pilate therefore heard that saying, he was the more afraid; And went again into the judgment hall, and saith unto Jesus, Whence art thou? But Jesus gave him no answer. Then saith Pilate unto him, Speakest thou not unto me? knowest thou not that I have power to crucify thee, and have power to release thee? Jesus answered, Thou couldest have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above; therefore he that delivered me unto thee, hath the greater sin. And from thenceforth Pilate sought to release him: but the Jews cried out, saying, If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend: whosoever maketh himself a king, speaketh against Cæsar. When Pilate therefore heard that saying, he brought Jesus forth, and sat down in the judgment seat, in a place that is called the Pavement, but in the Hebrew, Gabbatha. And it was the preparation of the passover, and about the sixth hour: and he saith unto the Jews, Behold your King! But they cried out, Away with him, away with him, crucify him! Pilate saith unto them, Shall I crucify your King? The chief priests answered, we have no king but Cæsar.

When Pilate saw that he could prevail nothing, but that rather a tumult was made, he took water, and washed his hands, before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person; see ye to it. Then answered all the people, and said, His blood be on us, and on our children. And they were instant with loud voices, requiring that he might be crucified. And the voices of them and of the chief priests prevailed. And Pilate gave sentence that it should be as they required. And he released unto them, him that for sedition and murder was cast into prison, whom they had desired; but he delivered Jesus to their will.

And the soldiers led him away into the hall, called Pretorium; and they called together the whole band. And they clothed him with purple, and platted a crown of thorns, and put it about his head, and began to salute him, Hail, King of the Jews! And they smote him on the head with a reed, and did spit upon him, and bowing their knees, worshipped him. And as they led him away, they laid hold upon one Simon, a Cyrenian, coming out of the country, and on him they laid the cross, that he might bear it after Jesus. And there followed him a great company of people, and of women, who also bewailed and lamented him. But Jesus turning unto them, said, Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me, but weep for yourselves and for your children: for, behold the days are coming, wherein they shall say, Blessed are the barren, and the wombs that never bare, and the paps which never gave suck. Then shall they begin to say to the mountains, Fall on us; and to the hills, Cover us. For if they do these things in the green wood, what shall be done in the dry?

And when they were come unto a place called Golgotha, that is to say, the place of Calvary, they gave him vinegar to drink, mingled with gall: and when he had tasted thereof, he would not drink. And there were also two malefactors, led with him to be put to death. And when they were come to the place, which is called Calvary, there they crucified him, and the malefactors, one on the right hand, and the other on the left. Then said Jesus, Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do. And Pilate wrote a title, and put it on the cross. And the writing was, JESUS OF NAZARETH, THE KING OF THE JEWS. This title then many of the Jews read: for the place where Jesus was crucified was nigh to the city: and it was written in Hebrew, and Greek, and Latin. Then said the chief priest of the Jews to Pilate, Write not, The King of the Jews; but that he said, I am King of the Jews. Pilate answered, What

Christian Lessons.

I have written I have written. Then the soldiers, when they had crucified Jesus, took his garments, and made four parts, to every soldier a part; and also his coat: now the coat was without seam, woven from the top throughout. They said therefore among themselves, Let us not rend it, but cast lots for it, whose it shall be: that the Scripture might be fulfilled which saith, They parted my raiment among them, and for my vesture they did cast lots. These things therefore the soldiers did. And with him they crucified two thieves; the one on his right hand, and the other on his left. And the Scripture was fulfilled, which saith, And he was numbered with the transgressors. And they that passed by reviled him, wagging their heads, and saying, Thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, save thyself. If thou be the Son of God, come down from the cross. Likewise also the chief priests mocking him, with the scribes and elders, said, He saved others; himself he cannot save. If he be the King of Israel, let him now come down from the cross, and we will believe him. He trusted in God; let him deliver him now, if he will have him: for he said, I am the Son of God.

And one of the malefactors who were hanged blasphemed him, saying, If thou be Christ, save thyself and us. But the other answering, rebuked him, saying, Dost not thou fear God, seeing thou art in the same condemnation? and we indeed justly: for we receive the due reward of our deeds; but this man hath done nothing amiss. And he said unto Jesus, Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom. And Jesus said unto him, Verily, I say unto thee, to-day shalt thou be with me in paradise.

Now there stood by the cross of Jesus his mother, and his mother's sister, Mary of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene. When Jesus therefore saw his mother, and the disciple standing by, whom he loved, he saith unto his mother, Woman, behold thy son! Then saith he to the disciple, Behold thy mother! And from that hour that disciple took her unto his own.

And about the ninth hour Jesus cried with a loud voice, saying, Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani? that is to say, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? Some of them that stood there, when they heard that, said, This man calleth for Elias. After this, Jesus knowing that all things were now accomplished, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, saith, I thirst. Now there was set a vessel full of vinegar: and they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it upon hyssop, and put it to his mouth. When Jesus therefore had received the vinegar, he said, It is finished.

Now from the sixth hour there was darkness over all the earth, until the ninth hour. And Jesus crying with a loud voice, said, Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit: and having said thus, he gave up the ghost. And, behold, the veil of the temple was rent in two from the top to the bottom: and the earth did quake, and the rocks were rent; and the graves were opened; and many bodies of the saints that had slept, arose, and came out of the graves after his resurrection, and went into the holy city, and appeared unto many. Now when the centurion, and they that were with him watching Jesus, saw the earthquake, and those things that were done, they feared greatly, saying, Truly this was the Son of God. And many women were there beholding afar off, who had followed Jesus from Galilee, ministering unto him: among whom was Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James and Joseph, and the mother of Zebedee's children. And all the people that came together to that sight, beholding the things which were done, smote their breasts, and returned.

The Jews therefore, because it was the preparation, that the bodies should not remain upon the cross on the Sabbath-day (for that was a great Sabbath-day), besought Pilate that their legs might be broken, and that they might be taken away. Then came the soldiers, and brake the legs of the first, and of the other that was crucified with him. But when they came to Jesus, and saw that he was dead already, they brake not his legs. But one of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side, and forthwith came thereout blood and water. For these things were done, that the Scripture should be fulfilled, A bone of him shall not be broken. And again another Scripture saith, They shall look on him whom they pierced.

Joseph of Arimathea, an honourable counsellor, who also waited for the kingdom of God, came, and went in boldly unto Pilate, and craved the body of Jesus. And Pilate marvelled if he were already dead: and calling unto him the centurion, he asked him whether he had been any while dead. And when he knew it of the centurion, he gave the body to Joseph. And there came also Nicodemus, who at first came to Jesus by night, and brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about an hundred pounds weight. And when Joseph had taken the body, he wrapped it in a clean linen cloth, and laid it in his own new tomb, which he had hewn out in the rock: and he rolled a great stone to the door of the sepulchre, and departed. And there was Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary, sitting over against the sepulchre.

Now the next day, that followed the day of the preparation, the chief priests and pharisees came together unto Pilate, saying, Sir, we remember that that deceiver said, while he was yet alive, After three days I will rise again. Command therefore that the sepulchre be made sure until the third day, lest his disciples come by night, and steal him away, and say unto the people, He is risen from the dead: so the last error shall be worse than the first. Pilate said unto them, Ye have a watch: go your way, make it as sure as you can. So they went, and made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone, and setting a watch.

LESSON LXXI.

The Resurrection of Our Lord.

AND when the Sabbath was past, Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James, and Salome, had bought sweet spices, that they might come and anoint him. And very early in the morning the first day of the week, they came unto the sepulchre at the rising of the sun. And they said among themselves, Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre? And, behold, there was a great earthquake: for the angel of the Lord descended from heaven, and came and rolled back the stone from the door, and sat upon it. His countenance was like lightning, and his raiment white as snow: and for fear of him the keepers did shake, and became as dead men. And the Angel answered, and said unto the women, Fear not ye: for I know that ye seek Jesus, who was crucified. He is not here: for he is risen, as he said. Come, see the place where the Lord lay. But go your way, tell his disciples and Peter that he goeth before you into Galilee: there shall ye see him, as he said unto you. And they departed quickly from the sepulchre, with fear and great joy; and did run to bring his disciples word.

It was Mary Magdalene, and Joanna, and Mary the mother of James, and other women that were with them, who told these things unto the apostles. And their words seemed to them as idle tales, and they believed them not. Peter therefore went forth, and that other disciple, and came to the sepulchre. So they ran both together: and the other disciple did outrun Peter, and came first to the sepulchre. And he stooping down, and looking in, saw the linen clothes lying: yet went he not in. Then cometh Simon Peter following him, and went into the sepulchre, and seeth the linen clothes lie, and the napkin that was about his head, not lying with the linen clothes, but wrapped together in a place by itself. Then went in also that other disciple, who came first to the sepulchre, and he saw, and believed. For as yet they knew not the Scripture, that he must rise again from the dead. Then the disciples went away again unto their own home. But Mary stood without at the sepulchre weeping: and as she wept, she stooped down, and looked into the sepulchre, and seeth two Angels in white, sitting, the one at the head, and the other at the feet, where the body of Jesus had lain. And they say unto her, Woman, why weepest thou? She saith unto them, Because they have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him. And when she had thus said, she turned herself back, and saw Jesus standing, and knew not that it was Jesus. Jesus saith unto her, Woman, why weepest thou? whom seekest thou? She, supposing him to be the gardener, saith unto him, Sir, if thou hast borne him hence, tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away. Jesus saith unto her, Mary! She turned, and saith unto him, Rabboni! which is to say, Master. Jesus saith unto her, Touch me not; for I am not yet ascended to my Father: but go to my brethren, and say unto them, I ascend unto my Father, and your Father; and to my God, and your God. Mary Magdalene came and told the disciples that she had seen the Lord, and that he had spoken these things unto her.

Now when they were going, behold, some of the watch came into the city, and told the chief priests all the things that were done. And when they were assembled with the elders, and had taken counsel, they gave a large sum of money unto the soldiers, saying, Say ye, his disciples came by night, and stole him away while we slept. And if this come to the governor's ears, we will persuade him, and secure you. So they took the money, and did as they were taught: and this saying is commonly reported among the Jews until this day.

LESSON LXXII.

Jesus Christ appeareth to Two of his Disciples, as they went to Emmaus.

AND, behold, two of the disciples went that same day to a village called Emmaus, which was from Jerusalem about three score furlongs; and they talked together of all these things which had happened. And it came to pass, that, while they communed together and reasoned, Jesus himself drew near, and went with them. But their eyes were holden, that they should not know him. And he said unto them, What manner of communications are these that ye have one to another, as ye walk, and are sad? And the one of them, whose name was Cleopas, answering, said unto him, Art thou only a stranger in Jerusalem, and hast not known the things which are come to pass there in these days? And he said unto them, What things? And they said unto him, Concerning Jesus of Nazareth, who was a prophet mighty in deed and word before God and all the people: and how the chief priests and our rulers delivered him to be condemned to death, and have crucified him. But we trusted that it had been he that should have redeemed Israel: and beside all this, to-day is the third day since these things were done. Yea, and certain women also of our company, made us astonished, who were early at the sepulchre; and when they found not his body, they came, saying, that they had also seen a vision of angels, who said that he was alive. And certain of them who were with us, went to the sepulchre, and found it even so as the women had said: but him they saw not. Then he said unto them, O fools, and slow of heart, to believe all that the prophets have spoken: Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and so to enter into his glory? And beginning at Moses and all the Prophets, he expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself. And they drew nigh unto the village whither they were going: and he made as though he would go further; but they constrained him, saying, Abide with us: for it is toward evening, and the day is far spent. And

And he went in to tarry with them. And it came to pass, as he sat at table with them, he took bread, and blessed it and brake, and gave to them. And their eyes were opened and they knew him; and he vanished out of their sight. And they said one to another, Did not our heart burn within us, while he talked with us by the way, and while he opened to us the Scriptures? And they rose up the same hour, and returned to Jerusalem, and found the eleven gathered together, and them that were with them, saying, The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon. And they told what things were done in the way, and how he was known of them in the breaking of bread.

LESSON LXXIII.

Jesus Christ appeareth to the Apostles.

AND as they thus spake, Jesus himself stood in the midst of them, and saith unto them, Peace be unto you. But they were terrified, and affrighted, and supposed that they had seen a spirit. And he said unto them, Why are ye troubled? and why do thoughts arise in your hearts? Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself: handle me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have. And when he had thus spoken, he shewed them his hands and his feet. And while they yet believed not for joy, and wondered, he said unto them, Have ye here any meat? And they gave him a piece of a broiled fish, and of an honey-comb. And he took it, and did eat before them. And he said unto them, These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning me. Then he opened their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures. And said unto them, Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day. And ye are witnesses of these things. And, behold, I send the promise of my Father upon you: but tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem, until ye be endued with power from on high.

Then said Jesus to them again, Peace be unto you: as my father hath sent me, even so send I you. And when he had said this, he breathed on them, and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost: whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them; and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained. But Thomas, one of the twelve, called Didymus, was not with them when Jesus came. The other disciples therefore said unto him, We have seen the Lord. But he said unto them, Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into his side, I will not believe. And after eight days again his disciples were within, and Thomas with them: then came Jesus, the doors being shut, and stood in the midst, and said, Peace be unto you. Then saith he to Thomas, Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands; and reach hither thy hand and thrust it into my side: and be not faithless, but believing. And Thomas answered, and said unto him, my Lord and my God. Jesus saith unto him, Thomas, because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed: blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed. And many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book.

Copy of a LETTER to Mr. Secretary Sturges Bourne, from J. Leslie Foster and James Glassford, Esqrs. two of the Commissioners of Irish Education Inquiry; with a Copy of a Letter addressed by them to the Chairman of the Board:—
Also,

Copy of a LETTER from T. Frankland Lewis, (the Chairman) W. Grant, and A. R. Blake, Esqrs. to Mr. Secretary Sturges Bourne, enclosing a Copy of their Answer.

Ordered, by The House of Commons, to be Printed, 19 June 1827.

London, June 5th, 1827.

SIR,

THREE of the Commissioners of Irish Education Inquiry have signed the Ninth and final Report of our Board to His Majesty. Forming, as we do, a minority in that Board, and finding ourselves unable to join in the views taken by our colleagues, we were at once desirous of securing our own motives from misapprehension, and anxious to discharge what we felt to be our bounden duty, of endeavouring to submit to His Majesty our joint opinion upon this most important subject.

As the easiest mode of obtaining our object, we addressed a letter on the 1st instant to our chairman, explaining our sentiments, and requesting that it might be allowed a place in the Appendix to the Report, our colleagues guarding themselves of course to any extent they might deem necessary against being supposed to adopt our views.

We felt the more at liberty to prefer this request, as we observed that the Commissioners of Education Inquiry who had preceded us inserted in their concluding Report the separate opinions respectively entertained on the subject of the education of the Irish peasantry, by three out of the eleven individuals who formed their Board. It appeared to us, therefore, that the opinions of two who agreed out of a Board of five Commissioners were entitled to an equal degree of consideration.

Our application has however not been acceded to by our colleagues, and we therefore now feel it necessary for the attainment of our object to enclose to the Secretary for the Home Department a copy of the letter referred to, with our request, that, in the probable event of the Ninth Report being submitted to the two Houses of Parliament, this letter, with its enclosure, may be presented at the same time, and printed in the same volume.

We beg leave respectfully to direct your attention to the circumstance, that within the present year the Home Department has furnished an exact precedent for this course, on the occasion of the Fourth Report being presented from our Commission. The late Secretary of State judged it right to present to Parliament at the same time with that Report a letter from two of the Commissioners, stating the reasons of their dissent from it, which letter was printed in the same volume immediately after the Report, and before the Appendix.

We beg leave further to submit, that the printing our present letter in any separate form would necessarily fail in attaining the important object of presenting at the same time to the public view the sentiments of all the Commissioners.

We have, &c.

LETTER from John Leslie Foster, Esq. and James Glassford, Esq. two of the Commissioners of Irish Education Inquiry, to Thomas Frankland Lewis, Esq. Chairman of the Board.

London, June 1st, 1827.

Dear Sir,

AS we have not felt ourselves at liberty to join in the concluding part of the final Report read yesterday at the Board, proposed to be made to His Majesty by a majority of the Commissioners, and as we are extremely anxious to guard against the possibility of our motives being misapprehended, we are induced to submit to you our request that the following explanation on our part may be allowed a place in the Appendix.

We apprehend that our adoption of some of the expressions in the concluding paragraphs of the Report might be considered as implying opinions different from those which we really entertain respecting the plan which our Board originally recommended, and the principles upon which any new trial might still be made.

But, independent of our natural desire to secure ourselves from the danger of being misunderstood, we have a strong feeling that at the close of our Commission, and after the failure of our experiment, His Majesty and the Public have a right to know, and will expect to be informed, what are the opinions entertained by the Commissioners respecting the position in which the question of Irish Education is now left.

We observe that the Commissioners of Education Inquiry who preceded us thought themselves called on to insert in the Appendix to their final Report the separate opinions of three out of the eleven individuals who acted in their Commission, upon the general state of the education of the Irish peasantry, and we trust that our colleagues will not consider the joint opinion of two out of the five members of our Board unworthy of being now in like manner submitted to the public view.

The Commissioners to whom we refer took care to observe, that they did not mean to indicate thereby any approbation of the contents of those communications; and it is scarcely necessary for us to add, that we are quite prepared for the majority of our Board guarding themselves, to any extent they may deem necessary, against being supposed to adopt the views which we feel it our duty to express.

The plan for education suggested in our First Report proceeded upon the assumption of certain conditions, two of which we regarded as essential, and without which we thought, and continue to think, that the remainder of it ought not to be adopted. The first of these was to be the admission of certain books in the schools of general instruction, and the second, that the whole measure was to receive the concurrence and assistance of the Roman Catholic clergy.

For the terms in which these conditions were expressed, and the grounds of our expectation as to their fulfilment, we refer to the important Minute of Conference set forth in our First Report, and signed by the four Roman Catholic Archbishops, and by the Commissioners of Inquiry, on the 8th January 1825.

All prospect of obtaining the books so required has subsequently disappeared, under the circumstances which the final Report of the Commissioners details. And although this is the only part of the proposed plan which has been brought to the test of actual experiment, enough has appeared during the two years which have elapsed since our First Report was made, to satisfy us that there were other and not less formidable obstacles which would have interfered with the execution of the plan, even if the preliminary difficulty as to the books could have been removed.

On

On the 23d January, 1826, the Roman Catholic bishops transmitted to our Board a series of Resolutions upon this subject, wherein, among other points, they unanimously declare "that they deem it necessary that the master of each school in which the majority of the pupils profess the Roman Catholic faith be a Roman Catholic; and that in schools in which the Roman Catholic children form only a minority, a permanent Roman Catholic assistant be employed; and that such master and assistant be appointed upon the recommendation, or with the express approval, of the Roman Catholic bishop of the diocese in which they are to be employed;—and that they or either of them be removed upon the representation of such bishop;—and that they will, in their respective dioceses, withhold their concurrence and support from any system of education which will not fully accord with these principles."

It never was our understanding that a control to the extent which is here contemplated was to be committed to the bishops of the Roman Catholic Church; and in this declaration of the only terms upon which their concurrence would be given, we see reason for concluding that it could not practically have been obtained.

But our view of the difficulties which were opposed to the execution of the plan is not limited either to the selection of the books, or to the fact of the above resolutions having been adopted. We have observed during the last two years indications of public opinion in various quarters, sufficient to satisfy us that neither from the clergy of the Established Church, nor from the Presbyterians, nor from any considerable portion of the laity, could we have obtained that co-operation in the plan which would have been indispensably necessary for its success.

The importance of an active co-operation on the part of local patrons of schools can scarcely in our view be overrated. We are convinced, that without such support no compulsory measure could be attempted with the least hope of permanent advantage. We observe, that not only all the Sunday schools, amounting now to above 1,900*, but also no fewer than 2,654 of the daily schools of Ireland, are under the patronage and superintendence of individuals interested in their welfare, and who contribute both time and money for their support. In the class of schools thus superintended are to be found, we believe, a very great majority of the effective schools in the country.

We therefore beg leave to repeat our decided opinion, that the plan originally suggested has failed in essential particulars, without which its character and object would cease to be those which we had recommended, and without which the remaining parts of it ought not to be separately carried into effect.

We are now led to the consideration whether any other plan should be recommended. We are not prepared, without some additional examination, to suggest any new experiment. But if any farther attempt should be desired on the part of the Government, we are ready to contribute our best endeavours to pursue it upon any system not irreconcilable with the principles which we have always declared.

We continue of opinion that children of all religious persuasions ought to be united in common schools of literary instruction, and that the establishment of distinct and separate schools for children of different religious denominations would, under all the circumstances of Ireland, be highly inexpedient. We also continue of opinion, that the arrangements of schools should be so made as to leave ample opportunities for religious instruction being afforded to all classes, according to their several creeds.

We continue of opinion, that in schools assisted by the State no attempt to proselytize the children from one religious faith to another ought to be permitted.

We continue of opinion, that the Government should go to the utmost length of toleration in permitting the patrons and conductors of schools, and also the clergy of all persuasions, to provide, with the consent and sanction of the parents, whatever religious instruction they may feel themselves called upon to supply; but it appears to us, that it would be going beyond the bounds of toleration, in its largest sense, to enjoin it as a matter of obligation on any patron or manager to teach, or cause to be taught, a creed essentially in contradiction to his own. Against such a proposition we have protested on every occasion pending our commission.

* Their number was 1,702 at the date of our First Report, and is at present 1,945, according to the last accounts of the Society.

We cannot but suppose that many Roman Catholics would conscientiously object to becoming actively instrumental in teaching, or causing to be taught, a religious creed which they deem so full of error as that of any of the Protestant reformed Churches ; and it is within our certain knowledge, that many Protestants would feel a corresponding objection. We are persuaded that it would in general be found a vain attempt to require from patrons and from teachers such a sacrifice of conscientious feeling ; and even if the objection should not arise on their part, we conceive that it is a principle which the Government and the Legislature would not and ought not to sanction.

We therefore cannot too strongly express our opinion, that in any new experiment or system there ought not to be any compulsory requisition, imposing upon persons of any persuasion the duty of superintending, administering, regulating, or providing instruction in a religion which they deem erroneous. That the State should insist upon teaching conflicting and repugnant creeds is a course which we do not feel at liberty, under any circumstances, to recommend.

Before concluding this statement of our views we wish explicitly to declare, that in undertaking any further trial we should propose it only as an experiment ; and that we should protest now, as we did in the former instance, against being considered as thereby assuming principles by the aid of which any existing societies which now supply the means of good should be destroyed.

We are by every day's experience more convinced that under the present circumstances of Ireland, a particular plan of schools, though unsuited for one district, may yet be the best fitted for another, and that the same persons who reject any given system at one time, may become afterwards desirous of receiving it.

In the variety of plans and systems actually pursued we see different means and prospects of success. We conceive this to be no longer a matter of speculation, but demonstrated by every day's experience. Any plan for compelling all the varieties of schools to give way to one inflexible form, would in our opinion be a great mistake. We should say so even if that particular form had approved itself to be practically good ; but we think it would be a still greater and more dangerous error to act exclusively on any new principle while its merits should rest only on a theory.

We feel strongly that the unexampled improvement which has taken place within a short period in the education of the peasantry of Ireland ought duly to be appreciated before any of the means by which it has been produced shall be destroyed or endangered. We have stated in our Second Report that there are at present in Ireland no fewer than 11,823 schools—a greater number, perhaps, than is to be found for the same extent of population in any other country ; and though we lament that many of them still supply instruction of a very objectionable nature, we see with the utmost satisfaction the rapid improvement which has been already effected in their character.

To instance, first, with regard to the Scriptures :

About twenty years ago the Scriptures, as we are led to believe, were not read in so many as 600 schools in Ireland, while at present, as we have ascertained, and stated in our Second Report, they have found their way into 6,058 daily schools, independent of 1,945 Sunday schools—in all into above 8,000 schools.

After every possible deduction which can be made on account of schools closed, schools from which pupils have been withdrawn, and schools in which the use of the Scriptures is practically inefficient, there will still remain in our view such a general average of improvement in this respect, as the most sanguine could scarcely have anticipated.

The improvement in other points of inferior moment is not less striking : 1,370 school masters and mistresses of a very superior description have been sent forth by the Kildare-place Society alone, and about 280 more are supplied in each succeeding year. Much more than a million of books of a moral and instructive character, have been issued from their repository to take place of the immoral and seditious publications which were before too common ; and the number of books at the same time supplied by various other societies, independent of the Scriptures, has probably been not much inferior in amount.

It is further very worthy of remark, that of the 6,058 daily schools in which the Scriptures are now read, only 1,879 are connected with any societies whatever, whether those aided by the Government, or those supported by individual contributions. In the remaining 4,179 schools the Scriptures have of late years been adopted

adopted by the voluntary choice of the conductors and teachers, the latter of whom are generally dependent for their livelihood upon the pleasure of the parents of their pupils—a signal proof that there is no repugnance to scriptural instruction among the people, and not less an illustration of the effects silently produced by the example and competition of better institutions upon the common schools of the country.

This great amelioration in the education of the Irish peasantry is still in progress, and perhaps can now be checked by no means less powerful than such an interference on the part of the State as would be calculated to counteract it.

While, therefore, we are ready to promote the trial of any experiment that may suggest new means of usefulness, or which may perhaps be more fitted for some districts hitherto less accessible than others, we cannot too strongly express our opinion, that any such experiment ought to be considered only as an accompaniment to those means which experience has approved to be useful, and not as leading to the suppression of any tried instrument of good.

WE understand that a copy of a letter addressed to us on the 1st instant, by Mr. Leslie Foster and Mr. Glassford, has been transmitted to you, with a request that it may be laid before Parliament.

We now beg leave to forward a copy of our answer to that letter, (which we are not sure that you have already received), in order that our reasons for declining to comply with the request contained in it may be considered at the same time with the letter itself.

COPY of Letter from T. Frankland Lewis, W. Grant, and A. R. Blake, Esquires, to John Leslie Foster, Esq.

Dear Sir,

34, St. James's Place, 2d June 1827.

WE beg to acknowledge the receipt of the letter which was addressed to us by yourself and Mr. Glassford, dated the 1st instant, and which was received by us this morning.

We are anxious to recall to your recollection that we have used every endeavour to draw up a Report which might be approved of by all the Commissioners; that numerous drafts were successively submitted to the Board with that view; and that we exerted ourselves to the utmost, to remove every topic from the Report upon which a difference of opinion existed. It was not until we expressly understood from you that no Report could be agreed upon, in which, as it appeared to us, the fundamental principles laid down in our First Report were not in effect departed from, that we decided upon the adoption of that which has received our final assent.

We beg to assure you, that we feel the strongest desire to accede, as far as may be consistent with our duty, to any course you may think it desirable to point out, and we have, with that view, given the most careful consideration to your letter.

With respect to the precedent taken from the proceedings of the Commissioners of Education Inquiry in 1811, to which you refer, we think that there is an essential distinction between that case and the present. It appears upon that occasion, that at the express request of the Board, letters were written by three members who were unavoidably absent, and whose views the other Commissioners were desirous of ascertaining. These letters were inserted in the Appendix, with a view to illustrate the Report which was then preparing.

In the request you have made to us to submit to His Majesty, in the Appendix to our Report, the Letter you have addressed to us, we feel that we cannot concur, because we should be in fact transmitting a separate and conflicting Report, containing a variety of matters from which we entirely dissent, and with respect to which we should now have no proper opportunity of making the grounds of our opinion known.

The Letter contains a great variety of matter, in some measure new to the consideration of the Board. As to parts of it, no specific inquiries have been made since the presentation of our First Report. Other parts appear to us to be practically at variance with the principles laid down in that Report, although such variance is founded on no other authority than alleged "indications of public opinion in various quarters," as to the existence of which we are by no means agreed.

It is, we think, needless for us to enter more at large upon these particulars, as we have said enough to explain the reasons which induce us, in the discharge of our duty, to decline presenting your Letter to His Majesty annexed to our final Report.

We are, dear Sir,

Your very faithful Servants,

Select Committee on Education in Ireland

R E P O R T S.

Ordered, by The House of Commons, to be Printed, 19 May 1828.

THE SELECT COMMITTEE to whom the REPORTS on the subject of EDUCATION in IRELAND were referred; and who were empowered to report their Observations and Opinion thereon to The House;—HAVE agreed to the following REPORT:

IN the execution of the duties entrusted to them, Your Committee have proceeded to consider the Reports on the state of Education in Ireland, with a full sense of the importance of the subject, and of the peculiar difficulties with which it is at the present moment encompassed.

During several centuries, the Legislature has recognized the necessity and expediency of providing means for the Education of the Irish people. So far back as in the 28 Hen. 8. an Act was passed for the general establishment of Parochial Schools. By the 12 Eliz. the Diocesan Schools were founded, affording to the higher classes facilities for Education, analogous to those provided for the poorer orders under the Statute of Henry 8. It is worthy of observation, that even at this early period the progress of Crime is traced by the Legislature to the ignorance of the people, and Education is relied upon as producing moral improvement, and of supporting the institutions of civil policy. Various Statutes have been passed on this important subject, in the reigns of Charles the Second, William the Third, Geo. I., Geo. II. and Geo. III.; and Charters have been granted, and Endowments made, with the same intent. These laws and institutions have varied extremely in their spirit and character, according to the temper of the times and the disposition of the Government and of the Legislature; the latest in their foundation being generally the most comprehensive in their principles.

Inquiries have at different periods been instituted both by Committees of Parliament and by Parliamentary Commissioners, appointed for the purpose of considering the state of Education in Ireland. Of these the most important are the two latest, to which Your Committee will feel it their duty to make frequent reference. The first of these Commissions was issued under the authority of the Act 46 Geo. 3, c. 122, and produced, during the six years ending in 1812, fourteen Reports upon the Schools of Royal and of private foundation, the Charter Schools, Foundling Hospital, and the Parochial and Diocesan Schools. The second Commission was issued in consequence of an Address from the House of Commons to His Majesty, voted in 1824. This last Inquiry was continued till the month of June 1827, and has led to nine Reports on the various Establishments for Education.

Nor has the interference of the State been solely confined to regulation and to inquiry: Parliamentary Grants have been at various times most liberally made for

Copy of a LETTER to Mr. Secretary Sturges Bourne, from J. Leslie Foster and James Glassford, Esqrs. two of the Commissioners of Irish Education Inquiry; with a Copy of a Letter addressed by them to the Chairman of the Board:—
Also,

Copy of a LETTER from T. Frankland Lewis, (the Chairman) W. Grant, and A. R. Blake, Esqrs. to Mr. Secretary Sturges Bourne, enclosing a Copy of their Answer.

Ordered, by The House of Commons, to be Printed, 19 June 1827.

London, June 5th, 1827.

SIR,

THREE of the Commissioners of Irish Education Inquiry have signed the Ninth and final Report of our Board to His Majesty. Forming, as we do, a minority in that Board, and finding ourselves unable to join in the views taken by our colleagues, we were at once desirous of securing our own motives from misapprehension, and anxious to discharge what we felt to be our bounden duty, of endeavouring to submit to His Majesty our joint opinion upon this most important subject.

As the easiest mode of obtaining our object, we addressed a letter on the 1st instant to our chairman, explaining our sentiments, and requesting that it might be allowed a place in the Appendix to the Report, our colleagues guarding themselves of course to any extent they might deem necessary against being supposed to adopt our views.

We felt the more at liberty to prefer this request, as we observed that the Commissioners of Education Inquiry who had preceded us inserted in their concluding Report the separate opinions respectively entertained on the subject of the education of the Irish peasantry, by three out of the eleven individuals who formed their Board. It appeared to us, therefore, that the opinions of two who agreed out of a Board of five Commissioners were entitled to an equal degree of consideration.

Our application has however not been acceded to by our colleagues, and we therefore now feel it necessary for the attainment of our object to enclose to the Secretary for the Home Department a copy of the letter referred to, with our request, that, in the probable event of the Ninth Report being submitted to the two Houses of Parliament, this letter, with its enclosure, may be presented at the same time, and printed in the same volume.

We beg leave respectfully to direct your attention to the circumstance, that within the present year the Home Department has furnished an exact precedent for this course, on the occasion of the Fourth Report being presented from our Commission. The late Secretary of State judged it right to present to Parliament at the same time with that Report a letter from two of the Commissioners, stating the the purposes of Education. The amount of the expenditure will appear from the following Account :

Having thus adverted shortly to the legislative proceedings and the Parliamentary Grants for promoting Education in Ireland, it is important to consider the existing state of the Schools now in operation. The number of Scholars receiving Instruction in 1826, was 560,549; leaving in all probability upwards of 150,000 without the means of Education. Of the actual number of Scholars returned, 394,732 are brought up in the common Pay Schools; 46,119 in Schools supported exclusively by the Roman Catholic Priesthood and Laity; 84,295 under various Establishments of Private Charity; and 55,246 (or less than one-tenth of the whole) are instructed in Schools maintained in the whole or in part at the Public expense. It is also worthy of consideration, that whilst in the least exclusive of the latter Establishments (the Association for discountenancing Vice, and the Kildare Place Society) the number of Protestants as compared with Catholics is as 35,354 to 34,616; in the Pay Schools, the proportion of Scholars of the respective Religious Persuasions is as 87,338 to 307,405. It is, however, right to observe, that at the time these Returns were made, many of the Children are stated to have been withdrawn from the Schools; and consequently the numbers are probably below the real strength of Scholars in permanent attendance at other times.

In pursuing their inquiries, Your Committee have avoided as much as possible the consideration of all questions that would add to existing irritation and party violence. Their sole object has been, to consider the principle upon which it is expedient hereafter to grant Public Money in aid of Irish Education. With this view, Your Committee have preferred dealing with the proposition in the abstract, to entering upon any detailed examination of the comparative merits of existing Establishments. After the most anxious deliberation, Your Committee adopted the following Resolutions, founded upon a consideration of the documents referred to them by The House.

Resolved,

THAT it appears to this Committee, That Commissioners were appointed under legislative authority in the year 1806, for the purpose of inquiring into the state and condition of Schools in Ireland.

Resolved,

THAT it appears to this Committee, That a Report was agreed to by these Commissioners in the year 1812, communicating the result of their deliberations, "on the subject of extending and improving the Education of the Poorer Classes of His Majesty's Irish Subjects."

Resolved,

THAT it appears to this Committee, That such General Report, signed by three Prelates, by the Provost of the University of Dublin, and by several other distinguished Ecclesiastical as well as Lay Members of the Established Church, was presented to Parliament.

Resolved,

THAT it appears to this Committee, That in that Report, the Commissioners felt it their duty to express their unanimous opinion, "That no plan of Education, however “ however wisely and unexceptionably contrived in other respects, can be carried “ into effectual operation in Ireland, unless it be explicitly avowed, and clearly “ understood as its leading principle, that no attempt shall be made to in“ fluence or disturb the peculiar Religious tenets of any sect or denomination of “ Christians.”

Resolved,

THAT it appears to this Committee, That a second Commission issued in 1824, by Command of His present Majesty, in consequence of an Address from the House of Commons, for the purpose of inquiring into the State of Education in Ireland.

Resolved,

THAT it appears to this Committee, That the First Report of the Commissioners so appointed, has been presented to Parliament by His Majesty's command.

Resolved,

THAT it appears to this Committee, That in such Report, it is stated as the opinion of all the Commissioners, “ That in a country where mutual divisions “ exist between different classes of the people, Schools should be established for “ the purpose of giving to children of all Religious persuasions such useful “ instructions as they may severally be capable and desirous of receiving, without “ having any ground to apprehend any interference with their respective Religious “ Principles.” And the Commissioners further express “ their entire concurrence “ in the Principles laid down in the 14th Report,” already adverted to.

Resolved,

THAT it appears to this Committee, That the Schools recommended to be founded under the 14th Report of the Commissioners of Education, were intended for the purpose of affording a common Education for Protestant and Roman Catholic.

Resolved,

THAT it appears to this Committee, That the opinion of the second Commission of Inquiry has also been given “ in favour of the expediency of devising “ a system of mutual Education, from which suspicion should, if possible, be “ banished, and the causes of distrust and jealousy should be effectually removed,
“ and under which the children may imbibe similar ideas and form congenial habits, “ tending to diminish, not to increase, that distinctness of feeling now but too “ prevalent.”

Resolved,

THAT this Committee, with reference to the opinions above recorded, consider that no system of Education can be expedient, which may be calculated “ to “ influence or disturb the peculiar religious tenets of any sect or denomination of “ Christians.”

Resolved,

THAT it is the opinion of this Committee, That it is of the utmost importance to bring together children of the different religious persuasions in Ireland, for the purpose of instructing them in the general subjects of moral and literary knowledge, and providing facilities for their religious instruction separately, when differences of creed render it impracticable for them to receive religious instruction together.

Resolved,

THAT it appears to this Committee, That it is recommended in the 14th Report, that Commissioners should be appointed, empowered to receive and dispose of Parliamentary Grants, and to have a general control over the whole of the proposed Establishments for the instruction of the poorer classes in Ireland.

THAT it is also recommended in the First Report of the Second Board of Commissioners, that there should be formed a distinct Board of persons responsible for the execution of the duties committed to their charge in the foundation and management of Schools of general instruction.

Resolved,

THAT it is the opinion of this Committee, That considering the very large sums of Public Money annually voted for the encouragement of Education in Ireland, as well as the extreme discretion required in adopting a new system of united Education without permitting any interference in the peculiar religious tenets of scholars, that it is indispensably necessary to establish a fixed authority, acting under the control of the Government and of the Legislature, bound by strict and impartial rules, and subject to full responsibility, for the foundation, control and management of such Public Schools of general instruction as are supported on the whole or in part at the Public expense.

Resolved,

THAT it is the opinion of this Committee, That the selection of Teachers in the Schools of general education should be made without religious distinction; but that the qualifications of such Teachers should be proved by instruction or examination in a Model School established under the direction of the fixed authority appointed by the Government; every such Teacher being first required to produce a certificate of moral conduct and character from a clergyman of the communion to which he belongs.

Resolved,

THAT it is the opinion of this Committee, That for the purpose of carrying into effect the combined Literary and the separate Religious education of the scholars, the course of study for four fixed days of the week should be exclusively moral and literary; and that of the two remaining days, the one be appropriated solely to the separate religious instruction of the Protestant children, the other for the separate religious instruction of the Roman Catholic children. In each case no literary instruction to be given, or interference allowed on the part of the Teacher, but the whole of this separate religious instruction to be placed under the exclusive superintendence of the Clergy of the respective communions.

Resolved,

THAT it is the opinion of this Committee, That Copies of the New Testament, and of such other Religious Books as may be printed in the manner hereinafter mentioned, should be provided for the use of the children, to be read in school at such times of separate instruction only, and under the direction of the attending Clergyman; the Established Version for the use of the Protestant scholars, and the Version published with the approval of the Roman Catholic Bishops, for the children of that communion.

Resolved,

THAT it is the opinion of this Committee, That it be the invariable rule in such Schools of general instruction, that the scholars shall attend on Sunday at their respective places of worship, unless prevented by some sufficient excuse.

THAT Certificates be required from every Child, of attendance both at divine worship, and at the times appointed for separate religious instruction; and that the fact of such attendance be entered regularly in the School register.

Resolved,

THAT it is the opinion of this Committee, That Parliamentary aid for the establishment and support of Schools in Ireland should be for the future restricted to the following Objects:

1. Granting aid to Parishes, Local Subscribers or Charitable Societies, for the erection of School Houses, such aid not to exceed two thirds of the sum required, and the School House and site to be conveyed to the Commissioners; the Managers of such School entering into an engagement to conduct their establishment according to the rules prescribed.

2. Gratuities to Teachers of Schools conducted on the principles laid down by the Commissioners, not exceeding £. 5; £. 10 at the least being provided in addition, locally, as a permanent salary for such Teacher.

3. The publication of Books for the literary instruction of children, to be furnished, to Schools adopting the rules of the Commissioners, at half price.

4. School

4. School Requisites and Stationery, and Books for the separate religious instruction of children, to be furnished at prime cost.
5. The establishment of a Model School, for the education of Teachers.
6. A system of Inspection, either by the Commissioners or by persons appointed by them.
7. All Public aid to be dependent on Private contributions, and an adherence to the rules of the Commissioners.

Resolved,

THAT it is the opinion of this Committee, That the following Objects should be provided for by local contribution, upon which all aid from Parliamentary funds is to be made strictly dependent :

1. A Grant to the Commissioners of a Site for School House, either of one acre of land, or of land to the value of 40s. This to be required only when aid for building is applied for.
2. Annual Repairs of School House and School Furniture.
3. Local Contributions, for building Schools, of one third of the expense.
4. Books for general instruction, Stationery, School requisites, at half price.
5. Books for the separate religious education of the Scholars, at prime cost.
6. Permanent Salary for Master, not less than £. 10.

Resolved,

THAT it is the opinion of this Committee, That it be competent to the Commissioners to entertain any applications for the Grant of aid to Schools, coming either from individuals, Charitable Committees, or Associations, or Select Vestries of Parishes assembled under provisions analogous to those of the Tithe Composition Act.

THAT where a School has been built at their desire, Vestries so assembled should have a power of assessing their respective Parishes, for raising that portion of School expenditure which is required to be provided locally.

Resolved,

1. THAT it is the opinion of this Committee, That a Board of Education should be appointed by the Government, receiving Salaries and holding their Offices during pleasure ; all persons being eligible, without reference to Religious distinctions.

2. The Commissioners to receive all applications for Public aid, in the establishment or maintenance of the Schools of general Instruction.

3. To decide on the Appropriation of all Grants made by Parliament for the purposes of Education in Ireland, according to the principles laid down in these Resolutions ; to keep record, and make an annual report, of all their proceedings, to the Government and Legislature.

4. To superintend the Model Schools for the instruction of Teachers for the Schools of general Instruction ; such Teachers to be supported, during their instruction, at the Public expense, when recommended by Select Vestries, or by Persons or Societies permanently endowing or having endowed Schools.

5. To edit and print all Books for the general literary instruction of Scholars ; and to supply such Books, to Schools adopting the proposed Regulations, at half-price.

6. To print all Books, for the separate Religious instruction of Scholars, which are approved of by the Commissioners ; and to supply such Books, Stationery, Slates and school requisites, at prime cost. The Books for the separate Religious instruction of the Children, to be recommended by the Episcopal Authorities of the Church, and by the Roman Catholic Bishops, in Ireland.

7. To grant Certificates of qualification to Teachers having been duly instructed, or having passed an examination, in the Model Schools.

8. To hear and determine any complaint against Teachers in the Schools of general Instruction, for violation of the rule laid down by Parliament; with power to fine, suspend, or remove Teachers so transgressing.

9. To receive Returns, duly certified, of the attendance of Children at School, and of their attendance at Divine Worship, and at the times appropriated to separate Religious instruction; and also of all Sums received and disbursed on account of such Schools.

10. To receive Conveyances of the Sites of all School houses built at the Public expense and receiving aid from the Commissioners.

11. To receive a Return of all Books used in Schools supported in the whole or in part at the Public expense, and to have a power of rejecting any disapproved of by such Commissioners.

Resolved,

THAT it is the opinion of this Committee, That as a rule, the Children received in the Schools of general Instruction be required to pay such small sums for their Education as may be directed; but that free Scholars, being either orphans or the children of parents unable to afford payment, be received on the recommendation of the Parochial Clergy and of the Dissenting Ministers, and of persons subscribing to the Schools, or having granted land for a site; the power of recommendation being in proportion to the amount of money subscribed.

SUCH is the Plan of Education which Your Committee recommend to the most serious consideration of The House: It is founded on the principles laid down in 1812 and 1824 by the Commissioners of Inquiry, but it carries these principles into effect more strictly than has as yet been suggested or attempted. Your Committee cannot avoid expressing the most earnest hope, that, if adopted by The House, their recommendation will satisfy moderate and rational men of all opinions. It has been the object of Your Committee to discover a mode in which the combined Education of Protestant and Catholic may be carried on, resting upon Religious instruction, but free from the suspicion of Proselytism. Your Committee have endeavoured to avoid any violation of the liberty of conscience, or any demands or sacrifices inconsistent with the religious faith of any denomination of Christians. They propose leaving to the Clergy of each persuasion the duty and the privilege of giving religious instruction to those who are committed to their care. This plan cannot be objected to as disconnecting Religion from Morality and Learning; on the contrary, it binds them together indissolubly, and appears to unite them in a manner suited to the principles of sound policy, good faith, and Christian charity.

REPORT

FROM

Select Committee on Education in Ireland

REPORTS.

Ordered, by The House of Commons, to be Printed, 19 May 1828.

EDUCATION, IRELAND.

FIRST REPORT of the COMMISSIONERS appointed by the LORD LIEUTENANT to administer the FUNDS granted by Parliament for the EDUCATION of the POOR of Ireland.

TO HIS EXCELLENCY THE LORD LIEUTENANT-GENERAL AND GENERAL
GOVERNOR OF IRELAND.

WE, the undersigned Commissioners appointed to administer the Funds granted by Parliament for the Education of the Poor of Ireland, beg leave to report to Your Excellency as follows :

We commenced receiving applications for aid towards Schools in January 1832, and the total number made to us to the present time amounts to 1,548.

We have granted assistance to 789 Schools which are now in full operation. We made grants to 52 other Schools, which have since ceased to be in connection with us ; in general we deemed it right to discontinue aid to them in consequence of the reports of our inspectors. We have promised aid towards the building of 199 Schools which have not as yet been completed.

We have rejected 216 applications, and have 292 now before us for consideration.

The Schools which we already have in operation are attended by 107,042 children ; and, according to the estimates transmitted to us, those which are to be opened in the houses not yet finished will be attended by a further number of 36,804 ; so that the whole of the Schools existing and in preparation will afford the benefits of education to 143,846 children.

We have the satisfaction to state, that throughout our correspondence with the patrons of schools, we have found them disposed to act with perfect integrity and candour : some instances of deviation from our rules have been reported to us, but on inquiry into the circumstances, we have in general received such explanations as have been satisfactory to us.

An important part of the duty entrusted to us is the preparation of books for the use of the Schools and School Libraries. We have hitherto directed our attention chiefly to the compilation of books for Schools only ; we have prepared and published four numbers of a series of reading books, to which we propose to add a fifth ; the lessons of which these books consist have been so written or selected as that, while they are used as reading exercises, they convey elements of knowledge to the children in regular order. We have also published treatises on arithmetic and book-keeping and a translation of Clairant's Geometry. Some books having been hastily prepared to meet the urgent necessities of the Schools, will require a further revision, but we are enabled to add, that the whole have already met with very general approbation, and we propose so to arrange the prices and mode of sale as to bring them as much as possible into general use.

Besides these works on the ordinary subjects of education, we have compiled and printed two numbers of a series of lessons from the Holy Scriptures, one from the Old, the other from the New Testament, and we propose to go on adding to them until we complete a copious abstract of the narrative parts of the Sacred Volume, interspersed with suitable passages from the poetical and didactic parts of it. We proceed on the undertaking with perfect unanimity, and anticipate, from the general circulation of the work, the best results.

It having been imputed to us that we intended to substitute these extracts from the Scriptures for the Sacred Volume itself, we deemed it necessary to guard against such misrepresentation by annexing to the first number of them the following Preface :

“ These selections are offered, not as a substitute for the Sacred Volume itself, but as an introduction to it, in the hope of their leading to a more general and more profitable perusal of the Word of God. The passages introduced have been chosen, not as being of more importance than the rest of Scripture, but merely as appearing to be most level to the understandings of children and youth at school, and also best fitted to be read under the direction of teachers not necessarily qualified, and certainly not recognized, as teachers of religion ; no passage has either been introduced or omitted under the influence of any particular view of Christianity, doctrinal or practical.”

It has been further imputed to us, that we denied to children the benefits of religious instruction, and kept the Word of God from them ; to guard also against this extraordinary misrepresentation, we have introduced the following notes into our regulations :

Vide Appendix, 2.

No. 1. “ The ordinary school business, during which all the children, of whatever denomination they be, are required to attend, and which is expected to embrace a competent number of hours in each day, is to consist exclusively of instruction in those branches of knowledge which belong to literary and moral education. Such extracts from the Scriptures as are prepared under the sanction of the Board may be used, and are earnestly recommended by the Board to be used, during those hours allotted to this ordinary school business.

No. 2. “ One day in each week (independently of Sunday) is to be set apart for religious instruction of the children, on which day such pastors or other persons as are approved of by the parents or guardians of the children, shall have access to them for that purpose, whether those pastors have signed the original application or not.

No. 3. “ The managers of schools are also expected, should the parents of any of the children desire it, to afford convenient opportunity and facility for the same purpose, either before or after the ordinary school business (as the managers may determine) on the other days of the week.

No. 4. “ Any arrangement of this description that may be made, is to be publicly notified in the schools, in order that those children, and those only, may be present at the religious instruction, whose parents or guardians approve of their being so.

No. 5. “ The reading of the Scriptures, either in the authorised or Douay version, is regarded as a religious exercise, and as such, to be confined to those hours which are set apart for religious instruction. The same regulation is also to be observed respecting prayer.

No. 6. “ A register is to be kept in each school, recording the daily attendance of the children, and the average attendance in each week and each quarter, according to a form to be furnished by the Board.”

We have thus shown to all who choose to read our rules, with the view of understanding, not perverting them, that, while we desire to bring Christian children of all denominations together, so that they may receive instruction in common in those points of education which do not clash with any particular religious opinions, we take care that sufficient time be set apart for separate religious instruction, and that the ministers of God's Word, of all Christian creeds, and those approved of by them, shall have the fullest opportunity of reading and expounding it, and of seeing that the children of their respective denominations do read and understand it, not only weekly, but daily, if they think proper.

The success which has attended our labours, as appears by the progress we have made, abundantly proves that the system of education committed to our charge has been gratefully received and approved by the public in general ; we trust it will continue to spread and prosper.

It

It shall be, as it ever has been, our constant object so to administer it as to make it acceptable and beneficial to the whole of His Majesty's subjects; to train up and unite through it the youth of the country together, whatever their religious differences may be, in feelings and habits of attachment and friendship towards each other, and thus to render it the means of promoting charity and goodwill amongst all classes of the people.

We annex a statement of our Receipts and Expenditure to the 31st December 1833, and of our present liabilities, to which we beg to refer.

APPENDIX, No. 2.

REGULATIONS and DIRECTIONS to be attended to in making Application to the Commissioners of National Education, for Aid towards the building of School-houses, or for the support of Schools.

I. On Building School-houses.

1. WHEN aid is sought from the Commissioners for building a school-house, the site of the intended building is to be described, the tenure by which it is held stated, and a plan of the house, with estimates by one or more respectable tradesmen furnished, one-third at least of the expense to be locally contributed.

2. The school-house, when finished, is to be vested in trustees, to be chosen by the applicants themselves, and their names reported to the Commissioners for their approbation; these trustees to hold the school-house for the purpose of National Education, according to the regulations set forth in this paper.

3. No alteration is to be made in the trusteeship without the concurrence of the Commissioners. If any of the trustees die or resign, new trustees shall be elected to supply their place, subject to the approval of the Board.

4. Although the Commissioners do not absolutely refuse aid in all cases towards the erection of school-houses on ground connected with the place of worship, yet they much prefer their being erected on ground which is not so connected, when it can be obtained; they therefore expect, that before church, chapel or meeting-house ground be adopted as the site of a school-house, inquiry be made whether another convenient site may be obtained, and the result of the inquiry stated to them.

5. The Board do not contribute to the ornamenting of school-houses, but merely to the accommodation of the children in plain substantial buildings: if buildings of a more ornamented and expensive kind be preferred, the whole of the extra expenses must be provided by the applicants.

6. The Board do not contribute towards the erecting of apartments for teachers.

II. On

II. On Assistance given towards conducting Schools.

It is required that a portion of the different expenses requisite for conducting schools, such as providing school furniture, repairing school-houses, and paying the teachers' salaries, be locally raised. The Board will determine in each case the proportion to be contributed from the public funds towards these and similar expenses, according to the circumstances of each. All schools connected with the Board have permission to purchase the books issued by the Board, and other school requisites, such as paper, slates, quills, &c. at half cost price.

III. On the Regulation of the Schools as to Tuition, Attendance, &c.

1. THE ordinary school business, during which all the children, of whatever denomination they be, are required to attend, and which is intended to embrace a competent number of hours in each day, is to consist exclusively of instruction in those branches which belong to literary and moral education. Such extracts from Scripture as are prepared under the sanction of the Board may be used, and are earnestly recommended by the Board to be used, during those hours allotted for this ordinary school business.

2. One day at least in each week (independently of the Sunday) is to be set apart for the religious instruction of the children, on which day such pastors or other persons as are approved of by the parents or guardians of the children, shall have access to them for that purpose, whether those pastors have signed the original application or not.

3. The managers of schools are also expected, should the parents of any of the children desire it, to afford convenient opportunity and facility for the same purpose, either before or after the ordinary school business (as the managers may determine) on other days in the week.

4. Any arrangement of this description that may be made, is to be publicly notified in the schools, in order that those children, and those only, may be present at the religious instruction whose parents and guardians approve of their being so.

5. The reading of the Scriptures, either in the authorized or Douay version, is regarded as a religious exercise, and as such is to be confined to those times which are set apart for religious instruction. The same regulation is also to be observed respecting prayer.

6. A register is to be kept in each school, recording the daily attendance of the scholars, and the average attendance of each week and each quarter, according to a form to be furnished by the Board.

IV. On the Books to be used in the Schools.

1. THE titles of all books which the conductors of the schools intend to use in the ordinary school business are to be reported to the Board, and no other books to be used than those which have been reported and sanctioned by the Board.

2. No books are to be understood as prohibited by the Board, except such as appear to them to contain matter objectionable in itself or objectionable as peculiarly belonging to some particular religious denomination: but the price of those books only shall be reduced which are issued from the depository of the Board.

3. The Board will furnish gratuitously to each school, from and after the 1st of April next, a first stock of school books, which are to be kept as a school stock, and used when required in teaching the pupils, but which are on no account to be taken out of the school-room. The inspector will require to see these at every inspection. Children, whose parents wish them to bring their books home with them, will be supplied at the reduced price at which they are furnished by the Board. All supplies of books, additional to those furnished by the Board, are to be purchased from the depository at half cost price.

4. If any other books than the Holy Scriptures or the standard books of any Church, to which any of the children belong, are to be employed in communicating religious instruction, the pastor or religious teacher who proposes to employ such book, is expected to communicate his intention to any individual member of the Board, and consult with him as to its suitableness.

V. On the choice, &c. of Teachers.

1. LOCAL patrons and committees of schools are expected to select suitable teachers, and to superintend them. But the Commissioners will require to be satisfied of the fitness of the teachers, both in regard to moral character and to literary qualifications, by testimonials, and also, if they see fit, by training in a model school and examination.

2. Should the Commissioners judge any teachers employed in a school receiving occasional aid from them, not to possess suitable qualifications for his office, or to be otherwise objectionable, they will feel themselves at liberty to withhold the portion of the salary contributed by them until a fit person shall be appointed. If such a teacher be found employed in a school-house erected partly by the public funds entrusted to them, and vested in trustees as above directed, they will require that the teacher be dismissed and another provided.

3. Salaries

3. Salaries granted by the Board are granted to the teachers individually; and therefore if any teacher be dismissed or die, or any new teacher be introduced into the school, it is expected that such change be communicated immediately to the Board, and their sanction obtained for the new teachers.

VI. Miscellaneous.

1. It is the earnest wish of His Majesty's Government and of the Commissioners that the clergy and laity of the different religious denominations in the country co-operate with one another, in conducting the schools connected with the Board. Nevertheless the Government and Commissioners choose rather to leave this expression of their desire to the good feeling of applicants themselves, than to make it the subject of any expressed stipulations; persuaded that when practicable, this recommendation will be attended to.

2. It is expected that when any school is received by the Board into connection with it, the inscription "National School" shall be put up conspicuously on the school-house; and that in building school-houses partly by funds entrusted to the Commissioners, a stone shall be built into the wall having that inscription cut in it.

3. The Commissioners understand that they are not in ordinary cases to exercise control over school-houses on Sundays, or beyond the hours of instruction on other days, that control being left to the local conductors of the schools; but they expect that no use shall be made of the school-rooms, tending to contention, such as the holding of political meetings in them; and that they shall not be converted into places of public worship. Such use made of school-houses built by aid from the Commissioners, will be held to be a violation of the principles of the National Education System; such a use made of a school-house received after its establishment into connection with the Board, they will regard as a sufficient reason for withholding further aid and dissolving the connection.

4. The Commissioners will require that the principles of the following lesson be strictly inculcated in all schools admitted into connection with them, and that a printed copy of the lesson itself, to be furnished by them, shall be hung up in each school.

Christians should endeavour, as the Apostle Paul commands them, to "live peaceably with all men," (Rom. cap. 12, v. 18.) even with those of different religious persuasions.

Our Saviour, Christ, commanded his disciples "to love one another." He taught them to love even their enemies, to bless those that cursed them, and to pray for those that persecuted them. He himself prayed for his murderers.

Many men hold erroneous doctrines: we ought not to hate or persecute them. We ought to seek the truth, and to hold fast what we are convinced is the truth; but not to treat harshly those who are in error. Jesus Christ did not intend his religion to be forced on men by violent means. He would not allow his disciples to fight for him.

If any persons treat us unkindly, we must not do the same to them; Christ and all his Apostles have taught us not to return evil for evil. If we would obey Christ, we must do to others, not as they do to us, but as we should wish them to do to us.

Quarrelling with our neighbours and abusing them is not the way to convince them that we are in the right and they in the wrong. It is more likely to convince them that we have not a Christian spirit.

We ought to show ourselves followers of Christ, who, "when he was reviled, reviled not again," (1 Pet. cap. 2, v. 23.) by behaving gently and kindly to every one.

5. It is expected that clergymen of all denominations even although they may not have signed the application to the Board, shall have free admission to the school, not to take part in the ordinary business, or to interrupt it, but as visitors, to observe how the school is conducted.
